(4—6.) 'Showing and proving ourselves to be (what [false teachers, or] unbelievers deny) persons to whom is committed a divine legation. Paul, as in similar lists, distributes the particulars in groups: after the general term, denoting endurance of hardships, and trials of every kind, comes the first group, denoting his afflictions, necessities, and pinching adversity, (necessity, dire calamity.) for there seems a climax. The next words advert to actual and direct persecutions; then, "labors," &c., may well refer to his corporal labor at his trade; the watchings to the abridgment of his nocturnal rest, occasioned by the necessity of making up at over hours, and in the night time, for part of the day consumed in his evangelical labors; and the fastings may very well refer to that scanty fare which a trade, followed up with such divided attention, would necessarily occasion. Some ancient comtrs. understand these as the apostle's voluntary sufferings. But this seems an unfounded notion. The interpretation was, I imagine, devised to afford a countenance to monkish austerities.' Bloomf.

(6.) Knowledge.] 'Prudence or skill in right action; so Ros., &c. Others, a firm, stable, unwavering knowledge and persuasion. Grot. tr. a knowledge of the law, literal and mystical. I prefer, with Chrys., "the wisdom that is from above, the only true wisdom." And this tr. is placed beyond a doubt, by Ja. 3:17. Kindness.] By this word is intended an opposition to superciliousness, and starched austerity of manners. By the Holy Ghost.] "The sanctifying graces and aids of the Holy Spirit, to which the apostle ever yielded. Chrys." 'And these amiable dispositions we cultivate in humble dependence on [and by the aid of] the sanctifying influences of the Holy Spirit, who dwells in our hearts, as a continual principle of that undisssembled love, which we exercise without limitation, not only to friends and benefactors, but to enemies [336]

untary for the sake of religion; but he exercised much patience in all, v. 4, 5. Note, Faithful ministers are often reduced to great difficulties, and stand in need of much patience. Those who would approve themselves to God, must approve themselves faithful in trouble as well as in peace, not only in doing the work of God diligently, but also in bearing the will of God patiently.

(2.) By acting from good principles, v. 6, 7. There is no piety without purity, a care to keep ourselves unspotted from the world; zeal, too, without knowledge, is but madness. Nor must we be easily provoked, but bear hard treatment even from those to whom we kindly endeavor to do good. So Paul acted, under the influence of the Holy Ghost, from the noble principle of unfeigned love, according to the rule of the Word of truth, under the supports and assistances of the power of God, having on the armor of righteousness, a consciousness of universal righteousness and holiness; which is the best defence against the temptations of prosperity on the right hand, and of adversity on the left.

(3.) By a due temper and behavior under all the variety of conditions in this world, v. 8—10. We must expect to meet with many alterations of our circumstances and conditions in this world; and it will be a great evidence of our integrity, if we preserve a right temper of mind, and duly behave ourselves, under them all. It should seem that persons differently represented the apostles; some represented them as the best, and others as the worst, of men; some counted them deceivers, and run them down as such; others as true, preaching the Gospel of truth, and true to the trust reposed in them. Men of the world slighted them, as unknown, men of no figure or account, nor worth noting; yet in all the churches of Christ they were well known, and of great account; they were looked upon as dying, being killed all the day long, and their interest as a dying interest; 'and yet behold,' says the apostle, 'we live, live comfortably, and bear up cheerfully under all our hardships, and go on conquering and to conquer;' and though it was thought they were sorrowful, a company of mopish and melancholy men, always sighing and mourning; yet they were always rejoicing in God, and had the greatest reason to rejoice always. They were despised as poor, on account of their poverty in this world; and yet they made many rich, by preaching the unsearchable riches of Christ. They were thought to have nothing, and silver and gold, houses and lands they had none; yet they possessed all things; nothing in this world, but a treasure in heaven, nothing in themselves, but all things in Christ. Such a paradox is a Christian's life, and through such a variety of conditions and reports lies our way to heaven; and we should be careful in all these things to approve ourselves to God.

V. 11—18. He proceeds to address himself more particularly to the Corinthians, and cautions them against mingling with unbelievers. The caution is introduced with a profession, in a very pathetic manner, of the most tender affection to them, v. 11—13. Though the apostle was happy in a great fluency of expressions, yet he seemed to want words how to signify the warm affections he had for these Corinthians. And because his heart was thus enlarged with love to them, therefore he opened his mouth so freely to them in kind admonitions and exhortations; and all he wished in return was, that they would be correspondently affected ministry is blamed,' and men are fatally prejudiced against the truth! And how common it is for us to be drawn into those improprieties of conduct, which prevent the usefulness of our most earnest exhortations! We should, therefore, continually beseech the Lord to erase every unfavorable impression, which any past misconduct may have made on men's minds, and to prepare us for serving Him more unexceptionably for the future; that we may give up every worldly interest and indulgence, and be willing to labor and suffer in the cause of Christ. We should seek to be made 'fruitful in good works;' to be endued with 'pureness and knowledge;' to be strengthened in the exercise of long-suffering and kindness; to be 'armed with the whole armor of God;' to rejoice in the midst of tribulation; to be far more desirous of making others rich, than of avoiding poverty in our own circumstances; to leave our character and concerns in the Lord's hands; and to count ourselves 'to possess all things,' in his all-sufficient favor, and exceedingly great and precious promises. V. 11. Mouth.] 'It refers to that impassioned strain of fervid oratory, in the preceding vs., poured forth as from the mouth of a cataract. Thoughts that breathe, easily find vent in words that burn. Enlarged.]

12 Ye are not straitened in us, but ye are straitened in your own bowels.

13 Now for a recompense in the same, (I speak as unto my children,) be ye also enlarged.

14 Be ye not unequally yoked together with unbelievers: for what fellowship hath righteousness with unrighteousness? and what communion hath light with darkness?

15 And what concord hath Christ with Belial? or what part hath he that believeth with an infidel?

16 And what agreement hath the temple of God with idols? for ye are the temple of the living God; as God hath said, I will dwell in them, and walk in them; and I will be their God, and they shall be my people.

17 Wherefore come out from among them, and be ye separate, saith the Lord, and touch not the unclean thing; and I will receive you,

18 And I will be a Father unto you, and ye shall be my sons and daughters, saith the Lord Almighty.

CHAP. VII.

1 He proceedeth in exhorting them to purity of life, 2 and to bear him like affection as he doth to them. 3 Whereof least he might seem to doubt, he declareth what comfort he took in his afflictions, by the report which Titus gave of their godly sorrow, which his former epistle had wrought in them, 13 and of their loving-kindness and obedience towards Titus, answerable to his former boasts of them.

HAVING therefore these promises, dearly beloved, let us cleanse ourselves from all filthi-

PRACT. OBS. V. 11—18. Evident uprightness and enlarged love give confidence, in addressing even those who have imbibed prejudices; we shall be far more grieved when they close their minds against our instructions, than when they refuse to communicate to our necessities; and the most desired 'recompense' of 'our labor of love,' will be their readiness to receive the truth from our lips.—It will especially be near the heart of such pastors, to caution their 'beloved children' in the Gospel, not to be 'unequally yoked with unbelievers.' The fatal effects of neglecting the scriptural precept in this matter are most evident. They, whose trial it is to be thus connected, without their wilful fault, may expect peculiar consolations under it; but when believers will thrust themselves into these disadvantageous circumstances, contrary to the express warnings of God's Word, they may expect to feel great and often very durable additional distress; and we are most likely to do good to unbelievers, when we stand aloof from all other intercourse with them, besides that of duty and compassion. If we be Christians indeed, we are 'the temples of the living God;' [magnificent, glorious thought;] and 'what have we then to do any more with idols?' Let us value our relation to Him, and not profane it; let us admire his condescending promises, of 'dwelling and walking in us' poor sinners, whom He hath reconciled to Himself by Jesus Christ. Let us not touch any gain or indulgence that is spotted with sin. Let us remember, that the world, though called Christian, still 'lieth in wickedness,' and is full of unclean things, which we must abhor. Let us assure ourselves that the Lord will receive all those, who come in his appointed way, and at his call; and that He 'will be a Father unto them,' and take them for his children; and if it be so envied a privilege, to be the son or daughter of some earthly potentate, who can express the dignity and felicity of being 'the sons and daughters of the Lord Almighty?' 1 John 3:1—3.

In joy, and other impassioned feelings, the heart really feels as if loosened and enlarged; whereas, in the contrary affections, as sorrow, fear, alarm, &c., the heart seems tightened.

BLOOMF. V. 13, 14. Children.] 'To suggest the ground of the claim, viz. his paternity. Make me, then, v. 14. this return of affection, and as a proof of it, observe my admonitions, especially this, be not a yoke-fellow (so the Gr.) &c. which has a double sense, and delicately includes marriage, (which would bring a Christian into close contact with heathen society,) while condemning all habitual intimacy.' ID.

V. 14—18. The apostle especially entreated his beloved children, not to contract marriages, or form any intimate connexions, with unbelievers, to which carnal motives might induce them.—(16) I will dwell, &c.] With some variation from the LXX, and also from the Heb.; but it gives the general meaning. God hath said.] Doddr. paraphrases, 'Now when we consider the constitution of the Christian church, we cannot possibly imagine that God is less favorably present with it than He was with the Jewish. We may, therefore, hear God calling to us, as to Israel, Come out, &c.' The sense (says BL.) is: 'to employ and apply the words of God to the present case.' And he adds, 'Can anything more strongly prove the divine inspiration of towards him. It is desirable that there should be a [strong and] mutual good affection between ministers and their people, and this would greatly tend to their mutual comfort and advantage.

The exhortation is, not to mingle themselves with unbelievers, not to be unequally yoked with them, v. 14. Either,

1. In stated relations. It is wrong for good people to join in affinity with the wicked and profane; these will draw different ways, and that will be galling and grievous; and there is more danger that the bad will damage the good, than hope that the good will benefit the bad.

2. In common conversation. We should not yoke ourselves in friendship and acquaintance with wicked men and unbelievers. Though we cannot wholly avoid seeing and hearing, and being with such, yet we should never choose them for our bosom-friends.

3. Much less should we join in religious communion with them; we must not join their idolatrous services, nor concur in their false worship, nor any abominations; we must not confound together the table of the Lord and the table of devils; the house of God and the house of Rimmon. The apostle gives several good reasons against this corrupt mixture.

(1.) It is a very great absurdity, v. 14, 15. as bad as for the Jews to have ploughed with an ox and an ass, or to have sown divers sorts of grain intermixed. What an absurdity to think of joining righteousness and unrighteousness, or mingling light and darkness, fire and water, together! Yet believers and unbelievers, Christ and Belial, are equally opposite. It is absurd, therefore, to think of enlisting under both; and if the believer has part with an infidel, he does what in him lies to bring Christ and Belial together.

(2.) It is a dishonor to the Christian's profession; v. 16. for Christians are by profession, and should be in reality, the temples of the living God, dedicated to, and employed for, the service of God, who has promised to reside in them, to dwell and walk in them, to stand in a special relation to them, and take a special care of them, that He will be their God, and they shall be his people. Now there can be no agreement between the temple of God and idols.

(3.) There is great danger in communicating with unbelievers and idolaters; danger of being defiled, and of being rejected; therefore the exhortation is, v. 17. to avoid the society of such, and not to touch the unclean thing, lest we are defiled. We must take care not to defile ourselves by converse with those who [persist to] defile themselves with sin; so is the will of God, as we ever hope to be received, and not rejected, by Him.

(4.) It is base ingratitude to God for all the favors He has bestowed on believers, and promised to them, v. 18. God has promised to be a Father to them, and that they shall be his sons and his daughters; and is there a greater honor or happiness? How ungrateful then must it be, if such, who have this dignity and felicity, should degrade and debase themselves by mingling with unbelievers!

CHAP. VII. V. 1—4. These vs. contain a double exhortation.

1. To make a progress in holiness, or to perfect holiness in the fear of God, v. 1. in view of the exceeding great and precious them, besides that of duty and compassion. If we be Christians indeed, we are 'the temples of the living God;' [magnificent, glorious thought;] and 'what have we then to do any more with idols?' Let us value our relation to Him, and not profane it; let us admire his condescending promises, of 'dwelling and walking in us' poor sinners, whom He hath reconciled to Himself by Jesus Christ. Let us not touch any gain or indulgence that is spotted with sin. Let us remember, that the world, though called Christian, still 'lieth in wickedness,' and is full of unclean things, which we must abhor. (17.) Separate.] 'A separation of counsels and plans, not accompanied with that hatred, in which the Jews always held foreign nations.' ROS. An internal, mental, spiritual, rather than an external non-intercourse alone: for 'this more perfect disposition of mind,' (says ROS.) 'makes us more united to God,' and more fit to be 'received into his especial society, as the Gr. has it.' (18.) 'Not, it is supposed, found, in so many words, in any one passage of the O. T.; though, by some, referred to Jer. 31:1 or 9. or rather, 2 S. 7:14. Paul meant (I think) to apply that very passage, though, no doubt, he had some similar ones in his mind.' BLOOMF.

NOTES. CHAP. VII. V. 1. This v. is evidently connected with the subject of the former ch. 6:14—18. All sin is 'filthiness' in the judgment of God, because contrary to his holy nature and law. Sensual lusts may be called 'filthiness of the flesh;' while pride, envy, revenge, avarice, idolatry, and all ungodliness may be intended by the 'filthiness of the spirit;' or the former may signify the outward expression of sin by the body in word or deed; the latter, its inward workings in the imagination and affections. It should, however, be noted, that the apostle speaks of 'filthiness of the spirit;' whereas modern theologians often speak as if the body alone were the seat of pollution. Rom. 6:5—9. Gal. 5:16—21.—Perfecting, &c.] 'Still making progress in holiness.' WHITBY. If any were perfect, in the strict sense of the word, the exhortation would not suit them. It would not be properly addressed to a holy angel, or to the 'spirits of just men made perfect.' SCOTT.

(1.) Filthiness, or pollution of the flesh.] I. e. improper desires, resulting in acts; as theft, lying, fraud, drunkenness, gluttony, slander, abusive language, fighting, lasciviousness, idolatry, &c. Of the spirit.] Indulgence of pride, avarice, malice, impure thoughts; complacent meditation on future or past sins; all such (wiltful) ill-regulated thoughts as lead to evil actions: or approval of any of those thoughts which defile a man ED.

2 Receive us; we have wronged no man, we have corrupted no man, we have defrauded no man.

3 I speak not this to condemn you; for I have said <sup>d</sup> before, that ye are in our hearts to die and live with you.

4 Great is my boldness of speech toward you, great <sup>e</sup> is my glorying of you: I am filled with comfort, I am exceedingly joyful <sup>f</sup> in all our tribulation.

5 For when we were come into Macedonia our flesh had no rest, but we were troubled on every side; without <sup>g</sup> were fightings, within were fears.

6 Nevertheless God, that comforteth those that are cast down, comforted us by the coming of <sup>h</sup> Titus;

7 And not by his coming only, but by the consolation wherewith he was comforted in you, when he told us your earnest desire, your mourning, your fervent mind toward me; so that I rejoiced the more.

8 For though I made you sorry with a letter, I do not repent, though I <sup>i</sup> did repent: for I perceive that the same epistle hath made you sorry, though it were but for a season.

9 Now I rejoice, not that ye were made sorry, but that ye sorrowed to repentance: for ye were made sorry <sup>j</sup> after a godly manner, that ye might receive damage by us in nothing.

promises mentioned in the former ch. The promises of God are strong inducements to sanctification, in both the branches thereof, namely, dying unto sin, or mortifying our lusts and corruptions, of body and of mind; and living unto righteousness and holiness. We must endeavor to be holy as God is holy, and perfect as our Father in heaven is perfect, and not be contented without aiming at sinless perfection, though we shall always come short of it, while in this world; and this we must do in the [loving] fear of God, which is the root and principle of all religion, and there is no holiness without it.

2. To show a due regard to the ministers of the Gospel; Receive us, v. 2. Those who labor in the word and doctrine, should be had in reputation, and be highly esteemed for their work's sake; and this would be a help to making progress in holiness. If the ministers of the Gospel are thought contemptible because of their office, there is danger lest the Gospel itself be contemned also. The apostle did not think it any disparagement to court the favor of the Corinthians; and though we must flatter none, yet we must be gentle towards all.

(1.) He had done nothing to forfeit their esteem and good-will, and was cautious not to do anything to deserve their ill-will, v. 2. I have coveted no man's silver, or gold, or apparel, said he to the elders of Ephesus, Acts 20: 33. This is an appeal like that of Samuel, 1 S. 12. Then may ministers the more confidently expect esteem and favor from the people, when they can safely appeal to them, that they are guilty of nothing that deserves disesteem or displeasure.

(2.) He did not herein reflect on them for want of affection to him, v. 3, 4. and, to prevent any insinuations against him on account of what he had said, as if he intended to charge them with wronging him, or unjust accusations of him for having wronged them, he assures them again of his great affection to them, inasmuch that he could spend his last breath at Corinth, and live and die with them, if his business with other churches, and his work as an apostle, would permit him to do so. And he adds, it was his great affection to them, that made him use such boldness or freedom of speech toward them, and caused him to glory, or make his boasts of them, in all places, and on all occasions, being filled with comfort, and exceeding joyful in all [his] tribulations.

V. 5—11. There seems to be a connexion between ch. 2: 13. and v. 5. of this ch., and so great was the apostle's affection to the Corinthians, and his concern about their behavior in relation to the incestuous person, that he still had no rest till he heard from them. And now he tells them,

1. How he was distressed, v. 5. He was troubled when he did not meet with Titus at Troas, ch. 2: 13. and afterwards, when for some time he did not meet with him in Macedonia, because he could not hear what reception he met with at Corinth, or how their affairs went forward. And beside this, they had other troubles, continual opposition, from Jews and Gentiles; and great concern for such as had embraced the Christian faith, lest they should be corrupted or seduced, and give scandal to others, or be scandalized.

2. How he was comforted, v. 6, 7. The very coming of Titus, and his company, was some comfort to him; but the good news Titus brought concerning the Corinthians, was matter of greater consolation, especially when he acquainted him with their earnest desire to give good satisfaction in the things about which the apostle had written to them; and of their mourning for the scandal found among them, and the great grief they had caused to others; and their fervent mind, or great affection, toward the apostle, who had dealt so faithfully with them in reproving their faults. And he ascribes all his comfort to God as the Author, even the God of all comfort, v. 6. We should look above and beyond all means and instruments, unto God, as the Author of all the consolation and good we enjoy.

3. How greatly he was rejoiced at their repentance, and its evidences. He was sorry some among them laid to heart very greatly what he said in his former epistle, or that it was needful he should make them sorry, whom he had rather have made glad, v. 8. But now he rejoiced, when he found they had sorrowed to repentance, v. 9. for now it appeared they had received damage by him in nothing; their sorrow was but for a season; it was turned into joy, and that joy was durable. Observe here,

(1.) The antecedent of true repentance is godly sorrow, that worketh repentance. The offender had great sorrow, and the society was greatly sorrowful, which before was puffed up; and this sorrow of theirs was

V. 2—4. The apostle here returned to his more immediate purpose of re-establishing his authority among the Corinthians. 6:11—13. He called on them, to 'receive' him and his brethren as the ambassadors of Christ. There could be no reason for a contrary conduct; as they had 'injured no man,' in his person or connexions; 'corrupted no man,' in his principles or morals; and 'defrauded no man' in regard to his property; or in any respect coveted ought belonging to them.—Indeed he was so confident that they would submit to his apostolical authority, that he addressed them with great freedom and boldness, not fearing but they would take it in good part; and he even gloried among his friends concerning their conduct in the late transactions; yea, he was filled with such comfort on that account, as abundantly counterbalanced all his trials.—We have defrauded.] See on 2:10. 'The word . . . signifies, to indulge a covetous temper, and make a prey of others by it; and perhaps intimates, that the false teachers, of whom he had so much reason to complain, had done it. (4) I am exceeding joyful.] See on Rom. 5: 20.—'It has an inexpressible energy; and is, if I mistake not, a word of the apostle's own making.' Doddr.

(2.) 'A continuation of the metaphorical language at 6:11—13. for the words following, in vs. 14—13. are an independent paragraph, containing the admonition to abstain from heathen society. The sense, therefore, seems to be this: "give us a large place in your affections, and (which is connected therewith) observe these our earnest and affectionate admonitions. We may claim to possess, or retain this place in your affections, for we have injured none of you," &c.—as the false teachers had. Corrupted.] Wasted no one's substance by extorting gifts.' Bl.

(3.) 'I say not this to hint my reproach of illiberality to me; but I speak merely to show my claim to a large place in your affections (as ye have in mine); for, as I have said before, &c.' Bl. Die and live, &c.] This is thought a proverbial expression, and similar are quoted from Ath. and Hor.: perhaps Paul had in mind the fraternization oath of the Grecian 'sacred hand,' imitated by individuals, still, in modern Greece, who solemnly swear, to share with and to stand by each other, money for money, blood for blood, life for life. The custom may have been as ancient as the apostle's time. Ed.

(4.) "'Out of the love I bear to you (and which is, I trust, in some degree, mutual), I venture to use this freedom of speech, not from my ill opinion of you, for great is my boasting [exultation] concerning you, but rather for your good, and spiritual improvement.'" The words following seem added by way of climax; q. d. not only do I boast of you to others, but your spiritual progress gives me the greatest private comfort in all my afflictions.' Bl. Exceeding.] The fervency of the apostle's temperament, here induces him to make a word of his own, says Doddr., which Bloomf. calls 'very rare, occurring only in Paul.' Ed.

V. 7. 'He draws no invidious distinctions between them, [separately addressing the ill and well affected,] but makes both the eucommiums and the censures common, and in medio, leaving it to the conscience of each to appropriate to himself what belonged to him.' THEOPH.

V. 8. The inspiration of the Holy Spirit did not supersede the exercise of the understanding and faculties, in the sacred writers; and the apostle's excess of concern, about the consequences of his former epistle, seems to have rendered his mind greatly disquieted, as to some expressions in it, lest they should counteract his grand design. If, indeed, he actually 'repented' of having written so sharply, as well as had felt an after carefulness about it, as the word implies; this must not be ascribed to the things written, as if they had not been divinely inspired; but to infirmity, as not being fully sanctified, or freed from a propensity to excess of anxiety and solicitude.—A physician, in full confidence that the case requires it, may give a powerful remedy to a sick friend; and yet his anxiety about the event, arising from concurring circumstances, may induce him sometimes to wish he had not given it.—Some, however, render the passage, perhaps more accurately, 'Even if I had repented, I should not now repent.' Rom. 9:1—3. SCOTT.

(3.) 'Wherefore, if I ever did pain your feelings in the epistle (which I wrote to you) I do not (now) repent; though I did repent (during the time after I had sent it off, and before I saw Titus). On the sense of these words it is not necessary to refine minutely or press. For, after making due allowance for the laxity of popular phraseology, it cannot be inferred, because the apostle felt regret, that he had written with undue, or unjust severity. The warm-hearted kindness of his disposition might generate that feeling, though, strictly speaking, it were unwarranted. When, however, he found the good his well-meant rebukes had done, he would abandon all feelings of regret.' Bl. Repent.] 'It may also signify a kind of misgiving of heart, natural, when the reproof, however necessary, is given to a person one tenderly loves, where the event is dubious, as in this instance it might be.' DODDR.

V. 9—11. Some are of opinion, that the word, rendered 'not to be repented of,' should be referred to 'salvation,' rather than to 'repentance;' in the same sense as it is applied to 'the gifts and calling of God,' in the only place, where the same word occurs in the N. T., signifying its unchangeableness; or denoting a salvation, which will infinitely more than compensate all that may be endured in attaining it; and the construction, in the original, seems to favor this opinion.—'The sorrow of the world,' is the certain way to desperation, unless 'God prevent it; as it

12 Wherefore, though I wrote unto you, I did it not for his cause that had done the wrong, nor for his cause that suffered wrong, but that our care for <sup>u</sup> you in the sight of God might appear unto you.

13 Therefore we were comforted in your comfort: yea, and exceedingly the more joyed we for the joy of Titus, because his spirit was refreshed <sup>v</sup> by you all.

14 For if I have boasted any thing to him of you, I am not ashamed; but as we spake all things to you in truth, even so our boasting, which I made before Titus, is found a truth.

15 And his <sup>w</sup> inward affection is more abundant toward you, whilst he remembereth the obedience of you all, how with <sup>x</sup> fear and trembling ye received him.

16 I rejoice, therefore, that I have confidence in you <sup>y</sup> in all things.

after a godly manner, or according to God, (as it is in the original,) according to the will of God, tending to his glory, and wrought by his Spirit, a godly sorrow, because a sorrow for sin, as an offence against God. This sorrow produces repentance and reformation, and will end in salvation; but worldly sorrow worketh death; sorrow of worldly men for worldly things, and such a sorrow even for sin as Judas had, will have fatal consequences. Repentance will be attended with salvation. Therefore, True penitents will never repent that they have repented, nor of anything that was conducive thereto. Further, humiliation and godly sorrow are previously necessary in order to repentance, and both are from God, the Giver of all grace.

(2.) The happy fruits and consequences of true repentance are mentioned, v. 11. The Corinthians made it evident their sorrow was a godly sorrow, and such as wrought repentance, because it wrought in them great carefulness about their souls, to avoid sin and please God; also a clearing of themselves, by endeavors to put away the accursed thing, and so free themselves from the just imputation of approving the evil that had been done. It wrought indignation at sin, at themselves, the tempter and his instruments; it wrought fear, an awful fear of God, a cautious fear of sin, and a jealous fear of themselves. It wrought vehement desire after a thorough reformation, and reconciliation with God, nay, zeal, a mixture of love and anger, a zeal for duty and against sin. It wrought, lastly, revenge against sin and their own folly, by endeavors to make all due satisfaction for injuries done thereby. And thus in all things had they approved themselves to be clear in that matter. Not that they were innocent, but penitent, and therefore clear of guilt before God, who would pardon and not punish them; and they ought no longer to be reproved, much less reproached, by men, for what they had truly repented of.

V. 12—16. In these vs. he endeavors to comfort the Corinthians, on whom his admonitions had had so good effect.

1. He had a good design in his former epistle, which might be thought severe, v. 12. It was not chiefly for his cause that did the wrong, not only for his benefit, much less merely that he should be punished; nor yet was it only for his cause that suffered wrong, namely, the injured father, and that he might have what satisfaction could be given him; but it was also to manifest his great and sincere concern and care for them, the whole church, lest that should suffer by letting such a crime, and the scandal thereof, remain among them without due remark and sensibility.

2. He acquaints them with the joy of Titus as well as of himself, on account of their repentance and good behavior, v. 13. and as Titus was comforted while he was with them, so when he remembered his reception among them, expressing their obedience to the apostolical directions, and their fear and trembling at the reproofs given them, the thoughts of these things inflamed and increased his affections to them, v. 15. Great comfort and joy follow on godly sorrow; here Paul was glad, and Titus glad, and the Corinthians were comforted; and the penitent ought to be comforted; and well may PRACT. OBS. The promises of God should excite and direct us in 'following after holiness.' His grace alone can efficaciously 'purify' us; but it is our duty earnestly to use the means which He has appointed; and, depending on that grace, to search out and cleanse away all 'filthiness of the flesh and spirit,' as abhorred by God and all his people.—If the ambassadors or messengers of Christ would be received in that character [of true piety]; they must be careful 'to wrong no man, to corrupt no man, to defraud no man;' or in any way to manifest a propensity to covetousness; Is. 56:9—12. Jer. 6:13—15. 1 Tim. 3:3. 1 Pet. 5:1—4. and they who reject those ministers of Christ, whose conduct and doctrine are thus uncorrupt, will greatly offend Him that sent them. But we ought not to expect much 'rest to our flesh,' in this evil world; and if inward 'fears' concur with outward opposition, to distress us; we only taste that cup, of which far wiser and better men have drunk more abundantly.—We cannot sufficiently admire the compassion and condescension of our God, in revealing Himself as 'the Comforter of those that are cast down.' He, however, generally works by second causes and instruments; the converse of some pious friend; or a good account of those about whom we are anxious; or the affection of such as we feared were alienated, are often sources of relief and consolation, in which the kindness of the Lord should be acknowledged with much thankfulness.—Through anxiety about the event of his labors, even the faithful minister may be tempted to repent of his best intended and most scriptural endeavors to do good. Thus a man may be much disquieted for having done his duty, and afraid of doing it on another occasion; and this should be carefully watched against with humble, persevering prayer.

Indeed, we should be reluctant to cause sorrow; but we should rejoice in bringing men to that 'godly sorrow, which worketh repentance;' as their grief will be transient, and the benefit eternal.—The loss of an earthly friend, the displeasure of a powerful superior, or other secular misfortunes, excite men's sorrow, and they think they have cause to mourn; how then should they be grieved for having offended their Creator, dishonored his name, incurred his frown, and deserved eternal misery! The objects of worldly sorrow are trivial; its exercise is commonly unavailing; and it tends to death in diverse and most awful ways; we should therefore be peculiarly careful not to indulge it. Unless sin be mourned over [and forsaken], as the cause of men's sufferings, and God be regarded, as the righteous and merciful Author of them; their sorrow under afflictions and calamities leads to increasing enmity, to distraction, despair, and blasphemy. Rev. 16:8—11. We should, therefore, endeavor to turn all our mourning into a religious channel, that we may 'sorrow after a godly sort.' But even sorrow about sin, and our eternal concerns, will be of no use to us, unless it 'worketh repentance;' and even repentance itself may be counterfeited or spurious, and so not be 'unto salvation.' Of all deceptions this is most to be feared; as immense multitudes are quieted without true repentance, by a groundless notion that they have repented, or do repent. But deep humiliation before God, hatred and dread of all sin, attended by faith in the righteousness, atonement, and intercession of Christ, a new heart and a new life, constitute 'repentance unto salvation never to be repented of.' May the Lord bestow it on every one of us! [and proceed to bestow the precious gift on all the millions of our fallen race.] SCOTT.

appears from the horrid examples of Cain, Saul, Ahithophel, and Judas; but the written tears of David give the clearest example of the other kind of sorrow.' Beza.—As v. 11. relates to the conduct of a Christian society in particular circumstances, and probably some of the clauses to one part and some to another of this society; so the several particulars adduced can be applied, only by accommodation, to the repentance of an individual. SCOTT.

(9.) Now, &c.] 'A sentiment more delicate than this is not (as far as I remember) to be found in the whole range of classical literature. Chrys. observes, that Paul ascribes the making sorry to the epistle, yet does not expressly say, "but I rejoiced that it benefited you;" though that was true; but gives such a delicate turn to the expression, as rather ascribes it to their own good feeling. This remark, indeed, is in the spirit of true criticism, such as it was professed in the school of Longinus, and the other mighty Aristarchi of ancient times.' BLOOMF.

(11.) 'It is a strange error to suppose these vs. to contain [the] seven distinct marks of true repentance, to be found in every sincere penitent, whereas, (as Doddg. obs.) these are not characters of the temper of each, but of different persons, according to the part they respectively acted in the affair in question. And so Mackn. Clear.] Whitby, after Scater, remarks, that true repentance clears us from the guilt, not only in the sight of God, but man; so that it is both uncharitable and unchristian to stigmatize or reproach any man for the sin which we know or believe he hath truly repented of.' V. 13—16. There was great address in this part of the epistle; and his kind acceptance of what had been done, and the confidence which he expressed in the church, were in general well suited to excite them to a more entire reformation; to withstand the party formed against him; to deliver them from the fascinations of the false teachers; to re-establish the apostle's authority; and to prepare the way for his subsequent exhortations, warnings, expostulations, and direct accusations and denunciations of the principal offenders, and of all who continued impenitent. For they implied, that not the church, as a society, but merely a few corrupt intruders were the subjects of these severe addresses. SCOTT.

(13.) 'His own joy was much increased by the evident satisfaction which Titus felt, at his reception among them. The expressions have great energy, as well as simplicity and beauty.' BLOOMF.

(16.) "'I rejoice that, from the experience I have had of you, I may in everything feel confidence in your ready obedience to all my admonitions or suggestions.'" This forms a very easy and natural transition to the subject he now enters upon, and which forms the second part of the epistle, viz. the contributions.' Bl. 'These he urges, because, (1) The Macedonians had afforded them liberally, 8:1—3. (2) The Corinthians would thus testify their firm faith, 7, 8. (3) They would thus imitate Christ, 9. (4) They had before been liberal, 10. (5) They will thus confirm the authority of the apostle in what he had boasted of them, 9:3—5. (6) The divine blessing would compensate all they bestow, 6—11. (7) Because others would on that account praise God, and intercede with Him in their behalf, v. 12—14.' SCHOETTG. [339]

CHAP. VIII.

MOREOVER, brethren, we do you to wit of the grace of God bestowed on the churches of Macedonia;

<sup>4</sup> Praying us with much intreaty that we would receive the gift, and take upon us the fellowship <sup>d</sup> of the ministering to the saints.

<sup>5</sup> And this they did, not as we hoped, but first gave their own selves to the Lord, and unto us by the will of God.

<sup>6</sup> Insomuch that we desired Titus, that as he had begun, so he would also finish in you the same <sup>e</sup> grace also.

<sup>7</sup> Therefore, as ye abound <sup>f</sup> in every thing, in faith, and utterance, and knowledge, and in all diligence, and in your love to us, see that ye abound in this grace also.

all this joy be on earth, when there is joy in heaven over one sinner that repenteth.

<sup>3</sup> He concludes this whole matter with expressing his entire confidence in them, v. 14. for he was not disappointed in his expectation concerning them, which he signified to Titus; and he could now, with great joy, declare what confidence he still had in them as to their good behavior, in all things, for the time to come. It is a great comfort and joy to a faithful minister, to have to do with a people in whom he can confide, and who, he has reason to hope, will comply with everything he proposes to them, that is for the glory of God, the credit of the Gospel, and their advantage.

NOTES. CHAP. VIII. V. 1—5. The mention the apostle had made of his confidence in the Corinthians, gave him an occasion of again introducing the subject of the collection he was making, for the Christians in Judea, which takes up this and the following ch. Rom. 15:22—29 1 Cor. 16:1, 2. With great delicacy and propriety, he brought this forward, by 'informing' them, as an article of interesting intelligence, concerning the admirable conduct of the churches in Macedonia. The word rendered grace, is no doubt sometimes tr. gift; but to interpret 'the grace of God towards the churches, &c.' to signify the large subscription for the poor Christians in Judea, as some learned men do, is wholly unprecedented; and the obvious meaning, viz. that their bounty to their poor brethren, was the effect of the abundant grace of God conferred on them, agrees far better with the simple and reasonable language of Scripture on these subjects.

SCOTT. (1.) 'I have to announce to you, brethren, &c. Grace of God.] The cause is put for the effect, says Grot., in order to show, that all that is done by Christians, is owing solely to the goodness of God, who hath remitted so many sins, hath revealed his will so openly, hath, of his own good pleasure, called to Him those that were alienated, and hath confirmed this call by so many miracles. These are the causes why so much more is said of grace in the New, than in the O. T. So Wolf, Doddr., Locke, Hardy, and perhaps rightly. The name denoting these aims may, however, be regarded as a compound appellative; q. d. God's gift, i. e. something given for God's sake. And this seems confirmed by the prep. in, [tr. on] following. The aims were so called, as Theoph. suggests, out of delicacy.

BLOOMF. (2.) Poverty.] 'The Gr. properly signifies beggary, and we also use that term, as the Gr. is here used, comparatively. Probably, the converts were persons chiefly of the lower orders, and the poorer classes.

CHAP. VIII. In this and the following ch. Paul is exhorting and directing the Corinthians about a particular work of charity, — to relieve the necessities of the poor saints at Jerusalem and in Judea. Rom. 15:26. The Christians at Jerusalem, through war, famine, and persecution, were grown poor, many of them fallen into decay, and perhaps most of them were but poor when they first embraced Christianity. Now Paul, though the apostle of the Gentiles, had a tender regard, and kind concern, for those among the Jews who were converted to the Christian faith; and though many of them had not so much affection to the Gentile converts as they ought to have, yet he would have the Gentiles kind to them, and stirred them up to contribute liberally for their relief. On this subject he is very large and copious, and writes very affectingly.

V. 1—6. The apostle takes occasion from the good example of the churches of Macedonia, i. e. of Philippi, Thessalonica, Berea, and others of Macedonia, to exhort the Corinthians, and the Christians in Achaia, to the good work of charity. And,

1. He acquaints them with their great liberality, called the grace of God bestowed on the churches, v. 1. Some tr. the gift of God given in or by the churches. He certainly means the charitable gifts of these churches, called the grace or gifts of God, either because very large, or rather because their charity to the poor saints did proceed from God as the Author, and was accompanied with true love to God, which also was manifested this way.

2. He commends the charity of the Macedonians, and sets it forth with good advantage. (1.) In but a low condition, and themselves in distress, yet they contributed to the relief of others, v. 2. It was a time of great affliction with them, as may be seen, Acts 16. and 17. (2.) They gave very largely, with the riches of liberality, v. 2. i. e. as liberally as if they had been rich; they made a large contribution, all things considered; it was according to, yea, beyond their power, v. 3. as much, if not more than could well be expected from them. (3.) They were very ready and forward to this good work, willing of themselves, v. 3. and so far from needing Paul should press them with arguments, that they prayed him with much entreaty to receive the gift, v. 4. It seems Paul was backward to undertake this trust, he would give himself to the Word and prayer; or, it may be, he was apprehensive how his enemies might take a handle against him on account of so large a sum deposited in his hands, to suspect or accense him of indiscretion and partiality in the distribution, if not of some injustice. Ministers should be cautious, especially in money-matters, not to give occasion to them who seek occasion to speak reproachfully! (4.) Their charity was founded in true piety, and this was its great commendation; they performed this good work in a right method; first they gave themselves to the Lord, and then gave unto us their contributions, by the will of God, v. 5. i. e. according as it was the will of God they should do, or to be disposed of as the will of God should be, and for his glory. They solemnly, jointly, and unanimously, made a fresh surrender of themselves, and all they had, unto the Lord Jesus Christ. They had done this before, and now do it again on this occasion; sanctifying their contributions to do God honor, by first giving themselves to the Lord. We cannot bestow ourselves better; all we give or bestow for charitable uses, will not be accepted, or turn to our advantage, unless we first give ourselves to the Lord.

He further acquaints them, that Titus was desired to go and make a collection among them, v. 6. and Titus, he knew, would be acceptable. Beside, Titus had already begun this work among them, therefore he was desired to finish it. It is wisdom, to use proper instruments in a work we desire to do well; and the work of charity will succeed the best, when the most proper [accustomed] persons are employed to ask for it, and dispose of it.

V. 7—15. In these vs. the apostle uses several cogent arguments to stir up to this good work of charity.

1. He urges the consideration of their eminence in other gifts and graces, v. 7. Great address and much holy art are here used by the apostle, when he would persuade the Corinthians to this good thing. He commends them for other good things that were found in them. Observe, here, what it was the Corinthians abounded in. Faith, mentioned first, as the root, Heb. 11:6. next, utterance, which is an excellent gift, and redounds much to the glory of God, and the good of the church, particularly when united, as here, with abundance of knowledge. They abounded also in all diligence. Often, those who have great knowledge and ready utterance are not the most diligent; but these Corinthians were diligent to do, as well as know, and talk well. And further, they had abundant love to their ministers; and were not like too many, who, having gifts of their own, are but too apt to slight their ministers, and neglect them. Now to all these good things the apostle desires them to add this grace also; to abound in charity to the poor; that, where so much good was found, there should be found yet more good.

Before proceeding to another argument, he takes care to prevent any misapprehensions of his design to impose on them, or to bind heavy burdens on them by his authority; and tells them, v. 8. he did not

Grot. thinks they had become poor by confiscation, and by the desertion of the rich converts. But this is little more than mere speculation. Their deep poverty redounded to, tended to, ended in, their rich liberality. Ros. expl., their liberality appeared much greater, than could be expected from persons so poor.

BLOOMF. (3.) 'The Gr. words tr. "we would receive," are omitted in very many excellent MSS., almost all the versions, all the Gr. comtrs., and many fathers, and have been rejected by the best critics.' Bl., who tr. 'They asked of us to do them the favor of taking part in the trouble of conveying this collection,' &c. En.

(5.) 'This v. is very energetic, and somewhat hyperbolic. The sense seems to be: "They not only gave more than we expected, for the use of the poor, but they gave and devoted themselves first to the Lord, to do his will in every good work, and then to us, to fulfil all our wishes, and observe our admonitions." V. 6. The result of this unexpected success with the Macedonians was, that (fearing lest you should be outstripped by the Macedonians) we desired Titus, &c. V. 7. Now then, as ye,' &c. Bloomf.

V. 6—9. If the poor and persecuted Macedonians had exceeded expectation 'in the riches of their liberality,' the prosperous and affluent Christians at Corinth would doubtless fully answer the apostle's hopes of them. When Titus had before been there, he had begun this good work among them, and Paul had therefore desired him to go again and complete it.—By 'the same grace also' most expositors understand the beneficence itself; and, indeed, the word may signify the free gift of man, as well as that of God; yet it seems more consonant to the apostle's language, to explain it of the gracious influence of the Holy Spirit on their hearts, [inducing them to act out their Christian principles in giving.] than of the gift itself, or their act of grace towards their brethren.

9 For ye know the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, that, though he was <sup>h</sup> rich, yet for your sakes he became <sup>i</sup> poor, that ye through his poverty might be <sup>j</sup> rich.

10 And herein I give my advice : for this is expedient for you, who have begun before, not only to do, but also to be <sup>k</sup> forward a year ago.

11 Now therefore perform <sup>l</sup> the doing of it ; that as there was a readiness to will, so there may be a performance also out of that which ye have.

12 For if <sup>m</sup> there be first a willing mind, it is accepted according to that a man hath, and not according to that he hath not.

13 For I mean not that other men be eased, and you burdened :

14 But by an equality, that now at this time your abundance may be a supply for their want, that their abundance also may be a supply for your want, that there may be equality :

15 As it is written, <sup>n</sup> He that had gathered much had nothing over ; and he that had gathered little had no lack.

16 But thanks be to God, which put the same earnest care into the heart of Titus for you.

17 For indeed he accepted the <sup>o</sup> exhortation ; but being more forward, of his own accord he went unto you.

18 And we have sent with him the <sup>p</sup> brother, whose praise is in the gospel throughout all the churches ;

19 And not that only, but who was also chosen <sup>q</sup> of the churches to travel with us with this <sup>r</sup> grace, which is administered by us to <sup>s</sup> the glory of the same Lord, and declaration of your ready mind :

speak by commandment, or in a way of authority ; I give my advice, v. 10. He took occasion, from the forwardness of others, to propose what would be expedient for them, and would prove the sincerity of their love, or be the genuine effect and evidence thereof. A great difference should be made between plain and positive duty, and the improvement of a present opportunity of doing or getting good. Many a thing which is good for us to do, yet cannot be said to be, by express and indispensable commandment, our duty at this or that time.

2. Another argument is taken from the consideration of the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, v. 9. The best arguments for Christian duties are those that are taken from the love of Christ, that constraineth us. The example of the churches of Macedonia was such as the Corinthians should imitate ; but the example of our Lord Jesus Christ should have much greater influence. This is a good reason why we should be charitable to the poor out of what we have, because we ourselves live on the charity of the Lord Jesus Christ.

3. Another argument from their good purposes, and their forwardness to begin this good work. (1.) It was expedient for them to perform what they purposed, and finish what they had begun, v. 10, 11. What else did their good purposes and good beginnings signify ? Good purposes, indeed, are good things ; they are like buds and blossoms, pleasant to behold, and give hopes of good fruit ; but they are lost, and signify nothing, without performances. So good beginnings are amiable ; but we shall lose the benefit, unless there be perseverance, and we bring forth fruit to perfection. Seeing therefore the Corinthians had showed a readiness to will, he would have them be careful also in the performance, according to their ability. For, (2.) This would be acceptable to God. This willing mind is accepted, v. 12. when accompanied with sincere endeavors, according to our ability. But note, here, this Scripture will by no means justify those, who think good meanings, or good purposes, and the profession of a willing mind, are sufficient to save them. It is accepted, indeed, where there is a performance as far as we are able, and when Providence hinders the performance, as in David's case, concerning building a house for the Lord, 2 S. 7. [but not further.]

4. Another argument is taken from the discrimination Divine Providence makes, in the distribution of the things of this world, and the mutability of human affairs, v. 13—15. The force of the arguing seems to be this ; Providence gives to some more of the good things of this world, and to some less, and that with this design ; that those who have a greater abundance, might supply them who are in want ; that there might be room for charity, [and thus the better nature of each be called out.] And each may in turn need. It is the will of God, by our mutual supplying one another, that there should be some sort of equality ; not an absolute equality, indeed, or such a levelling [downwards] as would destroy property, for in such a case there could be no exercise of charity. But as in works of charity there should be an equitable proportion observed, that the burden should not lie too heavy on some, while others are wholly eased, so all should think themselves concerned, to supply those who are in want. This is illustrated by the instance of gathering and distributing manna in the wilderness, concerning which—see Ex. 16. it was the duty of all to gather what they could ; which, when gathered, was put into some common receptacle for each family, whence the master of the family distributed to every one as he had occasion ; to some, more than they were able, through age and infirmity, to gather up ; to others, less than they gathered, because they did not need so much ; and thus, he that had gathered much, (more than he had occasion for,) had nothing over, when a communication was made to him that had gathered little, who by this method had no lack. Such is the condition of men in this world, that we mutually depend on one another, and should help one another ; those who have ever so much of this world, have no more than food and raiment ; and those who have but a little of this world, seldom want those ; nor, indeed, should those who have abundance suffer others to want, but be ready to afford supply.

V. 16—24. The apostle commends the brethren who were sent to them to collect their charity ; and, as it were, gives them letters credential, that, if any should be inquisitive or suspicious concerning them, v. 23. it might be known who they were, and how safely they might be trusted.

1. He commends Titus, and another brother, sent with Titus, who, it is generally thought, was Luke. He is commended, as a man whose ministerial services were well known, v. 18. and approved ; one chosen of the churches, v. 19. and joined with the apostle in his ministration. This was done, most likely, at the motion and request of Paul himself ; for this reason, that no man might blame him in that abundance which was ministered by him, v. 20. So cautious was he not to give occasion to any to accuse him of injustice or partiality in this affair, v. 21. Note, all Christians ought to act so prudently as to prevent, as far as possible, all unjust suspicions, and all occasions of scandalous imputations. We live in a cen-

1—5. 1 Cor. 15:3—11. Eph. 3:8. In the judgment of the apostle, Jesus was rich before He was poor ; and it was voluntarily and graciously that He became poor for our sakes, &c. But indeed as Man He was born and educated in poverty, He was poor all his life, and 'had not where to lay his head,' and only became rich after his death and resurrection ; therefore if He was no more than man, He certainly was poor before He was rich, not rich before He was poor. The sincerity.] Phil. 4:3. 1 Tim. 1:2. Tit. 1:4. 'Genuineness.' Some copies read, 'our love ;' but it was the genuineness of the love professed by the Corinthians, which was made trial of. 1 Pet. 1:6, 7.

(9.) 'The interpretation, that [Christ] was rich in power and in the Holy Ghost, has no force at all ; this might be said of the apostles as well as of Christ ; neither would there be, in this case, any remarkable contrast between rich and poor, nor anything in the circumstance peculiar to Christ ; since it was usual, at that time, for all who were rich in miraculous endowments, to lead a life of poverty. The context furnishes no argument in favor of such an hypothesis : Christ became poor, that the Corinthians might become rich. Now this is addressed to the converts at large, for all were concerned in the apostle's exhortation. In what sense, then, were all the disciples of Christ to be made rich ? not merely in spiritual gifts, but also in the eternal "recompense of reward ;" rich in glory, rich in heaven. It is consistent, therefore, to interpret "rich," when applied to Christ, in a similar manner, viz. of the "glory He had with the Father before the world was." Jn. 17:5.] Stade. Bl.

V. 10. To be forward.] 'The Gr. is difficult, from its Heb. or idiomatic phraseology, and must be understood of free will and zeal, (as v. 11.) "to do" being repeated after it. And so all the ancient and some modern contrs.]

V. 13, 14. 'Rather, "my meaning is not, that they should be relieved by you from distress, so as to occasion distress to yourselves, but that you should give what you can spare. That, at the present time, your abundance may serve for the supply of their want, so that (at another time) their abundance may be for the supply of your want ; that there may be an equal reciprocity, of giving and receiving, or of good offices, between you." By not attending to the context and to the real sense of isotes, [tr. equality,] certain contrs. have assigned to it senses most wild, (as if an equalization of property were meant to be inculcated,) contrary to the context of the apostle, and at variance with the course of things, which must ever subsist in the world. What Paul says, is meant of Judea and Corinth, and not to be extended to the case of individuals, except with careful accommodation.'

V. 14. 'So far Christianity seems to require this equality, as that we should not suffer others to lack the necessaries of this present life, while we abound in them.' Whitby.—The Christians at Corinth had also been made partakers of the inestimable spiritual blessings of their Jewish brethren, and at their expense ; and it was equal or equitable, that they should impart to them, in return, of their carnal things. V. 15. 'As the manna gathered was from heaven, and the gift of God, and therefore to be equally distributed, so the riches which men "heap up" and "gather" are also the gift of God, and therefore to be communicated to those that are in need.'

V. 17. Went, (and v. 18.) have sent.] 'These past tenses are meant, with reference to the time when the Corinthians would read the letter he was about to send.'

V. 18—24. The brother who was sent with him is generally supposed to have been Luke, 'whose praise was in all the churches,' on account of the Gospel he had written, and for many zealous services in the cause ; yet this is on many accounts uncertain. (22) Our brother.] Some think Apollon is meant, but this is not probable, for he wanted no recommendations to the Christians at Corinth ; indeed curiosity rather than edifi-

22 And we have sent with them our brother, whom we have oftentimes proved diligent in many things, but now much more diligent, upon the great confidence which I have in you.

23 Whether any do inquire of Titus, he is my partner and fellow-helper concerning you : or our brethren be inquired of, they are the messengers of the churches, and the glory of Christ.

24 Wherefore shew ye to them, and before the churches, the proof of your love, and of our boasting on your behalf.

CHAP. IX.

1 He yieldeth the reason why, though he knew their forwardness, yet he sent Titus and his brethren beforehand. 6 And he proceedeth in stirring them up to a bountiful alms, as being but a kind of sowing of seed, 10 which shall return a great increase to them, 13 and occasion a great sacrifice of thanksgivings unto God.

FOR as touching the ministering to the saints, it is superfluous for me to write to you.

2 For I know the forwardness of your mind, for which I boast of you to them of Macedonia, that Achaia was ready a year ago ; and your zeal hath provoked very many.

PRACT. OBS. By ascribing all 'good works' to 'the grace of God,' we not only give the glory to Him whose due it is, but we also show men where their strength lies, and enable humble believers to read the Lord's special love to them, in the fruits of their love to Him and to his people. Lu. 7:44—50. 1 Jn. 4:19.—Abundant spiritual joy not only supports the soul under great trials of afflictions, but enlarges the heart, so that joyful Christians do more than could have been conceived in their power, and manifest a still more enlarged good-will.—Remarkable examples of piety and charity should be brought forward, in order to excite others to a holy emulation, especially when the inferiority in outward things, of those who exhibit them, renders it less likely that they should be noticed ; and such instances will commonly be found very efficacious to this end, among those who are partakers of divine grace. 'If there be first a willing mind, it is accepted,' is an universal rule ; the sinner's 'ready mind' to repent, to believe in Christ, to love and obey Him, and to do good to others for his sake, springs from divine grace ; and where this is first produced, the defective attempts of the believer to glorify God, will be accepted and graciously rewarded, though, in contion, is concerned in determining these questions.—It may here again be observed, that there is not the least reason to doubt, but that the messengers, entrusted with the contributions of the Christians for their Jewish brethren, were chosen by the suffrage of the churches ; how then is it, that so little satisfactory scriptural proof can be adduced, that the spiritual pastors were elected in the same manner ? Acts 6:2—6. 14:21—23. 1 Cor. 16:3, 4. 'It would have been a most ready calumny against Paul, to have said, that he greatly desired the care of these contributions, that he might sacrilegiously convert the consecrated money to his own use, had he not by every mean guarded against it. But who, during these thousand years, and more, has followed this truly apostolical example ?' Beza. (17) Of his own accord. 'Here we see the sweet harmony there is betwixt the grace of God, and our persuasion and free will.—Titus was moved to this work, by Paul's exhortation, and was also "willing of his own accord," and yet "God," saith the apostle, "put this earnest care into his heart." ' Whitby. 'It is God who worketh in us both to will and to do.' Concerning free will, in this sense, we have no controversy.—All men, however their wills are enslaved by their lusts, have free agency. This may hint to us, that the disbursements of charitable societies and committees should be explained to the public, or brotherhood, as minutely as is practicable, to avoid scandal ; since interested motives are most readily ascribed to such, by the mass, whether as judging from their own selfishness, or as thinking the suspicion indicates shrewdness, and knowledge of the world. And so the accusation is always popular. ED.

(23.) 'If it is necessary to speak of Titus &c. So the ancients supply. 5 Therefore I thought it necessary to exhort the brethren, that they would go before unto you, and make up beforehand your bounty, whereof ye had notice before, that the same might be ready, as a matter of bounty, and not as of covetousness.

2. He commends also another brother joined with the two former, thought to be Apollos. Whoever he was, he had approved himself diligent in many things,—and therefore was fit to be employed in this affair, v. 22.

3. He concludes this point with a general good character of them all, v. 23. as fellow-laborers with him for their welfare ; as the messengers of the churches ; as the glory of Christ, who were to Him for a name and a praise, who brought glory to Christ as instruments, and had obtained honor from Christ to be counted faithful, and employed in his service.

strict justice, according to the perfect and holy law, they merit condemnation.—'The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ' was not declared in kind words only ; and they, who truly know and experience the happy effects of his grace, will show their love to Him and his people, by good works, and not merely by a cheap profession ; though a clear character, as well as a pure conscience, is necessary to extensive usefulness. But alas ! we may easily estimate the small degree, in which most of us 'know the grace of Christ,' by considering how small a proportion of our superfluities we retrench, and how little we deny ourselves, submit willingly to privations, forego the prospect of wealth, endure inconveniences, and stoop to men of low estate, from love to his name. Doubtless, this is the proper standard of our spiritual knowledge of Christ. In proportion to our views of his glory, we shall bear his image ; and if this change were more fully effected, we should embrace poverty, endure hardship, and even 'lay down our lives' for the good of his people, when properly called to it, and at last, we should deem all this as nothing, when compared with our obligations to his infinite love. ED.

NOTES. CHAP. IX. V. 1—5. Beza explains the 'ministering to the saints,' not of the money contributed, but of the office and duty of those persons, who were chosen to take charge of it, and the care of the church at Corinth in selecting them ; the context, however, does not seem to favor this interpretation, at least as exclusive.—The whole transaction, from the first thought and proposal of thus relieving the poor Christians in Judea, to the completion of the design, in the distribution of the money among them, by the apostles and elders at Jerusalem, may be included in this general term. 12—15. 8:1—5.—'The apostle calls that "covetousness," which is done sordidly, and as extorted from a covetous person.' Beza.—'To give alms out of shame, or to satisfy the importunity of others, rather than out of love and good-will, is a symptom of a covetous temper.' Whitby. The word rendered 'bounty,' signifies a blessing ; which may either intimate, that it should be given as an expression of gratitude to God, and as an act of praise and thanksgiving to Him ; or that it should spring from love, and a disposition to bless and do good to their brethren. SCOTT.

(2.) Achaia.] Here put for Greece, of which Corinth was then the capital, and this use of the word, says BL., is fully justified. ED.

(5.) Bounty.] Eulogia : [lit. benediction, thanks :] this may be numbered with the euphemisms which the delicacy of the apostle so often employs, especially in terms denoting alms, (or what we call charity,) for which he substitutes names which spare the feelings of the receiver, and remind the giver that he is exercising a duty toward God. We may comp. this use of eulogia, in 1 Cor. 10:16. and here render it a thanksgiving, a gift bestowed on man in grateful thanks to God for his goodness. [And we may remark, in passing, how much oftener the apostle exhorts to good deeds, from motives of love and gratitude to God, as v. 14. than Christians should consult the reputation of their profession, and endeavor to adorn the doctrine of God our Savior.

V. 6-15. I. Proper directions about the right and acceptable manner of bestowing charity; and it is of great concernment, that we do what is required, so as is commanded.

1. It should be bountifully; and he offers to their consideration, that the harvest usually is proportionable to what is sowed, v. 6.

2. It should be deliberately, v. 7. Works of charity, like other good works, should be done with thought and design, with purpose of heart, not as by accident, or impertunity of others, and to be repented of afterward. Due deliberation, as to our own circumstances, and those of them we are about to relieve, will be very helpful to direct us how liberal we should be in our contributions for charitable uses.

3. It should be freely, be it more or less; not grudgingly, or of necessity, but cheerfully, v. 7. Persons sometimes will give merely to satisfy the importunity of those who ask their charity, and what they give is in a manner squeezed or forced from them, and this unwillingness spoils all they do. We ought to give more freely than the modesty of some necessitous persons will allow them to ask: we should not only deal out bread, but draw out our souls to the hungry, Is. 58:10. We should give liberally, with an open hand, and cheerfully, with an open countenance; being glad we have ability, and an opportunity, to be charitable.

II. Good encouragement to do thus.

1. They themselves would be no losers, by what they gave in charity. Many, who are ready to think they may want what they give away, should consider that what is given to the poor, in a right manner, is far from being lost; for it will spring up, and bear fruit: the sower shall receive it again with increase, v. 6. For,

(1.) God loveth a cheerful giver, v. 7. and what may not they hope to receive, who are the objects of the divine love? May not such a one be sure, that he shall some way or other be a gainer? Nay, are not the love and favor of God better than all other things, better than life itself?

(2.) God is able to make our charity redound to our advantage, v. 8. [It cultivates the most gracious and enduring affections in us.] We have no reason to distrust the goodness of God, and, surely, none to question his power; He is able to make all grace [which grows with exercise] abound towards us, and in us; to give a large increase of spiritual and temporal good things. He can make us to have a sufficiency in all things; to be content with what we have; to make up what we give; to make us able to give yet more; as it is written, Ps. 112:9. of the charitable man, He hath dispersed abroad. He hath given to the poor. His righteousness, i. e. his almsgiving, endureth for ever. The honor of it is lasting, the reward of it eternal, and he is still able to live comfortably himself, and to give liberally to others.

(3.) The apostle puts up a prayer to God in their behalf, that they might be gainers, and not losers, v. 10, 11. to that God who giveth such an increase of the fruits of the earth, that we have not only bread sufficient to eat for one year, but enough to sow again for a future supply; or to God, who giveth us not only a competency for ourselves, but that also wherewith we may supply the wants of others, and so should be as seed to be sown. Works of charity, so far from impoverishing, are the proper means truly to enrich us, or make us truly rich.

2. The poor distressed saints would be gainers, and they no losers; for this service would supply their wants, v. 12.

3. This would redound to the praise and glory of God. Many thanksgivings would be given to God on this account, by the apostle, and by them who were employed in this ministration, v. 11. These would bless God, who made them happy instruments in so good a work, and successful in it: others, also, would be thankful; the poor, who were supplied in their wants; and all who wished well to the Gospel would glorify God for this experiment, or proof, of subjection to the Gospel of Christ, and true love to all men, v. 13.

from any more immediately selfish motive, as future rewards, or reciprocity of the same benefits, at a time of our own need, as 2:14, &c. Comp. Col. 3:23.] The clause, with eulogia immediately after, I would render: "so that it may be ready (as it ought to be), being thus (as it is) a thanksgiving, and not as it were a parsimony, niggardliness, or a niggardly gift, or as something wrung from any one, as no such gift ought to be." Niggardliness is the daughter of avarice."

V. 6-7. God, in his providence, often frowns on the undertakings of him who gives sparingly, and by concurring causes keeps him poor; the evidence of his conversion must thus be rendered proportionably dubious; if he be a real Christian, his consolations will be scanty, according to his penurious conduct towards his brethren; and his final recompense will be proportioned to the small measure of his present fruitfulness. — Two things are excluded by the apostle, namely, grief and necessity, (Gr.) when, for instance, any person gives indeed, but with a grudging and illiberal mind, or even unwillingly, because he would not be evil spoken of among others; else he would not give at all. Beza. S.

(6.) Paul seems to answer some such suggestion as, "Well, then, as the gift is to be voluntary, and only from our superfluity, we may give sparingly;" this the apostle denies. Soueth.] Among the Arabs, also, spargere, [to scatter, as in sowing,] in the sense of, to distribute copiously, is used of alms and benefits; [notes, v. 9. and Ps. 145:16.] Bl.

V. 9. "Thus the saying of Scripture will be made good, He hath dispersed, expended for, given to the poor: skorpizō properly signifies to scatter, as in sowing; for the same metaphor seems employed at v. 17. Or rather, as in the Psalm (112:9.) he quotes, there may be an allusion to the oriental custom of scattering money among an assembled multitude of paupers, or others. Prov. 11:24. Righteousness.] The best contrs. are agreed, that it signifies beneficium, (as often in the O. T. and in Mat. 6:1. &c.) Remaineth.] I. e. in its fruits or consequences for ever, i. e. both in this world, from the blessing of Him that was ready to perish, a blessing attendant both on the giver, and his posterity [and that good-will of others which cheerfully helps, nor desires to thwart, his schemes, nor envies his success]; and in the next world, in the rewards of heaven. Bl. Others, as Doddr. and Ros., (preferably, says Bl.) take the meaning to be, (by a sort of oxymoron,) that 'the sums so distributed will, as it were, remain with him perpetually, inasmuch as, by the blessing of God, he shall never want wherewithal to supply future liberality.' At least, the results of the exercise of benevolence and love to God will be, habits and exercises of those best feelings which will make the benevolent Christian happier now and always. Ep.

V. 10. May be thus lit. tr.: 'May He who supplieth seed to the sower, and bread for food, supply and multiply your seed, and increase the productions of your righteousness.' The sense is thus rendered more obvious, but it is not materially altered. — The word rendered 'seed sown,' more properly signifies 'seed for sowing,' i. e. enabling those spoken of to sow plentifully for a future harvest, from the increase of that which they had sown before. Scott.

(10.) 'The sentence is couched in the form of a pious wish, but it seems to partake of the predictive as well as the optative. The predictive may be engrafted on the optative; but not the contrary.' Bl. He that, &c.] 'A beautiful periphrasis of God, i. e. the good Being (for so the word God means), and taken, as Theoph. obs., from Is. 55:10. Multiply, &c.] To wish the increase of beneficence in the charitable, is equivalent to wish them an increase of the means, since their benevolent principles [and indulged habits of benevolent feeling and action] will always impel them [more and more strongly] to give in proportion to those means.' BLOOMF.

V. 11. To all bountifulness.] I. e. that ye may have the means of exercising the largest and most freehearted liberality. Thanksgiving.] 'The apostle here means to show the peculiar benefit of this charis, [tr. grace,] or God's gift, namely, that it not only supplies the necessities of the poor, (and that, from its very nature liberally, for the very idea, v. 6. of a thank-gift for God's sake, carries with it that of a bounteous one,) but also excites and nourishes religion in the hearts of the poor, since they have to thank God, as well as their fellow-creatures, for what the apostle further on calls this unspeakable gift.' Bl. Ep.

V. 12-15. This consideration [namely, the happy change in their state and condition, through the influence of the Gospel] caused the apostle to break out in thanks to God, for the unspeakable grace of the Gospel, and the gift of his Son to be the Savior of sinners; by whom idolatrous Gentiles had been thus brought to glorify Him; a foundation had been laid for the mutual love of Jews and Gentiles, as members of one church, and children of one family; and the most effectual motives, encouragements, and example, had been afforded, to excite men to 'love and good works.' 'The admirable charity, by which God is so much glorified, the Gospel receives such credit, others are so much benefited, and you will be so plentifully by God rewarded.' Whitby. 'If we understand thus, it will be as remarkable a text as most in the Bible, to show that every good affection, in the human heart, is to be ascribed to a divine influence. . . . But I am ready to think, the apostle's mind, to which the idea of the invaluable gift of Christ was so familiar, rather, by a strong and natural transition, glanced on that.' Doddr. Scott.

(13.) Professed.] 'Rather, consentaneous; since those who were liberal to other Christians, by that very thing publicly professed their consent with them in the faith. And so Beza, Sclater, Ros.' Bl. Thus that union, v. 14. of Jew and Gentile Christians, to which the former were so averse, Gal. 2:12. would be exceedingly helped; comp. also Rom. 15:31. where he asks the Roman Christians' prayers, that the Gentile contribution may be received with proper feelings, by the Palestine Christians. See Mackn. An admirable method is this of the apostle, to keep bright the links of harmony in the church, prayer and beneficence; and which may be well recommended, for mutual benefit, to the rich and poor of all lands and all times. Ep.

(14.) 'It will also (he says) tend to excite their prayers for you. Gracc.] 'The benignity of God [notes, v. 5. 8:1]: the apostle means

Note, (1.) True Christianity is a subjection to the Gospel, a yielding ourselves to the commanding influence of its truths and laws. (2.) We must evidence the sincerity of this subjection, by works of charity. (3.) This will be for the credit of our profession, and to the praise and glory of God. (4.) We should recompense the kindnesses we receive, when not in a capacity of recompensing any other way those who have aided us, by prayer to God for them, v. 14. and as this is the only recompense the poor can make, so it is often greatly for the advantage of the rich.

Lastly, The apostle concludes this whole matter with this doxology, v. 15. Some think, by this unspeakable gift he means the gift of grace bestowed on the churches, in making them able and willing to supply the necessities of the saints, which would be attended with unspeakable benefit both to the givers and receivers. It should seem rather, that he means Jesus Christ, who is indeed the unspeakable Gift of God unto this world; a gift we have all reason to be very thankful for.

CHAP. X. V. 1—6. The apostle Paul nowhere met with more opposition from false apostles than at Corinth. Let not the ministers of Christ think strange, if they meet with perils, not only from enemies, but from false brethren; for blessed Paul himself, though so blameless and inoffensive, so condescending and useful to all, yet had occasion to vindicate himself against those who envied him, and did all they could to undermine him, and lessen his interest and reputation.

1. Observe the mild and humble manner in which he addresses the Corinthians, and how desirous he is that no occasion might be given him to use severity.

1. He addresses himself to them in a very mild and humble manner, v. 1. In the introduction to this epistle, he joined Timothy with himself; but now he speaks only for himself, against whom the false apostles had particularly levelled their reproaches; and mark how he regards the meekness and gentleness of Christ, and desires this great example might have the same influence on the Corinthians. When we find ourselves tempted, or inclined to be rough and severe towards anybody, we should think of the meekness and gentleness of Christ, in the days of his flesh, and in all the acts of his grace toward poor souls. How humbly, also, this great apostle speaks of himself! We should be sensible of our own infirmities, and think humbly of ourselves, even when men reproach us for them.

2. He is desirous that no occasion might be given to use severity, v. 2. or to exercise his authority against them in general, as he had resolved to do against some who unjustly charged him as walking according to the flesh, i. e. regulating his conduct, even in his ministerial actions, according to carnal policy, or with worldly views. This was what he had renounced; this is contrary to the PRACT. OBS. The duty of 'ministering to the saints,' is so obvious, that it might be deemed superfluous to exhort Christians to it; yet they are so apt to forget their principles and obligations, and the remains of unbelief and carnal self-love war so powerfully against the 'constraining love of Christ,' in their hearts, that it is in general necessary 'to stir up their minds by way of remembrance.'—Many an intended good work has been neglected, or rendered useless, by delay; it is, therefore, proper to exhort men to be prompt in doing what they have shown a willingness to engage in. Prov. 3:27, 28. Ec. 9:10. Works of piety and charity should flow spontaneously, as water out of a fountain, from the gratitude and benevolence of a believing heart, and not require exhorting by importunity.—It is spiritual policy for us to spend less on every kind of indulgence, and to lay by less for our families, that we may give more to the needy for Christ's sake; for this will be far the best secured and most productive. Even persons in moderate circumstances may sow much of this seed; if by various little savings and self-denials, they will but study to spare something to relieve their distressed brethren; and this they will do, if 'faith and love abound in their hearts.' With these truths before our eyes, men must be left to 'do as they have purposed in their hearts;' for they who give in a reluctant, sorrowful, or grudging manner, and 'of necessity,' have little reason to expect the acceptance of God, 'who loveth a cheerful giver.' Ec. 11:1—6.—There are a few Christians still to be found 'who scatter, and yet increase,' but there are far more, even among those who are zealous for evangelical doctrines, 'who withhold more than is meet, and it tendeth to poverty;' for 'God is able to make all grace to abound' to those, whose hearts are enlarged with kindness to their brethren; and it should be remembered, that He gives us everything far more 'freely,' than we can give alms to the meanest beggar. If He sees it good for us, He can so prosper us, that, having all-sufficiency in all things, 'we may abound unto every good work;' and they, who, from love to Him, 'scatter abroad and give to the poor,' have 'a righteousness that endureth for ever.' He can easily give us enough to use, and enough to disperse; that we may have more, sow more, and reap more; and so, 'increase the fruits of our righteousness;' that, being 'enriched in everything unto all bountifulness,' we may be happy in ourselves, blessings to others, and instruments of promoting his glory. But alas! the faithfulness of our God, in this respect, is little known, even among professed Christians, because so few fairly venture to make the experiment. SCOTT.

to inculcate strongly, that the chief thanks are due to God, it being his pleasure that it should be so; which would suggest to the Corinthians the strongest [and best] motive for contributing to their utmost ability.

BLOOMF.

NOTES. CHAP. X. V. 1—6 Having concluded other subjects, the apostle here begins to speak more directly against the false teachers, who opposed him at Corinth. 11:13—15. (5) Casting down, &c. 'The soul, seeing its fortifications demolished, submits to the Conqueror, and every thought, every reasoning, takes law from Him.—Christ is acknowledged as absolute Master.—The former clause shows, how ready men are to fortify themselves against it, and to raise, as it were, one barrier behind another, to obstruct his entrance into the soul.' Doddr. As no outward miracle could effect this change, without new-creating grace, so we may be sure, that the power of God, in regenerating and renewing the heart, was principally, though not exclusively, intended by the apostle; yet many expositors almost wholly confine it to the miracles wrought by Him.—Thus the apostle and his fellow-soldiers waged war against their opposers. By faithful preaching, disinterested labors, patient sufferings, holy lives, and fervent prayers, they sought to change their enemies into friends to them and their divine Master; and thus they prevailed against Satan, to the subversion of his strong-holds and the revolt of his subjects.—(6) To revenge, &c. 'The apostle purposed, and was in readiness, by miraculous judgments, to avenge the cause of Christ on those disguised enemies, who persisted in their disobedience, as he had on Elymas and others: Acts 13:6—12. but he waited to bring back such as had been deluded by them to their former obedience, and to complete that work of love, before he proceeded to use severer methods.—Many expositors seem to confine the interpretation of these vs. almost entirely to the divine power; by which the apostles were enabled to confound all open opposers, as well as to inflict judgments on those professed Christians, who by their persevering misconduct exposed themselves to the censures of the church. But it appears evident, that 'the Gospel, as the power of God unto salvation,' is primarily intended, and that the conversion of opponents, and the restoring of lapsed Christians to obedience, were the first objects aimed at. But when all proper means had failed, in respect of the latter, then not so much the censures of the church, as miraculous punishments, denounced by apostolical authority, and made effectual by the power of God, were the weapons to which they had recourse. SCOTT.

(1.) Now commences the THIRD part of this epistle, in which Paul vindicates himself against the false teachers, and those that calumniated him. For there had come to the Corinthians certain false teachers (11:13.), from among the Jews (11:22.), who had calumniated the apostle, had invidiously depreciated his gifts, and denied his pre-eminences, and had even accused him of profanity and hypocrisy;

(10:2.) while, on the other hand, they had bestowed on themselves the most unqualified praises. To these, therefore, the apostle adverts in what follows, in which he says, (1.) That he had come to the Corinthians, with no other but divine powers, 10:4—7. (2.) That he does not boast, except of the promotion of God's glory, v. 8—13. (3.) That his affection for the Corinthians is greater than that of false teachers, 11:1—15. (4.) And lastly, he compares himself with them, 11:16—21. 12, 13.' SCHUETZ.

'On this portion of the epistle, many modern comtrs. run into strange speculations. From a certain change which may here be observed in the phraseology, some have fancied that it was another epistle, which was in process of time tacked to the first; but there is no appearance of another epistle having commenced, nor have we here any of the introductory matter, observable at the commencement of all the other epistles; and moreover the Gr. particle de [the second word of this ch.], which is never proemial, utterly discountenances the notion. As to the slight difference of style, it may easily be accounted for, from the difference of subject, and perhaps from the difference of situation in which it was written. The preceding chs. (I think) bear some marks of haste, and slight incoherency, as if written on the spur of the occasion, in the course of journeying from place to place. The following portion is more elaborate, and was probably written at some fixed place, and with [greater] deliberation. Base. As it appears from v. 10. that Paul is here adopting the language of his detractors, both the epithets must be somewhat modified.' BLOOMF.

(2.) According to the flesh. 'The sense (comp. 1:17.) seems to be, "to act merely from the dictates of frail and corrupt human nature," such as levity, inconstancy, boasting when absent, and timid when present, and, in a general way, "being guided by personal interests, and carnal and worldly views of ambition, avarice, or sensuality." The phrase, upon the whole, strongly implies the absence of every supernatural endowment, and divine commission, such as Paul claimed; which I conceive to be the full sense of the expression.' ID.

(3—5.) War. 'The Gr. (strateuesthai) signifies, "to go out on a commissioned warfare," so, by a military allusion, it may denote, "to hold a commission, and exercise an office." "Carnal weapons," refers to those human aids and supports, by which the plans of men are carried into effect, as riches, fame, eloquence, and human policy of every kind. It is God who energizes (says Theoph.) and wars, though we wear the armor.' BL. 'All the terms in these two vs. (5, 6.) are military. Allusion is made to a strongly fortified city, when the enemy had made his last stand; entrenching himself about the walls; strengthening all his redoubts and ramparts; raising castles, towers, and various engines of defence and offence upon the walls; and neglecting nothing that might tend to render his strong-hold impregnable! 7 Do ye look on things after the outward <sup>r</sup> appearance? If any man trust to himself that he is Christ's, let him of himself think this again, that, as he is Christ's, even so are we Christ's.

spirit and design of the Gospel, and was far from being his aim and design. Hereupon, II. He asserts the power of his preaching, and to punish offenders.

1. The power of his preaching, v. 3—5. Where observe, (1.) The ministry is a warfare, not after the flesh, indeed, but spiritual, with spiritual enemies, and for spiritual purposes.

PRACT. OBS. V. 1—6. They who meet with unjust and ungrateful usage from those, to whom they are laboring to do good, should frequently and intensely meditate, on 'the meekness and gentleness of Christ.' They should then endeavor to go on patiently and quietly, after his example, and to 'overcome evil with good;' and, even when constrained by duty to reprove and correct, or to exercise authority with firmness and decision, they should do it with reluctance, show a desire to avoid the painful necessity, and manifest a loving and forgiving spirit, that all may see how dear 'the meekness and gentleness of Christ' are to them.—Though encompassed with infirmities and temptations, and subject to manifold imperfections, the servants of Christ are engaged in a warfare, which cannot be waged 'after the flesh.' Worldly wisdom, affected eloquence, dissimulation, compulsion, angry disputation, slanders, revilings, and ridicule, are carnal weapons; and, however powerful

And though ministers walk in the flesh, or live in the body, and, in the common affairs of life, act as other men, [and are imperfect, like other men,] yet, in their work and warfare they must not go by the maxims of the flesh, nor should they design to please the flesh.

(2.) The doctrines of the Gospel, and discipline of the church, are the weapons of this warfare, and these are not carnal; outward force, therefore, is not the method of the Gospel, but strong persuasions, by the power of truth, and the meekness of wisdom. A good argument this against persecution for conscience-sake: conscience is accountable to God only; and people must be persuaded to God and their duty, and not driven by force of arms. And so the weapons of our warfare are mighty, or very powerful; the evidence of truth is convincing and eogent; this, indeed, is through God, or owing to Him, because they are his institutions, and accompanied with his blessing, which makes all opposition to fall before his victorious Gospel. Where we may observe, [1.] The opposition made against the Gospel, by the powers of sin and Satan, in the hearts of men: ignorance, prejudices, beloved lusts, are Satan's strong-holds in the souls of some; vain imaginations, carnal reasonings, and high thoughts, or proud conceits, in others: by these the devil endeavors to keep men from faith and obedience to the Gospel, and secures his possession of their hearts as his own house or property. But then observe, [2.] The conquest the Word of God gains. These strong-holds are pulled down, by the Gospel, as the means, through the grace and power of God accompanying it as the principal, efficient cause. The conversion of the soul is the conquest of Satan in that soul.

2. The apostle's power to punish offenders (and that in an extraordinary manner) is asserted in v. 6. He speaks not of personal revenge, but of punishing disobedience to the Gospel, and disorderly walking among church-members, by inflicting church censures. Note, Though the apostle showed meekness and gentleness, yet he would not betray his authority; and therefore intimates, that when he would commend them whose obedience was fulfilled or manifested, others would fall under severe censures.

V. 7—11. In these vs. he proceeds to reason the case with the Corinthians, in opposition to those who despised him, judged him, and spake hardly of him. In outward appearance, he was mean and despicable with some; but this was a false rule to make a judgment by. It should seem, some boasted mighty things of themselves, and made a fair show; but there are often false appearances: a man may seem to be learned, who has not learned Christ, and appear virtuous, who has not a principle of grace in his heart. However, the apostle asserts two things of himself:

1. His relation to Christ, v. 7. It should seem by this, that Paul's adversaries boasted of their relation to Christ, as his ministers and servants. And he reasons thus with them: 'Suppose you do belong to Christ, yet you ought also to allow this to us, that we also are Christ's.' Note, It would help to heal the differences among Christians, if they would remember, that how confident soever we may be that we belong to Christ, yet, at the same time, we must allow that they who differ from us may belong to Christ too, and therefore should be treated accordingly. This we may plead for ourselves, against those who judge us and despise us, ful they may seem to numbers, they will be found useless as straw and stubble in this war; and rather fortify and garrison Satan's strong-holds, than pull them down. For success against the kingdom of darkness must be expected, 'not from might, or power, but from the Spirit of God.' The appointed means, however feeble they appear to unbelief, will be 'mighty through God,' who works by his own appointments, and makes 'his people willing in the day of his power,' and gradually perfects them in obedience, and in the beauties of holiness. Yet while the gracious Savior is ever ready to forgive, and delights in mercy, He is 'in readiness to avenge the disobedience' of the impenitent and unbelieving, especially that of hypocrites and false teachers, who corrupt the church, and dishonor his name; and He will at length 'make them as a fiery oven in the day of his wrath.' SCOTT.

God comes against the place and attacks it; the strong-holds, (ochuro-mata.) all the fortified places, are carried. The imaginings, (logismoi.) engines, and whatever the imagination or skill of man could raise, are speedily taken and destroyed. Every high thing (pan hupsōma), all the castles and towers, are sapped, thrown down, and demolished; the walls are battered into breaches; and the besieging army, carrying everything at the point of the sword, enter the city, storm and take the citadel. Everywhere defeated, the conquered, submit, and are brought into captivity (aichmalōtizantes), are led away captives; and thus the whole government is destroyed. The cut, is of engines in use in that age; comp. cuts, 2 Chr. 26:14, 15. Is. 29:3, 4. Jer. 32:24. Ez. 4:2. 26:8. Ez.: end. Is. 56:5. Pref. to Sam., and 2 K. 17:6. Ed.

(5.) Imaginations . . . thought.] Bl. 'cannot, with Ros. Schl., &c., recognise a military metaphor; the former (logismous) he refers, 'with Theoph. and Wets., to the syllogisms and rhetorical strophæ, of the false teachers, who were proud of their Gentile learning; the latter (noōma) seems used like logismous, and to be meant of vain imaginations. High thing, is like strong-hold, a military metaphor; and as logismous refers to false teachers, and, perhaps, hostile Jewish doctors, so hupsōma (high thing) may, (as Strigel obs.,) be meant for the heathen philosophers; since the pride of philosophy was the greatest impediment to the reception of the "knowledge of God," against which it raised itself like a rampart, to prevent its entering the heart. Leading captive, and not merely conquering.] This seems meant for the learned heathen at Corinth, who found it more difficult to subject their imagination and reason to the obedience of Christ, than their actions. Against this, the pride of human reason has ever rebelled. Thus it has been in every age; and such is the case at the present day. Of those who reject the Gospel, few are indisposed to admit the excellence of its moral precepts, but against any subjection of the thoughts or reason of men they loudly protest. Bl. Pride, the inordinate activity of the blind impulse of self-esteem, cannot, more than the impulse of the blind, religious feelings, be predicated of reason. We cannot properly speak of a proud reason, more than we can of a religious reason; though the intellectual and reflecting faculties may be exercised under the influence of either or all of those sentiments. All superstitious, too, equally claim exemption from the control of reason, and the consequence of this yielding to various blind impulses, instead of truth, is, millions upon millions of fanatic heathen, and a sufficient number of fanatic Christians, to split Christianity into scores of jealous sects. The intellect must decide what is revealed, before the affections be allowed implicitly to embrace and flow forth toward it: conviction must accompany faith. Rom. 1:28. Lu. 12:57. We must then be careful how our reason is biassed, taking care to govern our wills (or affections) by what it sees to be God's revelation: for both reason and will go right or wrong together. Ed.

'And thus (v. 5.) we go on in our conquest; for we are continually casting down the fallacious and sophistical reasonings, by which vain men are endeavoring to expose our doctrine to contempt, and every high thing which exalteth itself against the knowledge of God [that we teach, and by our miracles prove to you to be his revelation. Ed.], all the proud imaginations which men have entertained of themselves, with regard to their natural or moral excellences, in consequence of which they neglect the Gospel, and are indeed ready to live without God in the world. And thus we are enabled to bring every thought, every proud, haughty notion which men have entertained, into an humble and willing captivity to the obedience of Christ, the great Captain of our salvation.' . . . 'The soul, seeing its fortifications demolished, submits to the Conqueror; and then every thought, every reasoning, takes law from Him. Nothing is admitted that contradicts the Gospel; Christ being acknowledged as absolute Master. The former clause shows, how ready men are to fortify themselves against it, and to raise, as it were, one barrier behind another, to obstruct his entrance into the soul. Rom. 15:18, 19.' DODD.

V. 7—11. It is recorded, (I determine not how truly,) that the apostle was of low stature, crooked, and bald; some add, that he had an impediment in his speech, that his voice was shrill and unpleasant, and his delivery ungraceful. 12:7—10. 1 Cor. 2:3—5. Gal. 4:12—16. However this might be, for probably it is not quite correct, his scrupulous rejection of the studied ornaments of the Grecian eloquence, and his plain, 9 That I may not seem as if I would terrify you by letters.

10 For his letters, <sup>u</sup> say they, are weighty and powerful; but his bodily presence is weak, and his speech contemptible.

11 Let such an one think this, that, such as we are in word by letters when we are absent, such will we be also in deed when we are present.

12 For <sup>v</sup> we dare not make ourselves of the number, or compare ourselves with some that commend themselves: but they measuring themselves by themselves, and comparing themselves among themselves, <sup>w</sup> are not <sup>x</sup> wise.

13 But we will not boast of things without our measure, but according to the measure of the <sup>v</sup> rule which God hath distributed to us, a measure to reach even unto you.

14 For we stretch not ourselves beyond our measure, as though we reached not unto you: for we are come as far as to you also in preaching the gospel of Christ:

15 Not boasting of things without our measure, that is, of <sup>z</sup> other men's labors; but having hope, when your faith is increased, that we shall be <sup>a</sup> enlarged by you according to our rule abundantly, 16 To preach the gospel in the regions beyond you, and not to boast in another man's <sup>b</sup> line of things made ready to our hand.

17 But <sup>c</sup> he that glorieth, let him glory in the Lord.

that, how weak soever we are, yet, as they are Christ's, so are we: we profess the same faith, we walk by the same rule, we build on the same foundation, and hope for the same inheritance.

2. His authority from Christ as an apostle. This he had mentioned before, v. 6. and now he tells them that he might speak of it again, and with some sort of boasting, seeing it was a truth, that the Lord had given it to him, and it was more than his adversaries could justly pretend to. It was certainly what he should not be ashamed of, v. 8.

Of which, observe, (1.) The nature of his authority; it was for edification, and not for destruction. This indeed is the end of all authority, civil and ecclesiastical, and was the end of that extraordinary authority which the apostles had, and of all church discipline.

(2.) The caution with which he speaks of his authority, professing his design was not to terrify them with big words, nor by angry letters, v. 9. Thus he seems to obviate an objection that might have been formed against him, v. 10. But the apostle declares he did not intend to frighten them who were obedient, nor did he write anything in his letters, that he was not able to make good, by deeds, against the disobedient; and he would have his adversaries know this, v. 11. that he would, by the exercise of his apostolical power committed to him, make it appear to have a real efficacy.

V. 12—13. 1. The apostle refuses to justify himself, or to act by such rules as the false apostles did, v. 12. They were pleased, and did pride themselves, in their own attainments, and never considered those who far exceeded them in gifts and graces, in power and authority; and this made them laughy and insolent. The apostle would not be of the number of such vain men: let us resolve that we will not.

2. He fixes a better rule for his conduct; namely, not to boast of things without his measure, which was the measure God had distributed to him, v. 13. His meaning is, either that he would not boast of more gifts or graces, or power and authority, than God had really bestowed on him; or rather, that he would not act beyond his commission as to persons or things, nor go beyond the line prescribed to him; which he plainly intimates the false apostles did, while they boasted of other men's labors.

3. He acted according to this rule, v. 14. particularly in his preaching at Corinth, and in the exercise of his apostolical authority there; he came thither by divine direction, and there converted many to Christianity; therefore, in boasting of them as his charge, he acted not contrary to his rule, he boasted not of other men's labors, v. 15.

4. He declares his success in observing this rule. His hope was, that their faith was increased, and that others beyond them, even in the remoter parts of Achaia, would embrace the Gospel also; and in all this he exceeded not his commission, nor acted in another man's line.

5. He seems to check himself in this matter, as if afraid of boasting, or taking any praise to himself, therefore he mentions two things which ought to be regarded: (1.) He that glorieth, should glory in the Lord, v. 17. Ministers, in particular, must be careful not to glory in their performance, but must give God the glory of their work, and of the success of it. (2.) Not he that commendeth himself is approved, but whom the Lord commendeth, v. 18. Of all flattery, self-flattery is the worst; and self-applause is seldom better modest, and unaffected address, would render 'his speech contemptible with many persons at Corinth,' where these decorations were highly valued; though his subjects were ever so judiciously discussed, and his delivery every way suitable to the occasion. Indeed the very meanness of his apparel, [note, 1 Cor. 4:11.] would render his appearance despised by numbers. But he warned such as ventured to speak thus of him, to expect that he would act as decidedly when he arrived at Corinth, as he now wrote; and would show them, that he was able to assume a firmer tone, and act with more authority, and even severity, when he saw occasion; though he preferred 'beseeching them in the meekness and gentleness of Christ.'

(7.) Outward appearance.] 'The false teachers, in person, manners, learning, eloquence, the influence of wealth, birth, rank, and all other outward advantages, were greatly superior to Paul. Is Christ's.] Some seem to have boasted of being especially Christ's, as having seen Him with their own eyes. And to this there seems allusion: and so Theoph. Comp. on 1 Cor. 7:3.

(8.) 'Nay, if I should even make greater claims than I have already done to a divine commission, (alluding to that exousia given him by the personal revelation of Jesus Christ,) I should not be convicted of falsehood, i. e. feel the shame which accompanies the detection of falsehood.'

(9.) 'It appears from the words following, that these were the very words of the false teachers, upon which the apostle here sarcastically plays.'

(10.) Weak.] 'It alludes to some bodily imperfections, most probably to the apostle's very diminutive stature, and ungracious [ungraceful?] air and manner. Pseudo Lucian [A. D., 130 to 180?], in his Philopatris, gives the following description of him: "corpore erat parvo, contracto, incurvo, tricubitali," i. e. a petty, crooked shriveling, of four feet and a half. There is little doubt, however, but tricubitali [4½ ft.] is no more to be taken for the exact measure, than tribolarius necessarily signifies of the exact value of 3 oboles. It seems to have been a proverbial exaggeration for one of very diminutive stature. Considering, too, the hand which drew this sketch, there can be no doubt that it is en caricature. Speech contemptible.] Some think, Paul had a very weak, squeaking voice; others, that he had an impediment in his speech. Both, indeed, may be conjoined; or we may suppose a mean address, and a great defect in elocution: and, considering the little power which he possessed of Greek style, and that his phraseology was, no doubt, idiotical, provincial, and popular, the expression (especially when considered as the satirical exaggeration of an adversary, and bearing in mind the fastidiousness of the Greeks in such respects) will not seem strange.'

(11.) Think.] 'The Gr. is well expl. by Theoph., "know." In.

V. 12—16. 'To the apostles God allotted the charge of converting the world, and endued them with gifts suited to the greatness of the work. To them therefore it belonged, to form their converts into churches, and to appoint rules for their government. . . . The province assigned to the evangelists, and other inferior ministers, was, to assist the apostles, to build on the foundation laid by them, to labor in the Gospel under their direction, and in all things to consider themselves as subordinate to the apostles. According to this view of the matter, the false teacher at Corinth, who was but at best an inferior minister of the Gospel, had in many things acted out of the bounds in which he ought to have labored.' Mackn. Kanōn [tr. rule, v. 13.] is the instrument by which builders try their work, whether exactly straight or not. The Scripture is the canon, by which all instruction must be tried.

(12.) By themselves.] 'And not by the true apostles.' BLOOMF.

(13.) 'I will not boast, or seek glory in respect to any parts further than the limits God hath assigned to my evangelical labors. (Kanōn, says Ros., after Morus, here, is the certain space marked out to a teacher, i. e. his diocesis.) And these limits extend so as to reach even to you. Of you, therefore, I may justly boast. In v. 14. he plainly alludes to the right of pre-occupancy.' BL., whom see, and also Ros. Ed.

(15.) Enlarged.] 'Rather, "gain fame and glory by you," namely, as the teacher justly may by the improvement of his pupils. In the use of the Gr. meaning, "to be praised for," "get honor by," there is a sort of Hebraism, as in Ac. 19:17. Phil. 1:20. and sometimes in the O. T. See Schl.—According to our rule.] Rather, "within my limits," and according to my just right.'

(16.) 'The result which I hope for, this abundant success of my labors among you, is, to spread the Gospel to the parts beyond you, i. e. chiefly, I incline to think, the rest of the Peloponnesus, beyond the Isthmus, and perhaps Acarnania and Epirus, which had a close connexion with Corinth. Mackn., however, thinks Italy and Spain are meant, observing, that "Paul had already preached in Laconia, Arcadia, and the other countries of Peloponnesus, which composed the Roman province of Achaia, as is plain from the inscription of both his letters to the Corinthians." Yet Doddr. denies, that there is "anything to be found in the N. T., of planting churches in these parts of the Peloponnesus." I am certainly not aware of any such.' BL. 'Paul expresses the hope, that in his next visit to the Corinthians, he might "preach the Gospel in the regions beyond them," implying that, in his first visit, he went no farther W. than their city. This first visit was prolonged a year and a half. His second continued only 3 months; and considering how much he probably found to "set in order" in the Corinthian church, how much preaching and conversation he would find necessary, and also the important instructions for disciples abroad, which we know he here committed to writing,—it may be doubted whether he then penetrated any farther into the peninsula.'

V. 17, 18. 'If any teacher boast, let him boast of having performed his duty, in the manner the Lord hath appointed.' Mackn. Surely this is widely different from 'glorying in the Lord!' Jer. 9:23, 24. 1 Cor. 1:26—31, vv. 30, 31.—The apostle was constrained to speak of his own labors and success; but he must remind the Corinthians, that every man who 'gloried,' ought 'to glory in God,' as his portion, and in the Lord Jesus as his whole Salvation, and the Giver of all his hopes, grace, endowments, and usefulness, to whom all the honor of them was due. If a man could not thus 'glory in the Lord,' all other glorying must be vain-glory, and end in shame and misery.—Many expositors suppose, that the commendation here mentioned, was given when God enabled a man to work miracles, or exercise spiritual gifts. But many wrought miracles and prophesied, who were 'workers of iniquity.' Mat. 7:21—23. 1 Cor. 13:1—3. and it could not be properly said, that 'the Lord commended' them. CHAP. XI.

1 Out of his jealousy over the Corinthians, who seemed to make more account of the false apostles than of him, he entereth into a forced commendation of himself, 5 of his equality with the chief apostles, 7 of his preaching the Gospel to them freely, and without any their charge, 13 shewing that he was not inferior to those deceitful workers in any legal prerogative, 23 and in the service of Christ, and in all kind of sufferings for his ministry, far superior.

WOULD to God ye could bear with me a little in my folly: and indeed <sup>a</sup> bear with me.

2 For I am jealous over you with godly jealousy: for I have espoused you <sup>b</sup> to one husband, that I may present you as a chaste virgin <sup>c</sup> to Christ.

3 But I fear, lest by any means, as the serpent beguiled Eve through his subtilty, so your minds should be corrupted from the simplicity that is in Christ.

4 For if he that cometh preacheth another Jesus, whom we have not preached, or if ye receive another spirit, which ye have not received, or another <sup>d</sup> gospel, which ye have not accepted, ye might well bear <sup>e</sup> with him.

5 For I suppose I <sup>f</sup> was not a whit behind the very chiefest apostles.

than self-flattery and self-deceit: at the best, self-commendation is no praise; it is oftentimes as foolish and vain as it is proud: therefore, instead of praising or commending ourselves, we should strive to approve ourselves to God, and his approbation will be our best commendation.

CHAP. XI. In this ch. the apostle goes on with his discourse, in opposition to the false apostles, who were very industrious to lessen his interest and reputation among the Corinthians, and had prevailed too much by their insinuations.

V. 1-4. 1. His apology for going about to commend himself. He is loath to do it, v. 1. and calls it folly, because too often it is really no better; in his case it was necessary; yet, seeing others might apprehend it to be folly in him, he desires them to bear with it. Note, It is no pleasure to a good man to speak well of himself, yet in some cases it is lawful, when as here it is for the advantage of others, or for one's own necessary vindication.

2. His reasons for what he did; (1.) To preserve the Corinthians from being corrupted by the insinuations of the false apostles, v. 2, 3. He tells them, he was afraid lest their faith should be weakened by hearkening to such suggestions as tended to lessen their regard to his ministry, by which they were brought to the Christian faith. He had espoused them to one Husband, converted them to Christianity; and he was desirous to present them as a chaste virgin, pure and spotless, and faithful, not having their minds corrupted with false doctrines, by false teachers; so as Eve was beguiled by the subtilty of the serpent. This godly jealousy in the apostle, was a mixture of love and fear; and faithful ministers cannot but be afraid and concerned for their people, lest they should lose that which they have received, and turn from what they have embraced, especially when deceivers have gone abroad, or have crept in among them.

(2.) To vindicate himself against the false apostles, v. 4. Had they preached another Jesus, or another Spirit, there had been some color of reason to bear with them, or to hearken to them. But seeing there is but one Jesus, one Spirit, one Gospel, that is, or at least that ought to be, preached, and received; what reason could there be why, by the artifices of any adversary, they should be prejudiced against him who first converted them to the faith? It was a just occasion of jealousy, that such persons designed to preach another Jesus, another Spirit, and another Gospel.

V. 5-15. After the foregoing preface, the apostle mentions,

1. His equality with the other apostles, v. 5. The apostleship, as an office, was equal in all the apostles; but the apostles; like other Christians, differed one from another: Paul was indeed eminent; yet he speaks modestly of himself, supposes it only, and humbly owns his personal infirmity, that he had not a graceful delivery. Some think, he was of a very low stature, and his voice proportiona-

PRACT. OBS. V. 7-18. It is peculiarly unsuitable to the character of Christians, though lamentably common, to judge of men, or look on things, after 'the outward appearance;' as if learning, eloquence, affluence, a graceful person and address, or elegant attire, were evidences of a man's holiness and heavenly wisdom, or the seal of Christ to his ministerial character! Or as if the want of such embellishments proved a man not to be an eminent Christian, or an able, faithful minister of the lowly Savior! Even Paul was 'base,' in the judgment of the self-sufficient and accomplished Corinthians; so that Satan's emissaries far excelled him in exterior recommendations. This should teach us, not to judge of gold merely by its glitter, in which itself often exceeds it, but to bring it to the balance and weigh it.—When professors, or preachers of the Gospel, are so confident that they belong to Christ, that they can hardly allow those who do not coincide in their views, or sanction their conduct, to be Christians, and when they treat the most approved characters with supercilious contempt and revilings, their very confidence should excite our suspicions; for it far more accords to that of 'the deceitful workers' at Corinth, than to that of Paul and his fellow-laborers, which was modest, humble, and candid. Some men appear to be entirely out of their element, when they are not boasting of themselves, and menacing divine judgments on all who oppose them, as if they would terrify every one into silence and submission. But we should humbly 'compare ourselves' with the Word of God, and the example of prophets and apostles, and 'measure ourselves by the rule' of our duty, the obligations conferred on us, and the work assigned us; we should be diligent, and 'study, yea, be ambitious to be quiet, and mind our own business,' though in an obscure situation, and thankful for success, according to the measure and rule which God has distributed to us, whether called to preach the Gospel, or to serve Christ in any other way, without intermeddling with other men's labors, or boasting in services performed by them. We ought likewise to hope for the increase of the faith and grace, even of those who have most failed in their duty to us, to be zealous and bold, in a humble, patient, prudent, loving, and self-denying manner, and rather to be desirous of doing abundant good, than of acquiring great reputation; and, instead of commending ourselves, or seeking the praise of men, let us desire and aspire after 'that honor, which cometh from God only.'

testimony; yet the final account, the 'Well done, good and faithful servant,' and 'the rejoicing in the testimony of conscience' in the mean while, seem especially intended. 1:12-14. 5:9-12. Mat. 25:19-23. I Cor. 3:10-15. 4:3-5.

(17.) 'The apostle concludes with a most weighty dict, which would be especially valuable to all such as were in the ministry, (for whom it is evidently meant) but which is also introduced, (very judiciously,) in order to lessen the feeling of disgust, which is apt to rise on hearing any one excessively commend himself.'

(18.) Approved.] 'Dokimos: accepted: a metaphor, taken from coins, which are approved by the prince, and accepted by the subject, and pass current.'

NOTES. CHAP. XI. V. 1-6. Indeed, if any man could possibly have preached 'another Jesus,' a more gracious and precious Savior than Paul had declared to them, or could have conferred on them 'another Spirit,' whose gifts and influences were more excellent than those, which the Holy Spirit, through Paul's ministry, had bestowed on them, or if 'another' and more suitable 'Gospel' had been preached, than that which they had embraced, there might have been some reason for their bearing with the new teachers, or even preferring them. Yet, even in that case, it would have become them, to have borne with the infirmities of their first instructor in Christianity. But the contrary was manifest. He had indeed appeared among them 'rude in speech,' and as a person of ordinary education, ignorant of the rules of eloquence, and careless respecting them; (this might be the case, though his discourses were replete with natural pathos, and sound argument;) yet he had shown himself competent in knowledge, to instruct his hearers in every part of Christianity.—Paul's declaration, that he 'was not a whit behind the very chiefest apostles,' when carried to its consequences, is totally subversive of the enormous, baseless fabric of popery, which rests entirely (as distinguished from the rest of the professed Christian church) on the vain imagination, that Peter was supreme over all the apostles, and that the pope, or the Roman church, or both, inherit, in some unaccountable manner, and by some unknown title, that supremacy.—Many expositors suppose, that the expressions, used by the apostle in respect of his espousing the believers at Corinth to Christ, are taken from Grecian customs, but the language of the O. T. seems referred to. Ps. 45:9-17. Cant. 1:2. Is. 54:5-10. 62:1-5. Ez. 16:9-14. Hos. 2:19-20. John 3:

27-36, v. 29. Others conclude, that one false teacher, and he a Jew, was the author of the disturbances at Corinth. But the false teachers, 13-15. seem to have corrupted the Gospel rather with heathenism, than Judaism. 1 Cor. 5: 6: 8: 10:19-31. 11:17-34.

(1.) 'As v. 17. of the preceding ch. was intended to deprecate the to phortikon, or indignation, which arises at hearing self-praise, so is the present v., where it was the more necessary, since he had to subjoin more of such praise; though this praise was compulsory, and for their good. The words may be rendered: would that ye could bear with me a little in my folly (of boasting). Now do bear with me!'

(2.) For, &c.] 'Rather, I ardently love you with a divine affection; i. e. not through any human motive, but solely for the sake of God. This metaphor suggested to the apostle's mind the comparison which follows, of which the imagery and cast is Jewish and Oriental, and therefore not very distinct to our western conceptions. I have espoused.] The question is, whether by the Gr. hērmōsamēn, the apostle alludes to the harmōstai, those friends who made and procured the marriage for the bridegroom. So the Gr. contrs., our Eng. trs., and Wets., Raph., Eisner, and Wolf; and in this sense the word often occurs in the classical writers, also in Prov. 19:14. See also Rom 7:4. Or, whether Paul has an allusion to persons who, like the harmōsunoi, among the Lacedæmonians, formed the lives and manners of virgins, making them virtuous and discreet, and so prepared them for marriage. It should seem better not to press on the nuptial allusion in the term. If there be any metaphorical allusion in hērmōsamēn, it may be not so much to the harmōsunoi, as to the offices of guardian and preceptor.' BL. Comp. note, i p. 231, Vol. III.

(5.) '(No, you can pretend to no such thing; they have not found you another and better Savior, more ample endowments of the Holy Spirit, nor have promulgated better doctrines than those ye have received from me; nor can any others, for I account myself to be nothing inferior to the first apostles. Theoph. remarks on the modesty of the expression, which is not directly affirmative. By the "chief apostles," the ancient contrs. justly conclude, are meant Peter, James, and John. So in Gal. 2:9. they are called the pillars of the church. He had (I think) Peter chiefly in view; since it appears from I Cor. 1:12. and 23:12. that there was a party at Corinth, who were followers of Cephas, i. e. Peter.'

7 Have I committed an offence in abasing myself that ye might be exalted, because I have preached to you the gospel of God freely?

8 I robbed other churches, taking wages of them, to do you service.

9 And when I was present with you, and wanted, I was chargeable to no man: for that which was lacking to me, the brethren which came from Macedonia supplied: and in all things I have kept myself from being burdensome unto you, and so will I keep myself.

10 As the truth of Christ is in me, no man shall stop me of this boasting in the regions of Achaia.

11 Wherefore? because I love you not? God knoweth.

12 But what I do, that I will do, that I may cut off occasion from them which desire occasion; that wherein they glory, they may be found even as we.

13 For such are false apostles, deceitful workers, transforming themselves into the apostles of Christ.

14 And no marvel; for Satan himself is transformed into an angel of light.

15 Therefore it is no great thing if his ministers also be transformed as the ministers of righteousness; whose end shall be according to their works.

16 I say again, Let no man think me a fool; if otherwise, yet as a fool receive me, that I may boast myself a little.

17 That which I speak, I speak it not after the Lord, but as it were foolishly, in this confidence of boasting.

bly small; others, that he might have had some impediment in his speech, perhaps a stammering tongue. However, he was not rude in knowledge; not unacquainted with the best rules of oratory, and art of persuasion, much less ignorant of the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven, as had been thoroughly manifested among them.

2. His equality with the false apostles in this particular,—the preaching of the Gospel unto them freely, without wages, v. 7—10. He had proved at large, in his former epistle to them, the lawfulness of ministers receiving maintenance from the people, and the duty of the people to give them an honorable maintenance; and here he says, he himself had taken wages of other churches, v. 8. so that he had a right to have asked and received from them: yet he waived his right, and chose rather to abase himself, by working with his hands in the trade of tent-making, to maintain himself, than be burdensome to them, that they might be exalted, or encouraged to receive the Gospel, which they had so cheap; yea, he chose rather to be supplied from Macedonia, than to be chargeable unto them.

He informs them of the reason of this his conduct among them; it was not that he did not love them, v. 11. or was unwilling to receive tokens of their love; but it was to avoid offence, that he might cut off occasion from them that desired occasion. He would not give occasion for any to accuse him of worldly designs in preaching the Gospel, or that he intended to make a trade of it, to enrich himself; and that others who opposed him at Corinth, might not in this respect gain an advantage against him: that wherein they gloried, as to this matter, they might be found even as he, v. 12. It is not improbable, that the chief of the false teachers, at Corinth, or some among them, were rich, and taught (or deceived) the people gratis, and might accuse the apostle or his fellow-laborers as mercenary men, who received hire or wages, and therefore the apostle kept to his resolution not to be chargeable to any of the Corinthians.

3. The false apostles are charged as deceitful workers, v. 13. and that because they would transform themselves into the likeness of the apostles of Christ, and though they were the ministers of Satan, would seem to be the ministers of righteousness. They would be as industrious and as generous in promoting error, as the apostles were in preaching truth; they would endeavor as much to undermine the kingdom of Christ, as the apostle did to establish it. There were counterfeit prophets, under the O. T., who wore the garb, and learned the language, of the prophets of the Lord. So there were counterfeit apostles under the N. T. who seemed in many respects like the true apostles of Christ. And no marvel; (says the apostle;) hypocrisy is a thing not to be much wondered at in this world, especially when we consider the great influence Satan has on the minds of many, who rules in the hearts of the children of disobedience. As he can turn himself into any shape, and put on almost any form, and look sometimes like an angel of light, in order to promote his kingdom of darkness, so he will teach his ministers and instruments to do the same. But it follows, Their end is according to their works, v. 15. the end will discover them to be deceitful workers, and their work will end in ruin and destruction.

V. 16—21. A further excuse for what he was about to say in his own vindication.

1. He would not have them think he was guilty of folly, in saying what he said to vindicate himself, v. 16. Ordinarily, indeed, it is unbecoming a wise man to be much speaking his own praise; boasting of ourselves is usually not only a sign of a proud mind, but a mark of folly also; however, says the apostle, yet as a fool receive me; if ye do count it folly in me to boast a little, yet give due regard to what I shall say.

V. 7—12. The new teachers at Corinth were distinguished from the apostle, by what they received, as well as what they imparted.—It is generally supposed, that the false teachers affected the praise of preaching the Gospel freely; but the language, which the apostle afterward uses, clearly proves that this was not the case (20). They seem rather to have despised Paul, as degrading himself and as acting inconsistently with the dignity of an apostle, in laboring, and enduring poverty, instead of demanding a maintenance.—As Corinth was a rich city, his long continuance there might have been ascribed to mercenary motives, had he not adopted this plan: 1 Cor. 9:1—23. and as the Christians in Macedonia, though far poorer than the Corinthians, yet in part maintained the apostle when laboring at Corinth, it might in some sense be said, that they were robbed to exalt their more prosperous brethren. (9) I was chargeable.] 12:13, 14.—“I stummed none of them with my complaints,” I importuned none of them to supply my wants? Whit.—He was none of those idle drones, who, by their laziness, do even chill, and benumb, and deaden the charity of well disposed persons. Leish. (10) No man shall stop me of this boasting.] “This boasting shall not be stopped in me.”

(7.) Abasing.] “Humbling, i. e. by laboring with my hands, submitting to a voluntary poverty, and by not claiming the privileges of my equals, thus, as it were, tacitly admitting inferiority. Exalted.] Paul had chiefly in view, herein, the fame and reputation which the church of Corinth sustained among the Christians, from the pre-eminence of the spiritual gifts of its members, and which might fairly be ascribed to the labors of the apostle.”

(8.) Chargeable.] Katonarkēsa: did not lie a dead weight; properly, affect any one with torpor, from narkē, a fish, possessing that power, and kata, down. Thus it merely signifies, to weigh any one down with an overpowering load, like that of the torpeda, or incubus. The word is thought by Jerome to be a Cilicium. Id.

(9.) Theoph. remarks, that this is as much as to say: “I mention not this in order that I may henceforward receive of you.” There is something, too, very cutting; q. d. “I cannot so far rely on you as to take aught of you.” Id.

(12.) “That wherein they boast, not really act, namely, in teaching gratis, that they may be found to do even as we do, (viz. if they would aim at the reputation we have,) i. e. “to take nothing, which now they are not found to do:” for, (as he proceeds to say; further on,) they shamefully pillaged the converts.” Id.

V. 13—15. It was not to be expected that the persons, to whom Paul referred, would in this respect be found like him; as they were indeed ‘false apostles,’ who in a lying manner pretended to be sent by Christ, in this and other things ‘working deceitfully,’ acting with duplicity, and varnishing over their hypocrisy and selfish intentions, by specious professions; so that their style, manner, and conduct, were an affected imitation of those of the apostles; but their ministry tended to dishonor God, and to deceive souls. 2:14—17. 4:1, 2. Jer. 23:13—27. Ez. 13:1—

16. 2 Pet. 2:1—3. Satan, their master, could disguise himself, and tempt men, in the form of a holy angel, a messenger from the world of light, instead of appearing as the prince of darkness. Mat. 4:3, 4. 16:21—23. Gal. 1:6—10. He can delude men with professions of extraordinary illumination, high affections, evangelical truth, revelations, singular sanctity, deadness to the world, austerity, or sublimity of devotion, and in various other ways; that so he might undermine or disgrace the whole religion of Christ; hurry men into absurdities and extravagances; lead them to neglect the plain rule of the written Word, and change them into enthusiasts, antinomians, or superstitious formalists. It was not, therefore, ‘anything great,’ or difficult, or ‘marvellous,’ that ‘his ministers should be transformed,’ and assume the appearance of ‘the ministers of righteousness,’ that by them this chief deceiver might impose on men to their destruction; for if they appeared openly, as opposers of the Gospel, and patrons of vice and impiety, they could not do near so much mischief; even as depredators succeed best, when disguised like honest men, and reputed to be such. But, whatever their professions might be, and however they might be admired and applauded; yet their end would accord, not to their popularity, confidence, eloquence, or sentiments; but to their works, their conduct in the sight of God, and the effect of their principles among men. Mat. 7:15—20.—The plural number used in these vs., in which the apostle directly speaks out on a subject, to which he had all along covertly referred, does by no means favor the opinion, that one false teacher was exclusively meant, though one might possess greater influence than the others. Scott.

(13.) Workers.] Teachers: as Mat. 2:37, 38. Phil. 3:2. and Schol. on Aristoph. Bloomf.

V. 16—20. Having thus openly decided against those who persisted in opposing his authority at Corinth, the apostle returned to his subject. He desired, that no one would think him a fool, or a vainglorious man, on account of what he said in his own behalf, when the importance of the occasion peremptorily demanded it of him; yet, if they would form so unfavorable a conclusion, let them at least receive him in that character, while ‘he boasted himself a little,’ for a short time, and as to a few things in which he was really distinguished; for he sought their good, and not his own credit, in what he said. He did not indeed speak on this occasion, according to the general precepts or example of the Lord, or what was proper to be imitated in ordinary cases; nor was it an immediate revelation which he was about to declare; but he followed that ‘same confidence of boasting,’ which their conduct had imposed upon him, and which the example of some among them seemed to authorize, though they would perhaps deem it foolish in him to do it. As, however, many of them, both the deceivers and the deceived, were in this habit of ‘glorying after the flesh,’ ‘he would glory also;’ but on other grounds, and in another manner, in order to counteract the pernicious tendency of their vain confidence.—Well satisfied with their own wisdom, they were accustomed to bear, with a self-complacent joy, the conduct of those who acted foolishly; and had, no doubt, often looked down

PRAC. OBS. V. 1-20. Ministers of the Gospel may be 'jealous over' the people, with such an affectionate earnestness, as carries them beyond ordinary rules or personal considerations, while they apprehend that their beloved children are in danger of being, by any means, 'corrupted from the simplicity of Christ;' and that conduct, which many censure, may be the effect of pure and holy affections superior to those of other men.—Satan has agents of all descriptions, who are continually and artfully imposing on the unstable and unwary. If then the faithful minister seem over suspicious, and become troublesome by his watchfulness and warnings; his people ought, notwithstanding, to bear with him. And they should not endure those who, without sufficient cause, would alienate them from the instruments of God in their conversion.—Yet so exceedingly injudicious are many professed Christians, that high confidence, and the language of importance and authority, often go further than the most humble, meek, unassuming, and disinterested deportment! The minister, who is content to be poor, to fare hardly, to 'be abased,' or to earn his bread, that he 'may exalt others,' by freely preaching the Gospel to them, is often consigned to neglect, as if guilty of some great offence! While others, who assume a magisterial tone, and exalt themselves, are admitted to that consequence which they assume; provided they have popular [feelings, propensities, and] abilities, whatever their character in other respects may be.—But whatever fair show deceivers may make, they will seldom appear like faithful ministers, in laboring without any hope of worldly advantage or honor, from pure love to Christ and the souls of men. This is a part of the apostolical character and office, which by no means accords to the designs of 'false apostles and deceitful workers.'—The plausibility of deceivers, and the attractive form which they assume, to seduce men 'from the simplicity on him with this mixture of pity and contempt. 1 Cor. 4:6-13. Yet they had not greatly shown their wisdom, in hearing with the false teachers: for they endured it without complaint, at least without being undeceived, if any one brought them into an abject dependence on him, and enslaved their consciences to his unwarranted impositions, [v. 20.] Doubtless, this refers to facts known to the apostle, in which the violent, litigious, ambitious, selfish temper, of 'the false apostles,' had been evident to all men; yet they were still allowed to retain their influence, through the fascination of their eloquence, and confidence, and the crafty management of their deluded admirers!—Glory after the flesh.] This is by most expositors, without any proof, explained of the false teachers glorying in their Jewish extraction, and in circumcision. But the expression, 'after the flesh,' according to the apostle's language, implies everything which an unregenerate man can possess; so that learning, eloquence, and various other distinctions may be meant, whether Jewish extraction and circumcision be included or not. 10:1-6, 17, 18. (17.) 'The apostle is not speaking seriously; as both the v. preceding, and that following, are ironical and sarcastical, so is this; and we are to repeat the formula, be it so, which is implied, as we have seen, in the v. preceding. Be it so, if you [say, or] think that what I speak, I speak not according to the Lord, or with a view to serve the purpose of his religion, but, &c.' Bl., whom see. Ed.

(19.) 'This is, perhaps, the most sarcastic sentence ever penned by Paul. Yet what he said was as just as it was severe. It was, indeed, folly and sottishness in the extreme, for persons so well informed as were the Corinthians, to bear with the boasting, hypocrisy, and arbitrary conduct of the false teachers.'

(20.) 'A slap on the face was the greatest ignominy; and Paul's expression, smite on the face, implies the greatest disgrace. 1 K. 22:24. Mat. 5:39. It therefore seems to denote the most violent, injurious treatment, like that employed by brutal pedagogues toward their pupils, or cruel masters towards their slaves. No doubt, this has reference to the violent means whereby they supported the rites and ceremonies they enjoined, and the severity with which they punished any breach of their

2. He mentions a caution, to prevent the abuse of what he should say, v. 17. He would not have them think, that boasting of ourselves, or glorying in what we have, is a thing commanded by the Lord in general into Christians, nor yet always necessary in our own vindication; Christians should rather humble and abase themselves; yet prudence must direct in what circumstances it is needful to do that which we may do lawfully, even speak of what God has wrought for us, and in us, and by us too.

3. He gives a good reason why they should suffer him to boast a little; namely, because they suffered others to do so, who had less reason, v. 18. But he would not glory in those things, carnal privileges, or outward advantages and attainments, though he had as much or more reason than others to do so. But he gloried in his infirmities, as he tells them afterward. The Corinthians thought themselves wise, and might think it an instance of wisdom, to bear with the weakness of others, and therefore suffered others to do what might seem folly; therefore the apostle would have them bear with him. Or v. 19. may be ironical, and then the meaning is this, 'Notwithstanding all your wisdom, ye willingly suffer yourselves to be brought into bondage under the Jewish yoke, or suffer others to tyrannize over you; nay, to devour you, or make a prey of you, and take of you hire for their own advantage, and to exalt themselves above you, and lord it over you; nay, even to smite you on the face, or impose on you to your very faces, v. 20. upbraiding you while they reproach me, as if ye had been very weak in showing regard to me,' v. 21. Seeing this was the case, that the Corinthians, or some among them, could so easily bear all this from the false apostles, it was reasonable for the apostle to desire, and expect, they should bear with what might seem to them an indiscretion in him, seeing the circumstances of the case were such as made it needful, that whereinsoever any were bold, he should be bold also, v. 21.

V. 22-33. Here the apostle gives a large account of his own qualifications, labors, and sufferings; (not out of pride or vainglory, but to the honor of God, who had enabled him to do and suffer so much for the cause of Christ;) and wherein he excelled the false apostles, who would lessen his character and usefulness among the Corinthians. Observe, of Christ,' should not excite our wonder; for Satan is continually 'transformed into an angel of light,' that, under the most specious pretences, he may fill the earth with infidelity, heresy, and ungodliness; and, under the mask of philosophy, morality, or extraordinary austerity, superstition, enthusiasm, or new revelations, he does far more extensive and permanent mischief, than merely by tempting men to gross enormities.—We have great reason for thankfulness, that the apostle was constrained, though with many retractions, to 'boast himself a little;' for, whatever he might fear, or his enemies might say, his 'confidence in boasting' has thrown such light on his ministry, character, and history, as will be instructive to the church to the end of the world. Doubtless the Holy Spirit guided his pen, though he seemed not to 'speak after the Lord;' for he did not glory in a carnal, a proud, or a false manner, as many do. Had the Corinthians been as wise as they thought themselves, he would have had no occasion to apologize to them for his conduct; for he did not require those indulgences, which they granted to their false teachers.—Indeed, if faithful ministers, who flatter no man, and pay no court to any man's passions, should attempt to treat their people, as some do, who, for their own ends, are in other things more complaisant, it would never be endured. It is astonishing, to see how some men bring their followers into bondage; how 'they devour and take of them;' how they insult and reproach them, as well as others; and yet how all this is borne with, excused, or palliated. For, indeed, their doctrine suits the lives and consciences of their hearers, and their example encourages them to similar conduct towards others. Sometimes it may be necessary to take notice of the reproaches of such men, but we must never imitate their spirit or conduct. SCOTT.

1. He mentions the privileges of his birth, v. 22. which were equal to any they could pretend to. It should seem from hence, that the false apostles were of the Jewish race, who gave disturbance to the Gentile converts.

V. 21-23. Comrs. generally suppose, that in what follows, he meant to compare himself with the false teacher, or teachers, at Corinth, and infer, that these were Hebrews, and wanted to impose the law on the Gentile converts; of which no trace is found in either epistle. 12:17-21. But I apprehend, that the whole passage will appear far more natural and animated, if we understand it with reference to 'the very chiefest of the true apostles;' and the words, 'whereinsoever any is bold,' obviously lead to this interpretation. 1-6. All the apostles were descended from Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. They were neither Hellenists nor proselytes; and Paul was not inferior to them in this respect, though his birth at Tarsus might give some persons occasion to conclude that he was. Phil. 3:1-7. He had declared, that his opposers at Corinth were not 'ministers of Christ,' but of Satan; 13-15. and he could scarcely seem to speak 'foolishly,' in magnifying his office, and declaring that he was more than they; but it had, indeed, this appearance, when he proceeded to show, that in some respects he was more distinguished, as the minister of Christ, than any other person, even among the apostles themselves; not by superior authority, abilities, miraculous powers, zeal, or holiness; but by his more abundant labors and sufferings, in which he evidently far exceeded all other 'ministers of Christ,' on earth. The false apostles had labored comparatively very little; and, instead of suffering for the Gospel, it is very probable that they had risen to eminence, affluence, and authority, by means of it; but by thus showing himself, in these things, to be distinguished above all the other apostles, he tacitly pointed out, to the false teachers and their followers, in what true pre-eminence consisted, and by the contrast made it appear, that those things, in which they gloried, were indeed their shame. Mat. 20: 24-23.—(23) I speak as a fool.] 'I speak, as one exceeding in folly.' This confirms the above interpretation.—In prisons, &c.] 1 Cor. 15:31-34. 2. He makes mention also of his apostle-ship; that he was more than an ordinary minister of Christ, v. 23. God had counted him faithful, and had put him into the ministry: he had been a useful minister of Christ unto them; they had found full proofs of his ministry; Are they ministers of Christ? I am more so.

3. He chiefly insists on this, that he had been an extraordinary sufferer for Christ: and this was what he gloried in, or rather he gloried in the grace of God that had enabled him to be more abundant in labors, and to endure very great sufferings, such as stripes above measure, frequent imprisonments, and often the dangers of death, v. 23. Note, When the apostle would prove himself an extraordinary minister, he proves that he had been an extraordinary sufferer. See Deut. 25:3. It was usual with Jews, that they might not exceed, to abate one at least of the number forty. And to have the abatement of one only, was all the favor that ever Paul received from them. The Gentiles were not tied up to that moderation.

Thus he was all his days a constant confessor; perhaps scarcely a year of his life, after his conversion, passed without suffering some hardship or other for his religion; wherever he went, he went in perils; he was exposed to perils of all sorts. He was in peril not only among avowed enemies, but among them also who called themselves brethren, but were false brethren, v. 26.

Beside all this, he had great weariness and painfulness in his ministerial labors, and these are things that will come into account shortly, and people will be reckoned with for all the care and pains of their ministers concerning them. Paul was a stranger to wealth and plenty, power and pleasure, preferment and ease, v. 27. This was he, who was one of the greatest blessings of the age, used as if he had been the burden of the earth, and the plague of his generation. And yet this is not all; for, as an apostle, the care of all the churches lay on him, v. 28. He mentions this last, as if this lay the heaviest on him, and as if he could better bear all the persecutions of his enemies, than the scandals in the churches he had the oversight of, v. 29. There was not a weak Christian, with whom he did not sympathize; nor any one scandalized, but he was affected therewith. Nor was he ashamed of all this, but, on the contrary, it was what he accounted his honor; and therefore, much against the grain as it was with him to glory, yet, says he, if I must needs glory, if my adversaries will oblige me to it, in my own necessary vindication, I will glory in these my infirmities, v. 30. Note, Sufferings for righteousness-sake will, the most of anything, redound to our honor.

In the last two vs. he mentions one particular part of his sufferings out of its place, as if he had forgotten it before, or because the deliverance God wrought for him was most remarkable. This is recorded, Acts 9: 24, 25. This was his first great danger and difficulty, and the rest of his life was of a piece. And it is observable, that, lest it should be thought he spake more than was true, he confirms this narrative with a sol-

PRACT. OBS. V. 21-33. What mere man ever united such and so many grounds 'of glorying,' as this apostle did? How does it fill our minds with astonishment, to meditate on this brief enumeration of his labors, hardships, perils, and sufferings, during a long course of years; of his patience, perseverance, diligence, cheerfulness, and usefulness, in the midst of them; and of his attentive and fervent affection towards all the churches, and every individual believer! Next to the history of Christ Himself, the dangers, persecutions, cruelty, and treachery, which this most excellent and most useful servant of God, everywhere, and from all sorts of persons, met with, and the unkindness even of his own converts, form the severest stricture on the folly and wickedness of mankind, that ever was published.—We may here see what are the chief preferences in the true church of Christ; and we may ask ourselves, Whether, on such terms, we should be willing to be 'not a whit behind the very chiefest apostles.' In this glass, our utmost diligence and services appear too minute to be noticed, and our difficulties and trials can

The other apostles had indeed been scourged and imprisoned for Christ's sake; Acts 4:1-3. 5:17-25, 40. yet Paul had endured this pain and disgrace 'more frequently' than they, and had been in danger of death on far more occasions.—(25) Thrice I suffered shipwreck. At one time he continued a night and a day in the sea, probably on a part of the wreck, in much suffering and peril. This was previous to his voyage to Rome, when he was again shipwrecked. Acts 27. Indeed, his other sufferings, recorded in the Acts, from chap. 19: to the end, were subsequent to the writing of this epistle; and hence we may perceive, how very many of his trials and sufferings, as well as of his labors, with the success of them, are nowhere recorded, save in the book of God's remembrance.—Thus his life was spent in weariness, pain, and suffering; his incessant labor in preaching the Gospel, conversing with the people from house to house, writing his epistles, earning his bread, and attending to his devotions, frequently forced him to pass whole nights without rest. Yet he still persevered, without fainting, in his 'work of faith and labor of love.' 6:3-10. 1 Cor. 4:9-13.

This lay upon him, filled him with constant solicitude, and employed him perpetually, in forming and executing plans, to promote their peace and prosperity, to counteract the designs of false teachers, and to order all their concerns for the best. Hence Vitellius was sent by Tiberius (whom Herod had informed by letter of his father-in-law's insolence) to bring the Arab to terms, taking him alive, or fetching his head to Rome. What Aretas then did, or what measures he adopted, writers do not mention; yet it is not improbable, that, learning Tiberius' death, not to lose so favorable an occasion, he suddenly invaded Syria, and occupied Damascus. It is not agreed whether this "ethnarch" of Aretas [so he is here called], was prefect of the Damascenes, or only of the Jews dwelling in Damascus. It would seem of the Jews; for this word ethnarch is generally used of the prefects of Judea, as is seen in Jos., &c.; the Jews, moreover, had their own ethnarchs in the more noble cities out of Palestine; nor is it proved, that those who were appointed over Damascus, either by the emperors, or the 3 kings of Arabia, were named ethnarchs. Paul calls him the ethnarch of king Aretas, because, we may suppose, he was set over the Jews by Aretas, (the former one being dismissed,) and was to be distinguished from the Roman, or the one appointed by the Romans.' NOTES. CHAP. XII. V. 1—6. This language evidently proves, that the apostle most firmly believed the soul to be distinct from the body, and capable of perception, activity, and enjoyment, in a state of separation. <sup>1</sup> Thess. 5:23—28, v. 23.—Many approved comtrs. suppose these to have been two distinct visions; that paradise is a different place from 'the third heaven;' that in the latter, he saw Jesus at the right hand of the Father, and in the former, he conversed with departed saints. But, as the happiness of the 'spirits of just men made perfect,' consists in being 'present with the Lord,' there seems to be no scriptural ground for this distinction. <sup>5:5—8.</sup> Lu. 23:39—43. Phil. 1:21—26. The language is indeed varied, yet only one vision appears to be intended, but in that one vision he doubtless had 'abundance of revelations.'—The vision seems to have been vouchsafed to him, especially for his own support and encouragement, amidst his various labors and sufferings; and, as no revelation of divine truth, needful to be known and believed by Christians, or ministers, was made to him, it was not only impossible, but even unlawful, if it could have been done, to relate what he had heard and seen.—As two distinct words are used, it is most natural to suppose, that they were intended to convey two distinct ideas. CHAP. XII. In this ch. the apostle proceeds in maintaining the honor of his apostleship.

V. 1—10. I. He narrates the favors God had shown him, and honor; for doubtless he is the man in Christ, of whom he speaks. Notice.

1. The honor, v. 2. When or how he was thus caught up, we cannot say, whether during those three days he lay without sight at his conversion, or at some other time afterward; but it was certainly a very extraordinary honor done him. in some sense he was caught up into the third heaven, the heaven of the blessed, called paradise, v. 4. in allusion to the earthly paradise, also the paradise of God, Rev. 2:7. signifying, that by Christ, we are restored to all the joys and honors we lost by sin, yea, to much better. The apostle does not mention what he saw there, but tells us, that he heard unspeakable words, such are the sublimity of the matter, and our unacquaintedness with the language of the upper world: and words it was not lawful to utter, because, in this world, we have a more sure word of prophecy than such visions and revelations, <sup>2</sup> Pet. 1:19. This account should check our curious desires after forbidden knowledge, and teach us to improve the revelation God has given us in his Word. Paul, himself, who had been in the third heaven, did not publish to the world what he had heard there, but adhered to the doctrine of Christ: on that foundation the church is built, and on that, we must build our faith and hope.

2. The modest, humble manner in which he mentions it. One would think he should have boasted of his visions, &c.; but no, this was not expedient, v. 1. and he did not mention them till above 14 years after, v. 2. and then only as he was forced to. He speaks of himself in the third person. Again, his humility appears by the check he seems to put on himself, v. 6. which plainly shows that he delighted not to dwell on this theme. It is an excellent thing to have a lowly spirit, in the midst of high advancements; and those who humble themselves, shall be exalted.

II. His account of the methods God took to keep him humble; and this he speaks of, to balance the account of his visions and revelations. When God's people communicate their experiences, let them always remember to notice what God has done to keep them humble, as well as what He has done to advance them.

1. He was pained with a thorn in the flesh, and buffeted with a messenger of Satan, v. 7. We are much in the dark what this was, whether some great trouble, or some great temptation. However it was, God often brings this good out of evil, that the reproaches of our enemies help to hide pride from us; and this is certain, that what the apostle calls a thorn in his flesh, was for a time very grievous to him: but the thorns Christ wore for us, and with which He was crowned, sanctify and make easy all the thorns in the flesh we may at any time be afflicted with; for He suffered, being tempted, that He might be able to succor them that are tempted.

2. Its design was, to keep the apostle humble, lest he should be exalted above measure, v. 7. If God love us, He will keep us from being exalted above measure; and spiritual burdens are ordered, to cure spiritual pride. This thorn in the flesh is said to be a messenger of Satan; he sent it with ill intentions, to discourage the apostle, (who had been so highly favored of God,) and hinder him in his work. But God designed and overruled it for good, and made it a help.

3. The apostle prayed earnestly to God for the removal of this sore grievance; for prayer is a remedy for every malady; and when afflicted with thorns in the flesh, we should give ourselves to prayer. Therefore we are sometimes tempted, that we may learn to pray. The apostle besought the Lord thrice, that it might depart from him, v. 8. Though afflictions are sent for our spiritual benefit, yet we may pray to God for their removal, desiring that they may reach the end for which not fall under the observation of men, would have been too much like the false apostles.'

V. 7—10. The expressions here employed, have occasioned comtrs. much perplexity; but had it seemed good to the Holy Spirit, that our curiosity should be fully gratified in this respect, He would have led the writer to be more explicit; and the general statement is more suited for edification, than if the particular trial had been specified. Gen. 32:25—31. P. O. 13—32.—'A thorn,' fixed and rankling in the flesh, would give great and constant pain, and some particular trials of the apostle, which began or were augmented, after this remarkable vision, caused a continual uneasiness to his mind of a similar nature. Probably, these arose from the personal defects, of which he was conscious, which gave his enemies, especially the false apostles, a color for reviling and deriding him. 11:13—15. These things seemed to him likely to obstruct his usefulness, and they continually reminded him of his weakness, and inability to do 'anything as of himself.' Thus they were exceedingly uneasy and mortifying to him, and doubtless they afforded 'Satan and his angels,' an opportunity of tempting him to impatience, and discouraging him in his labors, as well as of exciting carnal men to insult and injure him. This [his beseeching that the thorn might depart] seems to prove, that he did not mean his persecutions, but those infirmities which emboldened his enemies and the false teachers. 10:7—11. Gal. 4:12—16. The Lord, however, did not see good to grant his request; as He knew that this sharp trial was needful to keep him humble, and even to illustrate the power of his own grace.—This passage contains a most express example of prayer to Christ, and of confiding and glorying in Him, as the source of grace and power. Ps. 146:3. Jer. 17:5—8.—'Had 'the thorn in the flesh' consisted of disorders brought on the apostle, by the effect of the visions on his animal frame, he must have known that he was in the body.' 1—6.—He could hardly have rejoiced in the continuance of those gross temptations, of which many of the fathers groundlessly suppose him to speak. 1 Cor. 7:6—9, v. 7.—The 'messenger also of Satan,' is so involved with 'the thorn in the flesh,' in the narration, in the prayer, and in our Lord's answer, that it must mean, either the source whence his infirmities arose, Job 2:6—8. or the inward temptations which accompanied them.—A messenger of Satan.] Mat. 25:41. Rev. 12:7.—Some think, the reproaches and insults of the principal false apostle were exclusively intended. 11:13—15. But as in the case of Job, so in that of the apostle, the inward assault of evil spirits combined with the outward trials, to harass and distress him. SCOTT.

(7.) Bl. (whom see) concludes the thorn must have been a nervous disorder of the face, 'from excessive and constant ferment of mind,' like the tic-douloureux perhaps; and thinks the mention of it introduced, to allay the envy and ill-will from hearing of his high privileges. En.

(8.) 'Considering [certain quoted] passages of Eurip., Hor., and Job,

9 And he said unto me, My grace is sufficient for thee: for my strength is made perfect in weakness. Most gladly therefore will I rather glory in my infirmities, that the power of Christ may rest upon me.

10 Therefore I take pleasure in infirmities, in reproaches, in necessities, in persecutions, in distresses for Christ's sake: for when I am weak, then am I strong.

[Practical Observations.]

11 I am become a fool in glorying: ye have compelled me: for I ought to have been commended of you: for in nothing am I behind the very chiefest apostles, though I be nothing.

12 Truly the signs of an apostle were wrought among you in all patience, in signs, and wonders, and mighty deeds.

13 For what is it wherein ye were inferior to other churches, except it be that I myself was not burdensome to you? forgive me this wrong.

14 Behold, the third time I am ready to come to you; and I will not be burdensome to you: for I seek not yours, but you: for the children ought not to lay up for the parents, but the parents for the children.

15 And I will very gladly spend and be spent for you; though the more abundantly I love you, the less I be loved.

16 But be it so, I did not burden you: nevertheless, being crafty, I caught you with guile.

17 Did I make a gain of you by any of them whom I sent unto you?

18 I desired Titus, and with him I sent a brother: did Titus make a gain of you? walked we not in the same spirit? walked we not in the same steps?

19 Again, think ye that we excuse ourselves unto you? we speak before God in Christ: but we do all things, dearly beloved, for your edifying.

20 For I fear, lest, when I come,

I shall not find you such as I would, and that I shall be found unto you such as ye would not: lest there be debates, envyings, wraths, strifes, backbitings, whisperings, swellings, tumults:

they are designed. If an answer be not given to the first prayer, nor to the second, we must still pray, till we receive an answer. Christ Himself prayed to his Father thrice. As troubles are sent, to teach us to pray, so they are continued, to teach us to continue instant in prayer.

4. We have an account of the answer; that, although the trouble was not removed, yet an equivalent should be granted; grace sufficient. (1.) God accepts the prayer of faith, yet does not always answer it in the letter; as He sometimes grants in wrath, so He sometimes denies in love. (2.) When God does not remove our troubles and temptations, yet, if He gives us grace, sufficient for us, we have no reason to complain. It is a great comfort to us, whatever thorns in the flesh we are pained with, that God's grace is sufficient for us. Grace signifies two things: the good-will of God towards us, which is enough to enlighten, enliven, strengthen and comfort us, in all distresses; and the good work of God in us, the grace we receive from the fulness that is in Christ our Head; and from Him there shall be communicated that which is suitable, seasonable, and sufficient for his members.

III. The use he makes of this dispensation, v. 9, 10. He gloried in his infirmities, not his sinful infirmities, but his reproaches, necessities, persecutions, and distresses for Christ's sake, v. 10. And the reason was,—They were fair opportunities for Christ to manifest the power and sufficiency of his grace resting upon him, by which he had so much experience of the strength of divine grace, that he could say, When I am weak, then am I strong.

V. 11—21. In these vs. he addresses himself to the Corinthians, two ways:

I. He blames them that they had not stood up in his defence as they ought, and so made it the more needful for him to insist so much on his own vindication, v. 11. He tells them further, that they in particular had good reason to speak well of him, as being in nothing behind the very chiefest apostles, because he had given them full proof and evidence of his apostleship, v. 12. Note, I. It is a debt we owe good men, to stand up in defence of their reputation; and we are under special obligations to those we have received benefit by, especially spiritual benefit, to own them as instruments in God's hand of good to us, and to vindicate them when calumniated. 2. How much soever we are, or ought to be, esteemed by others, we ought always to think humbly of ourselves. See an example of this in this great apostle.

II. He gives a large account of his behavior and kind intentions toward them; in which observe the characters of a faithful minister.

1. He was not willing to be burdensome to them, v. 13, 14. He sought not to enrich himself, but to save their souls: he did not desire to make a property of them to himself, but to gain them over to Christ, whose servant he was. Note, Those who aim at clothing themselves with the fleece of the flock, and take no care of the sheep, are hirelings, and not good shepherds.

2. He would gladly spend and be spent for them, v. 15. he was willing to take pains and to suffer loss for their good.

3. He did not abate in his love to them, notwithstanding their unkindness and ingratitude, v. 15. This is applicable to other relations: if others be wanting in their duty to us, it does not follow therefore that we may neglect ours to them.

4. He was careful not only that he himself should not be burdensome, but that none he employed should. This seems to be the meaning of v. 16—18. If any should object, that though he did not himself burden them, yet that he, being crafty, caught them with guile, that is, sent those among them who pillaged from them, and afterward shared in the profit, 'This was not so,' says he; 'I did not make a gain of you myself, nor by any of them I sent; nor did Titus, nor any others. We walked by the same Spirit, and in the same steps.' Or, this may be read with an interrogation, as utterly disclaiming any guile, in himself and others, toward them.

5. He was a man who did all things for edifying, v. 19. This was his great aim and design, to do good, to lay the foundation well, and then with care and diligence to build the superstructure.

6. He would not shrink from his duty, for fear of displeasing them, though so careful to make himself easy to them. Therefore he was resolved to be faithful in reproofing sin, though he was therein found to be such as they would not, v. 20. The apostle here mentioned several sins too common among professors of religion, and they are very reprobable; and though those who are guilty of these sins, can hardly bear to be reproofed for them, yet faithful ministers must not fear offending the PRACT. OBS. V. 1—10. When we cannot avoid speaking such things concerning ourselves, as seem to imply boasting, we should use every method of rendering our conduct, in so doing, consistent with modesty and humility.—However painful the process may be, the wise Christian will be thankful to be kept from being 'exalted above measure,' and he will be more ready to speak of his sins and follies, than of his extraordinary discoveries and consolations; for he will not desire, that 'any one should think of him above what he seeth him to be.'—Whatever there is in any man's experience, whether of outward trials, or of inward conflicts and temptations, which serves to counterbalance more encouraging circumstances and events, and mortify pride; he may very properly consider it as a 'thorn in the flesh,' given to him to prevent far worse consequences. And it is especially matter of gratitude, when this prevention is effected, without his being left to commit actual sin, or to dishonor the Gospel.—We must not conclude that our prayers are rejected, when the desired deliverance is delayed, as God may see those conflicts salutary, which we deem ruinous.—Nor let it be forgotten, that whatever religious instruction or principle leads men to think, that they have any strength in themselves, proportionably renders them weak, in the hour of temptation; while the humbling consciousness, that there is no health, or help, or strength in [or of] us, as connected with a constant reliance on the all-sufficient grace of Christ, and fervent prayer for his effectual assistance, conduces proportionably to make us 'strong in the grace of our Lord,' for service, suffering, conflict, and triumph. SCOTT.

&c., it should seem to have been an ancient maxim with the Israelites, to prefer prayers to God as far as thrice (and no farther) for deliverance from danger. From them it appears to have passed, together with some other Jewish notions, [see Townsend's Sacr. Chron.,] to the Greeks, and so to the Romans.

V. 16. Many preachers and writers, without hesitation, [absurdly, and in some cases, wickedly,] quote this v., as the words of the apostle, giving an account of his own management; and it is to be feared, that it is often used to excuse ['pious,' jesuitical frauds], or commend duplicity, in a variety of ways, by which men allow themselves to impose on others, by false appearances and pretexts, in order to promote, what they think the cause of truth and of God, [and do evil that good may come.] Rom. 3:5—8. But nothing can be more foreign to the true meaning of the passage, as it stands in the context; for it is undeniably the objection, which the apostle supposed his opposers at Corinth would make, to the account which he had given of his own disinterested conduct. In this, indeed, counts. of every kind are almost unanimous. SC.

V. 17—21. These last vs. show, to what dreadful excesses the self-sufficient teachers had drawn aside their deluded followers; and that the inebriated person, who had been brought to repentance, was only one of a considerable number, who had committed crimes of a similar nature, and who persisted so obstinately in them, that there was a danger lest they should unite against the apostle's authority, and so constrain him to use great severity. This surely gives us the idea of Gen-

PRACT. OBS. V. 11—21. They, who do not give proper commendation to such as have faithfully labored for their good, but prefer every new voice to that of their own pastors, often compel them to glory, and then perhaps censure them for it.—It is a great thing for ministers to be warranted in saying, before God and to the people, ‘we seek not yours but you,’ not your property, but your souls. Alas! in what numerous or rather numberless instances must the words be transposed, in order to be true, as the preachers seek only the property, and not the salvation, of their hearers! But the more disinterested our labors are, the more apostolical they must be allowed to be; and it is generally desirable to avoid being burdensome to our congregations, for far more will ‘forgive us this wrong, than the very appearance of being mercenary.—But how very difficult is it, ‘most gladly to spend and be spent’ for those, who make unkind returns, and who seem to love those least who most love them! We are, alas, soon vanquished in contests of this kind, and may hence infer, how far short we are of the apostle’s measure of grace, who guilty by sharp reproofs, as they are needful, in public and in private.

7. He was grieved at the thought of finding scandalous sins among them, not duly repented of. This would cause great humiliation and lamenting. (1.) The falls and miscarriages of professors, cannot but be a humbling consideration to a good minister; and God sometimes takes this way, to humble those who might be under temptation to be lifted up; I fear lest my God will humble me among you. (2.) If any have not, as yet, grace to mourn and lament their own case, their case is the more lamentable, v. 21. and those who love God, and love them, should mourn for them.

CHAP. XIII. V. 1—6. 1. The apostle here threatens to be severe against obstinate sinners, when he should come to Corinth. Notice, (1.) His caution in censures: he was not hasty in using severity, but gave a first and second admonition. So some understand his words, v. 1. This is the third time I am coming to you; referring to his first and second epistles, by which he admonished them, as if he were present with them, though in person he was absent, v. 2. According to this interpretation, these two epistles are the witnesses he means in v. 1. referring rather to Mat. 18:16. concerning the manner how Christians should deal with offenders before they proceed to extremity, than to the law, Deut. 17:6. 19:5. for the behavior of judges in criminal matters. We should go, or send, to our brother, once and again, to tell him of his fault; as did the apostle to these Corinthians. Others think, he had designed and prepared for his journey to Corinth twice already, but was providentially hindered, and now informs them of his intentions a third time to come. (2.) The threatening, That if (or when) he came again, (in person,) he would not spare obstinate sinners, and such as were impenitent, in their scandalous enormities; but would inflict church-censures on them, which are thought to have been accompanied, in those early times, with visible and extraordinary tokens of divine displeasure. It is God’s gracious method to bear long with sinners, yet He will not bear always; but will come, and will not spare.

2. The apostle assigns a reason why he would be thus severe, namely, for a proof of Christ speaking in him, which they sought after, v. 3. The evidence of his apostleship was necessary for the credit, confirmation, and success, of the Gospel he preached; therefore, such as denied that were justly and severely to be censured. The false teachers designed to make the Corinthians call this matter into question, of which yet they had not weak, but strong or mighty proofs, v. 3. notwithstanding the mean figure he had made in the world, and the contempt some cast on him; even as Christ Himself was crucified through weakness, or appeared in his crucifixion as weak and contemptible, but liveth by the power of God, or in his resurrection and life manifests his divine power, v. 4. So the apostles, how mean and contemptible soever they appeared to the world, did yet, as instruments, manifest the power of God, and particularly the power of his grace, in converting the world to Christianity. Therefore, as a proof unto those who among the Corinthians sought a proof of Christ’s speaking in the apostle, he puts them on proving their Christianity, v. 5. intimating, that if they could prove their own Christianity, this would be a proof of his apostleship; for if they were in the faith, if Jesus Christ was in them, this was a proof that Christ spoke in him, because it was by his ministry they did believe; and it could not be imagined, that a divine power should go along with his ministrations, if he had not his commission from on high. If therefore they could prove themselves not to be reprobates, not to be rejected of Christ, he trusted they should know that he was not a reprobate, v. 6. not disowned by Christ.

What the apostle here says of the duty of the Corinthians, to examine themselves, &c. with the particular view already mentioned, is applicable to the great duty of all who call themselves Christians, to examine themselves concerning their spiritual state. It is a matter in which we may be easily deceived, and wherein a deceit is highly dangerous: we are therefore concerned to prove our own selves, to put the question to our own souls, whether Christ be in us, or not; and Christ is in us, except we be reprobates: so that either we are true Christians, or great cheats; and what a reproach for a man not to know himself, nor his own mind!

V. 7—10. 1. Here is the apostle’s prayer yet, long after this, confessed, that ‘he had not already attained.’ Phil. 3:12—14. and thus we may be excited to pray for an increase of faith, love, and patience.—No excellency of spirit or conduct can silence calumny; and if we were even as holy as Paul, some would revile us as ‘crafty men, who took others by guile.’ It is well when we can disprove such slanders, and when fellow-laborers ‘walk in the same spirit and steps.’—But how can faithful ministers be expected to prove such as their people desire, when they witness among them those contentions, envies, slanders, whisperings, boastings, and tumults, which not only grieve and humble them, but also disgrace the Gospel? Yet we need not despond on this account, for it was so even in the apostle’s days. But while we observe, that ‘the enemy hath done this,’ we should not forget to add, that it was by means of antinomian and self-conceited teachers, and perhaps through our own unwatchfulness, or carnal and undecided conduct.

V. 5, 6. Some expositors render the clause, ‘Christ is among you, except. &c.’ but this conveys no definite idea. The apostle could not mean to intimate, that Christ was not at all present in the church at Corinth; for this would have contradicted all the declarations he made concerning them; and the presence of Christ among them could not prove that those individuals whom he warned were true believers, and approved by God; yet this was the precise point which he exhorted them personally to examine. (6) Reprobates.] ‘Thus the apostle calls, in this place, not those who are divinely elected to eternal life, (for they who still continue in their sins, not being yet effectually called, are not directly to be considered as “vessels of wrath;” nor those who, after their calling, fall into grievous sins,) but such as are not at present approved.’ Beza.—It does not appear that either the original word, or our English word ‘reprobates,’ is ever in Scripture used as the opposite to ‘elect,’ or indeed with direct reference to election; and as to reprobation, it is, I apprehend, a scriptural idea, (for those who are not ‘chosen,’ must be rejected, or passed by,) but not a scriptural word in any sense. *10:17, 18. SCOTT.

(5.) Reprobates.] Adokimoi: it may have here a middle sense, between the primitive one, not genuine, or adulterated, and reprobate, viz. rejectanei. Wherever else Paul uses the word, he has intended by it, corrupt, worthless, good for nothing. All the ancient comtrs., and the most judicious modern ones, are agreed, that the apostle has reference solely to the corrupt lives of some, and those vices he had charged on them elsewhere, and at 12:21. The context shows, he refers them to the miraculous powers in some, and the total reformation of life in others, as a proof of the divine authority by which he imparted the one and produced the other.

on behalf of the Corinthians, that they might do no evil, v. 7. This is the most desirable thing we can ask of God, both for ourselves and our friends, to be kept from sin, that we and they may do no evil; and it is most needful, that we often pray to God for his grace to keep us, because without that we cannot keep ourselves. PRACT. OBS. All rigorous measures should be preceded by long patience and many warnings; when the case will admit of them, and with caution and deliberation, on sure grounds, and with firmness of mind.—Those who will not be convinced by the abundant evidences already afforded, that Christ speaks by his faithful ministers, will at length experience a very awful demonstration of it. We should, therefore, diligently and impartially, 'examine ourselves whether we are in the faith;' 1 Cor. 11:23—23, and, instead of imagining, that it is always unbelief to doubt of our acceptance, we should daily bring the whole of our faith, experience, motives, comforts, affections, words, and works, to be assayed by the touchstone of the Scriptures; that we may get well acquainted with ourselves; obtain an assurance that will not shrink from investigation, and possess that 'hope, which maketh not ashamed, because the love of God is shed abroad in our hearts by the

V. 11. Be perfect.] 'i. e. strive after reformation and perfection.' Id.

'The crime which, in the judgment of Paul, merited casting out [of communion], he designates (Ti. 3:10.) by the term heretical (haireticon), which, in the English language, distinctly refers to one who denies a fundamental doctrine of Christianity. The original word, also, sometimes seems to have this sense; but more frequently it signifies a schismatic, one who makes a division, or forms a sect. . . . Paul wholly repudiates those divisions, grounded on diversity of sentiment, which would render it possible for a brother Christian, when ejected from one portion of the Savior's church, to find admission to another. . . .

The primitive import of the Greek word hairesis (heresy) is, selection, choice, [note, 1 Cor. 11:19.] Thus it is used by many ancient Greek writers: as the expression of Æschines Socrat. (dial. ii, 3.) appropriately exemplifies: ei de tis soi didoiē hairetin toutoin, poteron an bouloio, [i. e. if one should give you your choice of or from them, which would you rather have.] In this sense it is used by the Sept. (Lev. 27:18, 21.) as equivalent to the Heb. ndbh, free will, voluntarily. It is also employed to designate a peculiar kind of discipline, or mode of living, that has been voluntarily assumed. But its more common signification is schism, division, sect. Thus Dion. Hal. (ep. l. ad Anmænum, c. 7.) says, of Aristotle: He was not the leader or head of a school; nor did he form a sect (hairetin) of his own. It is used by classic writers, to designate the several philosophic sects, the isters of the Gospel, is, that the Gospel they preach may be honored, however their persons be vilified. The best way to adorn our holy religion, is, to do what is honest, and of good report; to walk as becomes the Gospel.

(2.) Another reason was, that they might be free from all blame and censure when he should come to them, intimated v. 8. If they did not evil, nor act contrary to their profession of the Gospel, the apostle had no power or authority to punish them. He had said before, ch. 10:8. and says here, v. 10. The power which the Lord has given me, was to edification, not to destruction. So that, although he had great powers committed to him for the credit and advancement of the Gospel, yet he could not do anything to the disparagement of the truth, or the discouragement of them who obeyed it. 'We are glad,' says he, v. 9. 'when we are weak, and ye are strong; i. e. that we have no power to censure those who are strong in faith, and fruitful in good works.' Some understand this passage thus; 'Though we are weak through persecutions and contempt, we bear it patiently, and also joyfully, while we see that ye are strong, ye are prosperous in holiness, and persevering in well doing.' For,

(3.) He desired their perfection, v. 9. i. e. that they might be sincere, and aim at perfection; or else he wished them a thorough reformation. He not only desired they might be kept from sin, but also might grow in grace, and holiness; and that all that was amiss among them might be rectified and reformed. This was the great end of his writing this epistle, and that freedom he used with them by writing these things, those friendly admonitions and warnings, being absent, that so, being present, he should not use sharpness, v. 10. not proceed to the utmost extremity in the exercise of the power given him as an apostle, to [punish] all disobedience, ch. 10:6.

Holy Ghost.' Rom. 5:3—5. For except 'Jesus Christ be in us,' by his Spirit, his image, and the governing power of his love, our faith is dead, and we are as yet disapproved by our Judge. While ministers give these warnings, they should also look well to themselves. For nothing can be imagined equally dreadful with the case of those, who have instructed, warned, reproved, and expostulated with others on these infinitely important subjects, and have been eventually successful in their endeavors, if they themselves should be found reprobates, and be finally rejected as hypocrites. May God preserve all of us from this awful doom!—And may we at all times, when these [concluding words of benediction] are on our lips, or spoken in our hearing, so enter into the meaning of them, with fervent affections, and enlarged desires and expectations, that the blessings prayed for by them may be upon us and all our fellow-worshippers, now and for evermore! Amen. SCOTT.

V. 13. 'The remarkable analogy the latter clause bears to each of the two preceding, must naturally lead us to understand, that the Holy Ghost is not here spoken of as a mere quality, or agent.' SLADE. BLOMF.

V. 14. This most comprehensive benediction has generally been adopted in the worship of Christians, when about to separate; but alas, it is too evident, that most in our congregations, not to say of the officiating ministers, regard it as a mere form. SCOTT.

Stoics, the Epicureans, the Peripatetics, &c. It occurs 9 times in the N. T., and in the majority of cases it is tr. sect., in the com. vers. In the other cases, it might with equal propriety be rendered in the same way, (2 Pet. 2:1. 1 Cor. 11:9.) as indeed it is by many distinguished translators. In its primitive and most current signification, therefore, the word (hairesis) conveys no reproach. It is used to designate the sect of Pharisees (Ac. 15:5. 25:6.), the sect of the Sadducees (5:17.), and the sect of the Nazarenes or Christians, (24:5, 14. 28:22.) In all the passages where it is rendered sect., in the com. vers. it signifies a party of persons who have separated themselves from others professedly pursuing the same end, over whom they profess to have some advantages. Here we have sects substantially corresponding to those of our days; sects based not on geographical lines, but on doctrinal diversities like our own, and yet what does Paul say concerning such sects in the church of Christ? Using the very same word by which he designated the sect of the Pharisees, (in an adjective form,) he declares, him that is a sectarian man, (haireticon anthrōpon), an originator or supporter of sects in the Christian church, after the first and second admonition, reject, exclude from your communion and intercourse; avoid. Here we have the apostle again distinctly condemning the formation of sects in the Christian church, using the very identical term by which the Pharisees and Sadducees are designated in the N. T. and the several sects of their philosophers by classic Greeks. . . . (Continued on p. 377.)

PAUL'S EPISTLE TO THE GALATIANS, WITH
PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS AND NOTES.

(Henry's Exposition completed by Mr. Bayes.)

It is supposed, that the Galatians retained their native language and customs, at the time when the Gospel was first preached among them. Learned men have shown it to be probable, that this was during the first progress of Paul and Barnabas through those regions, Acts 14. for though Galatia* is not mentioned, yet 'the regions round about Lycaonia,' may be supposed to include Galatia. But some attempts to fix the date of their conversion to an earlier period, are wholly destitute of scriptural proof, and unsupported by any solid argument.—It is plain, that the Galatians were generally idolatrous Gentiles, before their conversion. The apostle was not able to spend much time among them, because of his multiplied engagements; yet he asserts, in a way which challenges refutation, that he conferred miraculous gifts on them, 3:1—5. The way in which he opposes the false gospel, [of the judaizing teachers,] shows, that he considered the very life and soul of Christianity to be at stake. Yet his opposition to this self-righteous perversion of Christianity does not, in the smallest degree, lead him to overlook its holy and practical tendency; and, in this respect, the epistle before us forms a striking contrast to the over zealous and vehement earnestness of numbers, for a part of Christianity, while another part of equal importance is overlooked, if not disparaged. Learned men maintain opinions differing [though but by a few years], as to the time when this epistle was written.†

Christianity was very early planted in Galatia by Paul himself, (Gal. 1:8, 11. 3:1. &c.) and it appears from the Acts, that he visited its churches more than once. Two distinct visits are clearly marked, viz. the first about the year 50, (Acts 16:6.) and the second about the year 54 or 55, (Acts 18:23.) It is evident this epistle was written early, Gal. 1:6. and its warmth induced Tertullian to think it was written when Paul was himself a neophyte, or novice, in the Christian faith. The genuineness of the epistle was never doubted. It is cited by the apostolic fathers, Clement of Rome, Hermas, Ignatius, and Polycarp; and is declared to be authentic by Irenæus, Clement of Alexandria, Tertullian, Caius, Origen, and by all subsequent writers. It was acknowledged to be genuine by the heretic Marcion, who reckoned it the earliest written of all Paul's letters.‡

Unlike the others, this epistle is directed to a country, or province; and it is very probable, that these Galatians were first converted under Paul's ministry; at least he had watered them, as the epistle shows, and also Acts. Now when he was with them, they had expressed the greatest esteem and affection, both for his person and ministry; but he had not been long absent, before some judaizing teachers † got in among them, by whose arts and insinuations they were soon drawn into a meaner opinion both of the one and the other. — What these false teachers chiefly aimed at, was, to draw them off from the truth, particularly in the great doctrine of justification, which they grossly perverted, by asserting the necessity of joining the observance of the law of Moses with faith in Christ, in order to it; and the better to accomplish this their design, they did all they could to lessen the character and reputation of the apostle, and to raise up their own on the ruins of his; representing him as one, who, if he was to be owned as an apostle, yet was much inferior to others, and particularly Peter, James, and John, whose followers, it is likely, they pretended to be; and in both these attempts they had but too great success.

This occasioned the epistle; wherein he expresses his great concern, that they had suffered themselves to be so soon turned aside from the faith of the Gospel; vindicates his own character and authority, as an apostle, against the aspersions of his enemies; showing that his mission and doctrine were both divine, and that he was not, on any account, behind the very chiefest of the apostles, 2 Cor. 11:5. He then asserts and maintains the great gospel-doctrine of justification by faith, without the works of the law, and obviates some difficulties that might arise in their minds concerning it; having done this, he exhorts them to stand fast in the liberty wherewith Christ had made them free; cautions them against the abuse of this liberty, gives them several very needful counsels and directions; and then concludes, with giving them the true character of those false teachers, by whom they had been ensnared, and, on the contrary, his own temper and behavior also; in all which, his great scope and design were, to recover those who had been perverted, to settle those who might be wavering, and to confirm such among them as had kept their integrity. §

Some of Paul's epistles are framed in a regular and connected manner. Their full meaning cannot be perceived, unless they are studied as a whole. In order to reap the full advantages of this mode of study, particular attention must be given to the connectives, or small particles, which have been termed the joints and bands of a discourse. To understand why they are inserted, or what the particular relation or thought is, which they suggest, is absolutely necessary, in order to gain a tolerable acquaintance with such books as the epistles to the Romans, Galatians, or Hebrews.¶

Prof. EDWARDS, 'Notes on Galatians,' 1835.

* Galatia was a province in the N. part of Asia Minor, having Bithynia and Paphlagonia on the N.; Pontus and Cappadocia on the E.; Lycaonia on the S., and Phrygia on the W. It lay a little N. by W. of Tarsus in Cilicia, and Antioch in Syria. Its S. border was about 190 miles from Tarsus, and 240 from Antioch. It was a fertile province, with a pleasant climate, and distinguished, at various times, for wealth and commerce. About B. C. 250, 3 tribes from the N. of Europe, (2 from Gaul and 1 from Germany,) but perfectly alike in language and manners, conquered the country, which by them was called Galatia or Gallogrecia. They were all, perhaps, of German origin. Their chief was named Lutarius. In their new country, they became acquainted with the Greek language, specimens of which, in public documents and inscriptions, yet remain. The Celtic, their original language, however, continued to be spoken for 600 yrs. after their migration. The emigrants preserved their native religion, though they blended with it some of the rites of the ancient inhabitants of the country, among which was the worship of Cybele, or the reputed mother of the gods. This goddess was pictured with turrets on her head. She had a famous statue at Pessinus, and temples were erected to her honor. The Corybantes were her priests, who worshipped her by the sound of drums, tabors, pipes, and cymbals. The principal cities of Galatia were, Ancyra, Tavium, and Pessinus. The Jews were drawn to this province in considerable numbers. A record of the liberties they were permitted to enjoy, was deposited in the temple of Augustus, at Ancyra, under Augustus, 26 B. C. Galatia was reduced to a Roman province, under a propraetor. It has long been under the Turkish government. Angora, the ancient Ancyra, is on a very elevated plain, and contains from 20,000 to 60,000 inhabitants. The streets are wide, and paved with blocks of granite. Some fine remains of antiquity are preserved. The inhabitants are chiefly Armenians. See Texier's travels, 'Notes on Galatians.' Prof. B. B. Benson, Lardner, 53; Beansobre, Ros., Dr. A. C., 52 or 53; and Bp. Tomline, in 52. Theod., Lightf., &c., imagine it written when Paul was in bonds at Rome, but nothing is said in it of bonds, which are often mentioned in letters known to have been written at that time. Besides, it speaks of the speedy backsliding of the Galatians, and Paul's first visit to Rome was ten years after their conversion. Horne. Most, indeed, agree, that the apocryphal postscript which dates it from Rome, contains a direct untruth, [for, says Horne, Paul's first journey to Rome was not till 10 years after the conversion of the Galatians.] It was probably written during the apostle's residence at Corinth; [as it intimates but one visit, and his second visit to them was after leaving Corinth;] though some fix the date of it to the time, during which he abode at Antioch, after his first progress through Asia Minor with Barnabas, and after the council at Jerusalem; but before he set off the second time, with Silas and Timothy, when the decrees were delivered to the churches. Acts 15:30—41. 16:1—5. The former opinion is, however, more generally maintained; indeed, it is not certain, that the apostle had been in Galatia, before his second progress through Asia Minor; Acts 16:6—12. and the objection to the epistle's being written at a later period, arising from the decrees which had been sent by the apostles to the churches, which might, it is thought, have superseded the necessity of it, seems of little weight. The apostles had indeed decided against the ceremonial law being imposed on the Gentile converts; but they had not shown, that the Gentiles, by voluntarily submitting to it, went about to 'establish their own righteousness,' and virtually renounced the Gospel. Scott.

‡ Horne thinks, from Gal. 5:9—10. that only one judaizing teacher is referred to, and adds, 'from 6:12, 13. it appears he was a man of immoral character, who acted, not from any [truly] religious views or motives, but from vainglory and fear: that he might conciliate the favor of the Jews, by increasing the number of proselytes, and so escape the persecutions raised by the unbelieving Jews against Paul, and those who adhered to his doctrines.' CHAP. I. V. 1—5. In these prefatory vs. observe,

1. From whom this epistle is sent,—from Paul an apostle, and all the brethren with him. (1.) Paul only was the penman. And because some among the Galatians endeavored to lessen his character and authority, he in the very front of it gives a general account, both of his office, and of the manner in which he was called to it; which afterward, in this and the following ch., he enlarges more upon. As to his office, he was an apostle, and to let them see that he did not assume this character without just ground, he acquaints them how he was called to this dignity and office,—that it was not of men, neither by man; but by an extraordinary call from heaven; for he was an apostle by Jesus Christ, had his instructions and commission immediately from Him, and consequently from God the Father, who was one with Him, in respect of his divine nature, and who had appointed Him, as Mediator, to be the Apostle and High Priest of our profession, and as such to authorize others to this office. He adds, Who raised Him from the dead; both to acquaint us, that herein God the Father gave a public testimony to Christ's being his Son, and the promised Messiah; and also, that as his call to the apostleship was immediately from Christ, so it was after his resurrection from the dead, and when He was entered on his exalted state; so that he had reason to look upon himself, not only as standing on a level with the other apostles, but as in some sort preferred above them. Thus does the apostle, being constrained to it by his adversaries, magnify his office; which shows that though men should by no means be proud of any authority they possess, yet, at certain times, and on certain occasions, it may be needful to assert it. But, (2.) He joins all the brethren that were with him, in the inscription of the epistle, and writes in their name as well as his own; i. e. either the Christians in common of that place where he now was, or such as were employed as ministers of the Gospel; and in doing this, as he shows his own great modesty and humility, and how remote he was from an assuming temper, so he might do it to dispose these churches to a greater regard to what he wrote; since hereby it would appear, that he had their concurrence with him in the doctrine which he had preached, and was now about to confirm, and that it was no other than what was both published and professed by others as well as himself.

2. To whom it is sent,—to the churches of Galatia. It should seem there were several at that time in this country, and that they all were more or less corrupted, through the arts of those seducers who had crept in among them; though, no doubt, there were some among them, who still continued in the faith, and Paul writes not without hope that others might be recovered to it.

3. The apostolical benediction, v. 3. the usual blessing where with he blesses the churches. Grace includes God's good-will towards us, and his good work upon us; and peace implies all that inward comfort, or outward prosperity, which is really needful for us; they come from God the Father, as the Fountain, through Jesus Christ, as the Channel of conveyance; but we may observe, first grace, and then peace, for there can be no true peace without grace. Having mentioned the Lord Jesus Christ, he cannot pass without enlarging on his love, v. 4. one great end of whose sacrifice, was, not only to redeem us from the wrath of God, and the curse of the law, but also to recover us from the corruption that is in the world through lust, and to rescue us from the vicious practices and customs of it, unto which we are naturally enslaved; and possibly also to set us free from the Mosaic constitution, for so this world is used, 1 Cor. 2: 6, 8. This present world is an evil world; become so by the sin of man, and is so on the account of the sin and sorrow with which it abounds, and the many snares and temptations to which we are exposed, as long as we continue in it. But Jesus Christ has died to deliver us from it, not presently to remove his people out of it, but to rescue them from the power of it, and in due time to possess them of another and better world. This, the apostle informs us, He has done according to the will of God and our Father; i. e. He acted by the appointment of the Father, as well as with his own free consent; and therefore we have the greatest reason to depend on the efficacy and acceptableness of what He has done and suffered for us; yea, from hence we have encouragement to look upon God as our Father, for, being Father of our Lord Jesus, so, in and through Him, He is also the Father of all true believers, John 20: 17.

The apostle, having thus noticed the great love wherewith Christ hath loved us, concludes this preface with a solemn ascription of praise and glory to Him, v. 5. Intimating, that on this account He is justly entitled to our highest esteem and regard. Or, this doxology may be considered as referring both to God the Father and our Lord Jesus Christ, from whom he had just before been wishing grace and peace. Both are the proper objects of our worship and adoration, and all honor and glory are perpetually due to both, on the account of their own infinite excellences, and also on the account of the blessings we receive from them.

V. 6—9. He comes to the body of the epistle; and begins with a more general reproof of these churches for their unsteadiness in the faith, which he afterward enlarges more upon.

I. His concern at their defection; I marvel, &c. It at once filled him with the greatest surprise and sorrow. Their sin and folly were, that they did not hold fast the doctrine of Christianity, as it had been preached to them, but suffered themselves to be removed from the purity and simplicity of it. And several things greatly aggravated their defection; 1. They were removed from Him that called them; not only from the apostle, but from God Himself; so that herein they had been guilty of a great abuse of his kindness and mercy toward them. 2. They had been called into the grace of Christ, i. e. the Gospel, and thereby to partake of the greatest blessings and benefits, such as justification, and reconciliation with God here, and eternal life and happiness hereafter; therefore, in proportion to the greatness of the privilege they enjoyed, such were their sin and folly in deserting it, and suffering themselves to be drawn off from the established way of obtaining these blessings. 3. They were so soon removed. i. e. gave over the hope of justification by NOTES. CHAP. I. V. 1, 2. Ananias baptized Paul, but he neither appointed him to the apostleship, nor instructed him for it.—With him, all the brethren (probably the ministers were intended) who were then with the apostle, joined in this epistle, as testifying the facts, and concurring in the doctrines, contained in it.—Perhaps the apostle meant to distinguish himself from those, who were constituted by the apostles . . . and sent by them to different places, being peculiarly named evangelists. Of this kind, were Timothy, Titus, Luke, and other companions of Paul, who were celebrated in his epistles, and the Acts. Beza.—The epistle was addressed to 'the churches of Galatia,' but he did not call them 'saints,' perhaps because, as they had departed from the faith in the fundamental article of justification, 'he stood in doubt of them.' 4:17—20.

V. 3—5. Rom. 1:5—7. 1 Cor. 1:3. Some, indeed, interpret the words, which we render 'this present evil world,' of the Mosaic dispensation, . . . but the preceding explanation [that in Henry] is far more extensive and natural; most of the Galatians were Gentiles, before their conversion, and even the ritual law of Moses is never called 'evil,' in Scripture, much less the whole Mosaic dispensation; so that the interpretation is wholly inadmissible.

V. 6—10. It is remarkable, in how different a manner the apostle addressed the Galatians, than he did the Corinthians. It has been shown, that he used the utmost caution, and the most delicate and consummate management, [skill,] in undermining the influence, and counteracting the delusions, of the false teachers at Corinth. (Pref. 1 Cor.) but he at once and abruptly attacked the error of the Galatians, in a direct and open manner, without any circumlocution. The Corinthians had indeed 'built wood, hay, stubble,' on 'the good Foundation,' but the Galatians were attempting to lay a wrong foundation. The former 'might be saved as by fire,' notwithstanding errors and abuses, but the latter must perish, unless recovered from their infatuation. 1 Cor. 3:10—15. In the former case, the errors had been introduced more plausibly, and had diffused their baleful influence more gradually; the tares were so mingled with the wheat, that they could not be plucked up by a rough hand, without the greatest danger, and much caution was requisite, lest Satan should get still further advantages. Mat. 13:36—43. 2 Cor. 2:5—11. But in Galatia, the error was simple and fundamental, it was a virtual renunciation of the Gospel, and destructive in its very nature. The persons, who propagated 'another Gospel,' in Galatia, were as determined enemies to true Christianity, as 'the false apostles,' at Corinth, and more evidently so; but they were not equal to them in ingenuity. 2 Cor. 11:13—15. The detection of their error, also, lay within a small compass, their example was of a most dangerous tendency, their progress was likely to be very rapid, unless effectually checked, and therefore the apostle opened his subject, in the language of astonishment at the conduct of the Galatians. (10) Should not be, &c. 'This is a cutting reproof to all those ministers, who either alter or conceal the doctrines of the Gospel, for fear of displeasing their hearers, or to gain popularity.' Mackn.

(7.) Trouble, &c. 'Harass your minds with vain doubts, whether the Mosaic law is to be retained in the gospel of Christ.' Pervert. 'Not only corrupt, but also overturn.' So Mackn.

9 As we said before, so say I now again, If any man preach any other <sup>m</sup>gospel unto you than that ye have received, let him be accursed.

10 For do I now persuade men, or God? or do I seek to <sup>n</sup>please men? for if I yet pleased men, I should not <sup>o</sup>be the servant of Christ.

11 But I certify you, brethren, that the gospel which was preached of me is not after man.

12 For <sup>p</sup>I neither received it of man, neither was I taught it, but by the revelation <sup>q</sup>of Jesus Christ.

13 For ye have heard of my conversation in time past in the Jews' religion, how that beyond measure I persecuted the church <sup>r</sup>of God, and wasted it;

14 And profited in the Jews' religion above many my <sup>s</sup>equals in mine own nation, being <sup>t</sup>more exceedingly zealous of the traditions <sup>u</sup>of my fathers.

15 But when it pleased God, <sup>v</sup>who separated me from my mother's womb, and called me by his grace,

16 To reveal <sup>w</sup>his Son in me, that <sup>x</sup>I might preach him among the heathen; immediately I conferred not with flesh and <sup>y</sup>blood:

17 Neither went I up to Jerusalem to them which were apostles before me; but I went into Arabia, and returned again unto Damascus.

18 Then <sup>z</sup>after three years I <sup>a</sup>went up to Jerusalem to see Peter, and abode with him fifteen days.

19 But other of the apostles saw I none, save James <sup>b</sup>the Lord's brother.

judaising teachers, called another Gospel, because it [pretended to] open a different way of justification and salvation from that revealed in the Gospel; namely, by works, and not by faith in Christ; and yet not another; not really another Gospel, but the perverting of the Gospel of Christ; it intimates, the great folly and sin of those who go about to establish any other way to heaven, than what the Gospel of Christ has revealed.

Thus he endeavors to impress on these Galatians a due sense of their guilt in forsaking the gospel-way of justification; yet at the same time he tempers his reproof with mildness and tenderness, and represents them as rather drawn into it by the arts and industry of some that troubled them, than as coming into it of their own accord; hereby he teaches us, that in reproving others, as we should be faithful, so we should also be gentle, and endeavor to restore them in the spirit of meekness, ch. 6: 1.

II. His confidence, that the Gospel he had preached to them was the only true Gospel; he was so fully persuaded of this, that he pronounces an anathema on those who pretended to preach any other Gospel, v. 8. and, to let them see that it did not proceed from any rashness or intemperate zeal in him, he repeats it again, v. 9. This will not justify our thundering out [uninspired] anathemas against those who differ from us in less things. He puts the case; not as if it were possible for an angel from heaven to be the messenger of a lie; but it is expressed so, the more to strengthen what he was about to say. 'If you have any other Gospel preached to you by any other person, under our name, or under color of having it from an angel himself, you must conclude that you are imposed on; and whoever preaches another Gospel, lays himself under a curse, and is in danger of laying you under it too.'

V. 10—24. Paul having more generally, in the preface of this epistle, declared himself to be an apostle of Christ, here he comes more directly to support his claim. Some in Galatia were prevailed with to call it in question; they who preached up the ceremonial law, did all they could to lessen his reputation; therefore he here sets himself to prove the divinity both of his mission and doctrine. This he gives sufficient evidence of,

I. From the scope and design of his ministry, which was not to persuade men, but God, &c. i. e. in his preaching the Gospel he did not act in obedience to men, but God, who had called him to this work and office; or his aim therein was to bring persons to the obedience, not of men, but of God. He did not, in his doctrine, accommodate himself to the humors of persons, either to gain their affection, or to avoid their resentment; but his great care was to approve himself to God. The judaising teachers, by whom these churches were corrupted, had discovered a very different temper; they mixed works with faith, and the law with the gospel, only to please the Jews, whom they were willing to court and keep in with, that they might escape persecution. But Paul would not alter the doctrine of Christ, either to gain their favor, or to avoid their fury. And he gives this very good reason for it; that, if he yet pleased men, he should not be the servant of Christ. He would not needlessly displease any, yet he dares not allow himself to gratify men at the expense of his faithfulness to Christ. Thus, from the sincerity of his aims and intentions in the discharge of his office, he proves that he was truly an apostle of Christ. But if this argument should not be thought sufficient, he goes on to prove his apostleship,

II. From the manner in which he received the Gospel; concerning which he assures them, v. 11, 12. that he had it not by information from others, but by revelation from heaven. Ordinary ministers, as they receive their call to preach the Gospel by the mediation of others, so it is by means of the instruction and assistance of others that they are brought to the knowledge of it. But Paul acquaints them, that he had his knowledge of the Gospel, as well as his authority to preach it, directly from the Lord Jesus; the Gospel he preached was not after man; he neither received it of man, nor was he taught it by man, but by immediate inspiration, or revelation from Christ Himself. This he was concerned to make out, to prove himself an apostle; and to this purpose,

1. He tells them what his education was, and what, accordingly, his conversation in time past had been, v. 13, 14. Particularly, he acquaints them, that he had been brought up in the Jewish religion, and had been exceedingly zealous of such doctrines and customs as had been invented by their fathers, and conveyed down from them; yea, he had been not only a rejecter of the Christian religion, but a persecutor of it, too, even beyond measure. This Paul often notices, for the magnifying of that free and rich grace, which had wrought so wonderful a change in him, whereby of so great a sinner he was made a sincere penitent, and from a persecutor was become an apostle. And it was very fit to mention it here; for from hence it would appear, that he was not led to Christianity, as many are, purely by education; and they might reasonably suppose, it must be something very extraordinary, which had made so great a change in him, and brought him not only to profess, but to preach, that doctrine, which he had before so vehemently opposed.

2. In how wonderful a manner he was turned from the error of his ways, brought to the knowledge and faith of Christ, and appointed to the office of an apostle, v. 15, 16. This was done in an extraordinary

V. 11—14. 'A revelation of the facts and doctrines of Christianity, immediately from Christ Himself, without the assistance of any human teacher, so wonderfully agreeing in all its branches with that which Christ had taught on earth, both before and after his resurrection, was so extraordinary an event, and of so great importance to those whom St. Paul visited, and to whom he wrote, that one cannot wonder he should think proper to assert it in so solemn a manner.' Doddr.—The marked distinction between being 'taught by man,' and 'by the revelation of Jesus Christ,' is a clear proof of our Lord's Deity.—'In this respect, Paul seems to have been, in a measure, superior to the other apostles, whom Christ instructed on earth, after the manner of men.' The apostle, however, speaks of immediate, prophetic revelation, and not of ordinary divine teaching.—'Since we are told, (Acts 9: 19.) that after Saul recovered his sight and strength, he was certain days with the disciples at Damascus, during which he preached Christ in the synagogues; . . . we must admit, that . . . he spent a few days in preaching at Damascus, and then retired into Arabia, . . . to receive further revelations.' The arguments stated by Borger, are these: 1st. There is no necessity for taking the Gr. [adelphos] of a brother. It may be understood of a near kinsman. See Schl. 2d. manner, in pursuance of a divine purpose concerning him, whereby he was appointed to be a Christian and an apostle, before he came into the world, or had done either good or evil. He was called by his grace. All who are savingly converted, are called by the grace of God; but there was something peculiar in the case of Paul, both in the suddenness and in the greatness of the change wrought in him, and also in the manner wherein it was effected, which was not by the mediation of others, as the instruments of it, but by Christ's personal appearance to him, and immediate operation on him,

PRACT. OBS. All authority and ability to preach the Gospel must come 'from Jesus Christ, and from God the Father who hath raised Him from the dead.' We ought also to pray for 'grace and peace from God the Father and our Lord Jesus Christ,' in behalf of those, of whom we doubt whether they be true saints.—The consciousness of being rescued and separated from those, who were our companions in sin, made victorious over the fear of men, and the love of the world, enabled to refuse conformity to it, and to live a spiritual and heavenly life on earth, forms the proper evidence of justification in the righteousness of Christ, and through faith in Him; yet numbers, who profess evangelical doctrines, seem to have no inclination to this part of God's salvation. But, as they are not 'delivered from this present evil world,' by the sanctification of the Spirit, it is presumptuous in them to expect exemption from its condemnation by the blood of Jesus.—While we strenuously maintain, that every kind and degree of antinomianism, eventually and powerfully tends to dishonor Christ, and destroy true religion, we must also declare, in the most decided manner, that all dependence on good works, real or supposed, for justification, is still more fatal to the individuals who persist in it, at least after the truth has been fully and repeatedly set before them. No wonder, that the preachers of morality and good works, as the foundation for the sinner's hope of acceptance, or in any degree conducive to his justification, are so evidently unsuccessful in their attempts to make men virtuous.—While we zealously preach and diligently practise 'good works,' for evangelical purposes, let us be even still more careful, if possible, not to put anything which we do, in the place of 'that righteousness of God which is unto and upon all that believe,' and not to advance anything, which may betray others into so fatal a delusion. Rom. 3:21—26. Phil. 3:8—11.

'Righteousness by works' is the sum of the doctrine of the devil and of the world from the beginning. Gen. 3:5. 4:8. . . . Wherefore I do admonish you, especially such as shall become instructors and guides of consciences, and also every one apart, that ye exercise yourselves con-whereby it was rendered a more special and extraordinary instance of divine power and favor. He had Christ revealed in him. It will but little avail us to have Christ revealed to us, if He is not also revealed in us. He is brought to the knowledge of Christ and his Gospel by special and immediate revelation; with this design, that he should preach Him among the heathen; not only embrace Him himself, but preach Him to others; so that he was both a Christian and an apostle by revelation.

3. He acquaints them how he behaved himself hereupon, v. 16. to the end; being thus called to this work and office, he did not consult men, even at Jerusalem, as though he needed to be approved by them, or to receive instructions or authority from them; but instead of that, he went into Arabia, either as a place of retirement proper for receiving further divine revelations, or in order to preach the Gospel there among the Gentiles; thence he returned again to Damascus, where he had first begun his ministry, and from whence he had with difficulty escaped the rage of his enemies, Acts 9. In short, it could not well be pretended that he was indebted to any other, either for his knowledge of the Gospel, or his authority to preach it; but it appeared that both his qualifications for, and his call to, the apostolic office were extraordinary and divine. This account being of importance, to establish his claim to this office, to remove the unjust censures of his adversaries, and to recover the Galatians from the impressions they had received to his prejudice, he confirms it by a solemn oath, v. 20. declaring, as in the presence of God, that what he had said was strictly true, and that he had not in the least falsified in what he had related; which, though it will not justify us in solemn appeals to God on every occasion, yet shows that, in matters of weight and moment, this sometimes may not only be lawful, but duty. After this he acquaints them, that he came into the regions of Syria and Cilicia; having made this short visit to Peter, he returns to his work again; he had no communication at that time with the churches of Christ in Judea, they had not so much as seen his face; only they had heard of his remarkable conversion, which the very report of, as it filled them with joy, so it excited them to give glory to God on the account of it.

CHAP. II. The apostle, in this ch., continues the relation of his past life and conduct; and, by some further instances of what had passed between him and the other apostles, makes it appear that he was not beholden to them, either for his knowledge of the Gospel, or his authority as an apostle, as his adversaries would insinuate; but, on the contrary, that he was owned and approved even by them, as having an equal commission with them to this office.

V. 1—10. It should seem, by Paul's account of himself in this ch., that from the very first preaching and planting of Christianity, there was a difference of apprehension between those Christians who had first been Jews, and those who had first been Gentiles. Many of the former, strove to keep up the reputation of the ceremonial law; while the latter had no regard to this, but took pure Christianity as perfective of natural religion, and resolved to adhere to that. Peter was the apostle of the circumcision; and the ceremonial law, though dead with Christ, yet not being as yet buried, he connived at the respect kept up for it. Paul was the apostle of the Gentiles; and though a Hebrew of the Hebrews, yet he adhered to pure Christianity. Now he tells us what passed between him and the other apostles, and particularly Peter, hereupon, on another journey he took to Jerusalem, v. 1—11. And here he acquaints us, with,

I. Some circumstances relating to this his journey. 1. The time of it; not till 14 years after the former, mentioned ch. 1:18. or, as others choose, from his conversion, or from the death of Christ. And it was some evidence he had no dependence on the other apostles, but an equal authority with them, that he had been so long absent from them, and all the while employed in preaching and propagating pure Christianity, without being called into question by them for it; which they would have done, had he been inferior, and his doctrine disapproved. 2. His companions in it, Barnabas and Titus. If the continually, by study, by reading, by meditation of the Word, and by prayer, that in the time of temptation ye may be able to instruct and comfort both your own consciences and others, and to bring them from the law to grace; from Moses to Christ; from the active and working righteousness, to the passive and received righteousness. . . . When I have this [latter] righteousness reigning in my heart, I descend from heaven, as the rain making fruitful the earth, i. e. I come forth into another kingdom, and I do good works, how and wheresoever occasion is offered; if I be a minister of the Word, I preach, I comfort the broken-hearted, I administer the sacraments; if I be a householder, I govern my house and my family, I bring up my children in the knowledge and fear of God; if I be a magistrate, the charge that is given me from above, I diligently execute; if I be a servant, I do my Master's business faithfully; to conclude, whosoever he be that is assuredly persuaded that Christ is his righteousness, doth not only cheerfully and gladly work well in his vocation, but also submitteth himself through love to the magistrates, and to their laws; yea, though they be severe, sharp, and cruel, and (if necessity do so require) to all manner of burdens, and to all dangers of this present life, because he knoweth that this is the will of God; and that this obedience pleaseth Him.<sup>7</sup>

Ministers should be careful not to receive or preach a carnalized Gospel [nor a Gospel of the lower propensities], and not to rest in human teaching, but to study the written revelation of Jesus Christ, and to pray continually for 'the Spirit of wisdom and revelation' in the knowledge of Him, that they may 'please men' only for their good, and to their edification, and not desire to please them any further.—Though, in ordinary cases, it would be presumptuous for new converts, or young ministers, to disregard the counsels of such as have before been employed in the work of Christ, yet that love to Christ and the souls of men, which renders them superior to lucrative considerations, and ready to endure hardships in order to spread the Gospel, is a good evidence, that the Lord is preparing them for future usefulness. SCOTT.

than the apostles. But if this be true, it is clear that James, the brother of our Lord, was James, son of Alphaeus, an apostle of Jesus, and likewise his cousin. That an apostle must be understood, is plain from 2:9. and is required by Ac. 9:27, 28.<sup>7</sup>

NOTES. CHAP. II. V. 1—5. It appears from the history, that Paul and Barnabas went up from Antioch to carry the alms of the Christians in that city to the elders at Jerusalem. But they had at that time no special business with the apostles, and it is not certain that they saw any of them. Acts 11:27—30. The journey, however, here mentioned, most evidently is that recorded by the historian, when they went up on purpose about the very question, which Paul was here debating with the journey here spoken of was the same with that recorded Acts 15. as many think, then we have a plain reason why Barnabas went along with him; for he was chosen by the Christians at Antioch, to be his companion and associate in the affair he went about. But as it does not appear that Titus was put into the same commission with him, so the chief reason of his taking him along with him, seems to have been, to let them at Jerusalem see, that he was neither ashamed nor afraid to own the doctrine he had constantly preached; for though Titus was now become not only a convert to the Christian faith, but a preacher of it too, yet he was by birth a Gentile, and uncircumcised; and therefore, by his making him his companion, it appeared that his doctrine and practice were of a piece; and that as he had preached the non-necessity of circumcision, and observing the law of Moses, so he was ready to own and converse with those who were uncircumcised. 3. The reason of it; he went up by revelation, not of his own head, much less as being summoned to appear there, but by special order and direction from heaven. It was a privilege this apostle was often favored with, to be under a special divine conduct in his motions and undertakings; and though this is what we have no reason to expect, yet it should teach us, in everything of moment we go about, to endeavor, as far as we are capable, to see our way made plain before us, and to commit ourselves to the guidance of Providence.

II. His behavior while at Jerusalem; such as made it appear that he was not in the least inferior to the other apostles in authority or qualifications.

1. His account of his doctrine and labors; in relation to which, observe both his faithfulness and prudence. He gave a free and fair account of the doctrine he had all along preached among the Gentiles, and was still resolved to preach,—that of pure Christianity, free from all mixtures of Judaism; yet he chooses rather to do it in a more private than in a public way, and to them that were of reputation, i. e. to the apostles themselves, or to the chief among the Jewish Christians, rather than more openly and promiscuously to all; because, when he came to Jerusalem, there were multitudes that believed, and yet continued zealous for the law, Acts 21:20. And the reason of this his caution, was, lest he should run, or had run, in vain; lest he should stir up opposition against him, and thereby either the success of his past labors should be lessened, or his future usefulness be obstructed: for nothing more hinders the progress of the Gospel, than differences of opinion about its doctrines; especially when they occasion quarrels and contentions among professors, as they too usually do. It was enough to his purpose, to have his doctrine owned by those who were of greatest authority, whether it was approved by others or not. This conduct of the apostle may teach all, and especially ministers, how much need they have of prudence, and how careful they should be to use it on all occasions, as far as is consistent with their faithfulness.

2. His firm adherence to the doctrine he had preached. He had Titus with him, who was a Greek, yet he would not suffer him to be circumcised, because he would not betray the doctrine of Christ, as he had preached it to the Gentiles. It does not appear that the apostles at all insisted on this; for though they connived at the use of circumcision among the Jewish converts, they were not for imposing it on the Gentiles. Some others did, whom the apostle here calls false brethren; and concerning whom he informs us, that they were unawares brought in, i. e. into the church, or into their company, and that they came only to see whether Paul would defend that freedom from the ceremonial law, which he had taught as the doctrine of the Gospel, and represented as the privilege of those who embraced the Christian religion. Their design was, to bring them into bondage, which they would have effected, could they have gained their point; for had they prevailed with Paul and the other apostles to circumcise Titus, they would easily have imposed circumcision on other Gentiles, and so have brought them under the bondage of the law of Moses. But Paul, seeing their design, would by no means yield to them; no, not for an hour, not even in this one single instance; and the reason was, that the truth of the Gospel might continue with them; that the Gentile Christians, and particularly the Galatians, might have it preserved to them pure and entire, and not corrupted with the mixtures of Judaism. Circumcision was at that time a thing indifferent, and what in some cases might be complied with without sin; as even Paul himself gave way to it in the case of Timothy, Acts 16:3. But when it is insisted on as necessary, and his consenting to it, though only in a single instance, was likely to be improved as giving countenance to such an imposition, he has too great a concern for the purity and liberty of the Gospel, to submit to it; he would not yield to those who were for the Mosaic rites and ceremonies, but would stand fast in the liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free. Which conduct of his may give us occasion to observe, That what under some circumstances may lawfully be complied with, yet when that cannot be done without betraying the truth, or giving up the liberty, of the Gospel, it ought to be refused.

3. His interview with the other apostles, and its result, v. 6—10. He grants they were deservedly in repute, and looked upon by all as pillars of the church, and that on some accounts they might seem to have the advantage of him, in that they had seen Christ in the flesh, which he had not, and were apostles before him, yea even while he continued a persecutor. But yet, whatever they were, this was no prejudice to his being equally an apostle with them; for God does not accept the persons of men on the account of any such outward advantages; and in conference they added nothing to him, told him nothing but what he before knew by revelation, nor could they except against the doctrine he communicated to them; from whence it appeared, that he was not at all inferior to them, but was as much called and qualified to be an apostle, as they themselves were. And they were not only satisfied with his doctrine, but saw a divine power attend-

Galatians. Acts 15:1—11.—Most expositors date this journey 14 years after the apostle's conversion, which scarcely allows sufficient time for all the intervening transactions, and it seems more obvious to compute the years, from the first journey before mentioned. 1:15—24. There is, however, but little certainty in the computation of times, even by the most learned chronologers, as to the date of the apostle's conversion, subsequent history, and the writing of his epistles; and exactness in this respect is comparatively of little importance. V. 10. 'The Jews' superiority being done away, it might be feared the poor of the parent country would be neglected; and this would have been both detrimental to the welfare of the church, and peculiarly hard. For they bore the chief brunt of the hostility and persecution from Jews to Jewish Christians (even to the stripping them of all their property, and reducing them to beggary); and as the Gentiles might be said to reap the benefit of this strenuous testimony to the truth of the Gospel, 11 But when Peter was come to Antioch, I withstood him to the face, because he was to be blamed.

12 For before that certain came from James, he did eat with the Gentiles: but when they were come, he withdrew and separated himself, fearing them which were of the circumcision.

13 And the other Jews dissembled likewise with him; insomuch that Barnabas also was carried away with their dissimulation.

14 But when I saw that they walked not uprightly, according to the truth of the gospel, I said unto Peter before them all, If thou, being a Jew, livest after the manner of Gentiles, and not as do the Jews, why compellest thou the Gentiles to live as do the Jews?

15 We who are Jews by nature, and not sinners of the Gentiles,

16 Knowing that a man is not justified by the works of the law, but by the faith of Jesus Christ, even we have believed in Jesus Christ, that we might be justified by the faith of Christ, and not by the works of the law: for by the works of the law shall no flesh be justified.

17 But if, while we seek to be justified by Christ, we ourselves also are found sinners, is therefore Christ the minister of sin? God forbid.

ing him, both in preaching it, and in working miracles for the confirmation of it; from which they justly concluded, that the Gospel of the uncircumcision was committed to Paul, as the Gospel of the circumcision was to Peter. Therefore, perceiving the grace given to him; that he was designed to the honor and office of an apostle, as well as themselves; they gave unto him and Barnabas the right hands of fellowship, a symbol whereby they acknowledged their equality with them, and agreed that these should go to the heathen, while they continued to preach to the circumcision; as judging it most agreeable to the mind of Christ, and most conducive to the interest of Christianity, so to divide their work. And thus this meeting ended in an entire harmony and agreement; they approved both Paul's doctrine and conduct, they were fully satisfied in him, heartily embraced him as an apostle of Christ, and had nothing further to add, only that they would remember the poor, which of his own accord he was very forward to do. The Christians of Judca were at that time laboring under great wants and difficulties; and the apostles, out of their compassion to them, and concern for them, recommend their case to Paul, that he should use his interest with the Gentile churches to procure a supply for them. And he very readily falls in with it, whereby he showed his charitable and catholic disposition; how ready he was to own the Jewish converts as brethren, though many of them could scarcely allow the like favor to the converted Gentiles; and that mere difference of opinion was no reason with him, why he should not endeavor to relieve and help them. Herein he has given us an excellent pattern of Christian charity, and has taught us, that we should by no means confine it to those who are just of the same sentiments with us, but be ready to extend it to all whom we have reason to look upon as the disciples of Christ.

V. 11—21. Here, to give the greater weight to what he had already said, and more fully to fortify the Galatians, against the insinuations of the judaizing teachers, Paul acquaints them with another interview he had with Peter at Antioch, v. 11—14. There is no color of reason for supposing that Peter was bishop of Antioch. Had he been, surely Paul would not have withstood him in his own church, as here; but, on the contrary, it is here spoken of as an occasional visit Peter made thither. In their other meeting, Peter and the other apostles had both acknowledged Paul's commission, and approved his doctrine, and they parted very well agreed. But in this Paul finds himself obliged to oppose Peter, for he was to be blamed; a plain evidence that Paul was not inferior to him, and, consequently, of the weakness of the pope's pretence to supremacy and infallibility, as the successor of Peter.

I. Peter's fault. When he came among the Gentile churches, he complied with them, and did eat with them, though they were not circumcised; agreeably to the instructions given in particular to him, Acts 10. when he was warned by the heavenly vision, to call nothing common or unclean. But when there came some Jewish Christians from Jerusalem, he grew more shy of the Gentiles, only to humor them of the circumcision, and for fear of giving them offence, which doubtless was to the great grief and discouragement of the Gentile churches. Then he withdrew, and separated himself. His fault herein had an ill influence on others, for the other Jews also dissembled with him; though before they might be better disposed, yet now, from his example, they took on them to scruple eating with the Gentiles, and pretended they could not in conscience do it, because they were not circumcised. And Barnabas himself, one of the apostles of the Gentiles, was carried away with their dissimulation. Here note, the weakness and inconstancy of the best of men, when left to themselves, and the great force of bad examples, especially of great and good men, such as are in reputation for wisdom and honor.

II. The rebuke Paul gave him for his fault. Notwithstanding Peter's character, yet, when he observes him thus behaving himself, to the great prejudice both of the truth of the Gospel and the peace of the church, he is not afraid to reprove him for it. Paul adhered resolutely to his principles, when others faltered in theirs. One part of Peter's conduct was a contradiction to the other; for if he, who was a Jew, could himself sometimes dispense with the use of the ceremonial law, and live after the manner of the Gentiles, this showed that he did not look on the observance of it as still necessary, even for the Jews themselves; and therefore, that he could not, consistently with his own practice, impose it on the Gentile Christians. And yet Paul charges him with this, yea, represents him as compelling the Gentiles to live as did the Jews; not by open force and violence, but this was the tendency of what he did; for it was in effect to signify this, that the Gentiles must comply with the Jews, or else not be admitted into Christian communion.

Paul having thus established his character and office, and sufficiently shown that he was not inferior to any of the apostles, nor to Peter himself, from the account of the reproof he gave him, he takes occasion to speak of that great fundamental doctrine of the Gospel,—justification only by faith in Christ, and not by the works of the Law, (though some think all he says, to the end of the ch., is what he said to Peter at Antioch,) which doctrine condemned Peter for his symbolizing with the Jews. For if it was the principle of his religion, that the gospel is the instrument of our justification, and not the law; then he did very ill in countenancing them who kept up the law, by mixing it with faith in the business of our justification. This was the doctrine Paul had preached among the Galatians, which he still adhered to, and which is the great business of this epistle. Paul acquaints us,

1. With the practice of the Jewish Christians themselves, v. 15. 'We,' says he, 'who are Jews by nature, who have been born and bred in the Jewish religion, and not among the impure Gentiles, knowing that a man is not justified by the works of the law, but by the faith of Jesus Christ, even we ourselves have believed in Jesus Christ, that we might be justified by the faith of Christ, and not by the works of the law. Why then should we hamper ourselves with the law? What did we believe in Christ for? Was it not, that we might be justified by the faith of Christ? And if it would be wrong in us, who are Jews by nature, to return to the law, and expect justification by it, would it not be much more so to require this of the Gentiles, who were never subject to it, since by the works of the law no flesh shall be justified?' To give the greater weight to this, he adds, v. 17. 'But if, while we seek to be justified by Christ, we ourselves also are found

V. 11—16. The wisdom of God, in permitting the transaction here recorded, is very conspicuous; for it demonstrably proves the pope's pretended infallibility and supremacy, as derived from Peter, (no one can tell in what manner,) to be the most groundless fiction imaginable, and it tends exceedingly to establish the doctrine of justification by faith alone.—This [Peter's conduct] sufficiently proved him to be both fallible and sinful in himself; though he was guided by the Spirit of God to deliver the Gospel to mankind, free from error or corrupt mixture. Mat. 16:18, 19. As, however, he was so evidently blameable, Paul, though probably a much younger man, and called to the apostleship long after Peter, deemed himself bound openly to withstand him. (16) By the works of the law, &c.] The occasion of this declaration was doubtless taken from the ceremonial law; but the argument, as it respects justification, is equally conclusive against all dependence on the works of the moral law, as absolutely inconsistent with the method of justification, according to the Gospel.—This certainly took place some years before the apostle's last journey to Jerusalem, as recorded by Luke; and it is an additional argument, in support of the view before given of Paul's conduct at that juncture. Acts 21:17—23.—The conduct of Peter, on this trying occasion, seems to have been peculiarly excellent.—15) Sinners of the Gentiles.] As distinguished from 'sinners' who were not 'Gentiles,' Lu. 15:1, 2. V. 17—21. It is not agreed among expositors, whether the apostle's address to Peter continues to the end of the ch., or where it terminates if it does not; but the doctrine is the same, however this may be decided.—If, then, while the apostles, and their converts from among the Jews, renounced their legal confidence, and sought to be justified by Christ, it should at length be found, that they were yet sinners, unpardoned, unjustified, through the insufficiency of his righteousness and atonement to justify them, or of faith to give them an interest in it, except they returned back to the law, and taught the Gentile converts to judaize, it would follow, that Christ was 'the minister of sin,' and the Gospel, the 'ministration of condemnation,' instead of 'the ministration of the Spirit,' and 'of righteousness.' 1 Cor. 15:12—18. 2 Cor. 3:7—11.—But 'God forbid,' that such things should be spoken of Christ

18 For if I build again the things which I destroyed, I make myself a transgressor.

19 For I through the law am dead to the law, that I might live unto God.

20 I am crucified with Christ: nevertheless I live; yet not I, but Christ liveth in me: and the life which I now live in the flesh, I live by the faith of the Son of God, who loved me, and gave himself for me.

21 I do not frustrate the grace of God: for if righteousness come by the law, then Christ is dead in vain.

sinner, found giving countenance or indulgence to sin, or rather are accounted sinners of the Gentiles, and such as it is not fit to have communion with, unless we also observe the law of Moses; Is Christ the minister of sin? Will it not follow, that He engages us to receive a doctrine that gives liberty to sin, or by which we are so far from being justified, that we remain impure sinners, and unfit to be conversed with? This, he intimates, would be the consequence, but he rejects it with abhorrence. This would be very dishonorable to Christ, and very injurious to them also. 'For,' says he, v. 18. 'if I, or any other, who have taught that the observance of the Mosaic law is not necessary to justification, should now, by word or practice, teach or intimate that it is necessary, I own myself to be still an impure sinner, and to remain under the guilt of sin, notwithstanding my faith in Christ; or I shall be liable to be charged with deceit and prevarication, and acting inconsistently with myself.' Thus does the apostle argue for the great doctrine of justification by faith without the works of the law, from the principles and practice of the Jewish Christians themselves, and from the consequence that would attend their departure from it; whence it appeared, that Peter and the other Jews were much in the wrong in this.

2. His own judgment and practice.

(1.) He was dead to the law. Whatever account others might make of it, yet, for his part, he was dead to it. He knew the moral law denounced a curse against all that continue not in all things written therein, to do them; therefore he was dead as to all hope of justification and salvation that way. And as for the ceremonial law, he also knew that was now superseded by the coming of Christ; therefore, he was thus dead to the law, through the law itself; it discovered itself to be at an end; by considering the law itself, he saw that justification was not to be expected by the works of it, (since none could perform a perfect obedience to it,) and that there was now no further need of the sacrifices and purifications of it, since they were done away in Christ, by his offering up Himself a Sacrifice for us; and therefore the more he looked into it, the more he saw that there was no occasion for keeping up that regard to it, which the Jews pleaded for. But though he was thus dead to the law, yet he does not look upon himself as without law; he was far from thinking himself discharged from his duty to God; on the contrary, he was dead to the law, that he might live unto God. The doctrine of the Gospel, which he had embraced, instead of weakening the bond of duty on him, did but the more strengthen and confirm it; therefore, though he was dead to the law, yet it was only in order to his living a new and better life to God, as Rom. 7:4, 6. such a life as would be more agreeable and acceptable to God than his observance of the Mosaic law could now be, i. e. a life of faith in Christ, and, under the influence thereof, of holiness and righteousness toward God. Agreeably hereto, he acquaints us,

(2.) That, as he was dead to the law, so he was alive unto God through Jesus Christ, v. 20. And here, in his own person, he gives us an excellent description of the mysterious life of a believer. [1.] He is crucified, and yet lives, Rom. 6:6. he is dead to the world, dead to the law, yet alive to God and Christ; sin is mortified, and grace quickened. [2.] He lives, and yet not he; this is strange, but he lives in the exercise of grace; yet that is not from himself, but from another. Believers see themselves living in a state of dependence. [3.] He is crucified with Christ, yet Christ lives in him; this results from his mystical union with Christ, by means of which he is interested in the death of Christ, so as by virtue of that to die unto sin; and yet interested in the life of Christ, so as by virtue of that to live unto God. [4.] He lives in the flesh, and yet lives by faith; to outward appearance he lives as other people do, his natural life is supported as others' are; yet he has a higher and nobler principle that supports and actuates him, that of faith in Christ, and especially as eyeing the wonders of his love in giving Himself for him; hence it is, that though he lives in the flesh, yet he does not live after the flesh. Note, They who have true faith, live by that faith; and the great thing faith fastens on, is, Christ's loving us, and giving Himself for us. The great evidence of Christ's loving us, is, his giving Himself for us; and this is what we are chiefly concerned to mix faith with, in order to our living to Him.

The apostle concludes this discourse with acquainting us, that by the doctrine of justification by faith in Christ, without the works

PRACT. OBS. Whilst we simply depend on God to prosper our labors, we should use every prudent method of obviating misapprehensions, and counteracting the designs of opposers, 'lest, by any means, we should run in vain?' and this may commonly be connected with decided firmness in important cases.—False brethren and teachers are generally 'brought in unawares.' We must expect spies in our congregations, who come on purpose to find something to cavil at, or object to, in order to deprive us of our Christian liberty, by bringing us into bondage to human impositions, or groundless fears, or through extravagant notions of liberty, to keep men in slavery to sin and Satan. We must not 'give place,' in such matters, by way of subjection, in any measure, lest 'the truth of the Gospel' should be obscured or disgraced.—'False brethren' often profess an undue regard to ministers of established reputation, in order to disparage others perhaps of equal ability and faithfulness, whose line of duty requires them to proceed in a somewhat different manner. But the question is not, Who said or who did such and such things? but merely, What was said and done? and, Did it accord to the Word of God, or not?—'The fear of man bringeth a snare' to an extent which few are fully aware of; and we need not wonder to see pious persons ashamed, or afraid, openly to countenance those whom they inwardly favor, or boldly to avow themselves on controverted points, when their opinions are unpopular; for Peter himself, even at an advanced period of his most zealous, bold, and useful ministry, was induced thus to prevaricate. But even a man equal to an apostle, who 'walks not uprightly according to the Gospel,' is to be blamed and con-and his Gospel! This appears to be the meaning of the v., as it stands connected in the apostle's argument. At first sight, indeed, it may seem rather to relate to the sins, which are found in those who profess to be justified by Christ. These should not be charged on the doctrine, or on the insufficiency of his grace to sanctify them, as if He were 'the minister of sin,' and allowed men to continue in it; or as if there was any need to go back to the law on that account. The former interpretation, however, is most approved, and, indeed, justly, 'Christ is then "the Minister of sin," and not of justification.'—Must it not follow that He is so, if He hath introduced an imperfect dispensation, which will not sufficiently ensure the happiness of those that follow it? Yea, doth He not indeed teach sin, if justification indeed cannot be obtained without the law, in teaching men to renounce all dependence on it, as it is certain by his Gospel He doth? Doddr.—So that the life he then 'lived in the flesh,' surrounded with worldly objects and temptations, was not conducted on carnal principles, or by a regard to external things, but 'by the faith of the Son of God,' as he depended on Him for all things, and aimed to do all according to his will, and in subserviency to his glory. 2 Cor. 5:13—15. 10:1—6. Col. 3:16, 17. And to this he was influenced by the consideration, that this glorious Savior had loved him, when a bitter persecutor, and had given Himself to the death on the cross, as a sacrifice for his sins. So that, while he neglected no acceptable obedience, and declined no self-denying service, yet he attended to all his duties, from such principles, and for such purposes, that 'he did not frustrate,' or set aside 'the grace of God,' by attempting in any measure to justify himself by his works, being fully assured, that if righteousness could have been obtained by any obedience denied, in this respect, when the matter is evident and important. Christ is the only infallible Head of his church; all pretenders to this title on earth are antichrists, and they who cannot endure to be blamed, or to acknowledge themselves mistaken, are of a very unchristian temper.—Men are seldom aware of the magnitude or fatal consequences of their errors or carnal compliances. This conviction, that 'by the works of the law shall no flesh be justified,' has led us to believe in Christ, and rely on Him, that we 'might be justified by faith' in Him; and while we adhere to this principle, all our most spiritual worship, and devoted, zealous obedience, will be entirely disregarded by us in the grand concern of justification, and be wholly performed from other motives and to other purposes; namely, to show the sincerity of our grateful, adoring love, to 'adorn the Gospel of God our Savior,' to glorify God, and to do what good we can to our brethren and to all men.—And we make 'Christ the Minister of sin,' if we suppose that his righteousness and atonement are insufficient to justify the believer; even as others make Him the 'Minister of sin,' by allowing themselves in disobedience, from a presumptuous confidence of being justified by his righteousness, and saved without being sanctified.—This proposition, 'that if righteousness come by the law, then Christ is dead in vain,' is the bane of all self-justifying schemes, however refined or ingenious they be; and all who cleave to them would certainly have deemed his language to be enthusiasm, if the apostle had not used it concerning his own experience, and if it had first been spoken by some zealous modern defender of the doctrine of grace against the objections of Pharisees, and the perversions of Antinomians. SCOTT.

of man 'to law,' of whatever kind, consistently with the glory of God, then Christ had died without any necessity, and to no purpose. As, therefore, no Christian could suppose, that so stupendous a plan as that of redemption was formed and executed, without any occasion, it must also be concluded, that righteousness could in no degree be obtained by a sinner, on account of his obedience to any law. This holds equally true of the moral, as of the ceremonial law, and, indeed, of every rule which can be prescribed for the conduct of men in any age or nation. It was of small moment whether men observed the ritual law or not, except as they depended on it; and the concluding part of the apostle's argument related to the moral law, at least equally with the ceremonial.—'I through the law have died by law; so that I must live by God.' (19) —'We all, through breaking law, have died by the curse of law; so that, if we live, we must live by the free gift of God, and not by law.' Macan. If this learned and laborious writer had made it intelligible what he meant by 'have died by the curse of the law,' his novel interpretation would have required further notice. But the author owns himself unable to adix any precise meaning to the words used, in this and in several places of his tr. and paraphrase. 'I have died to the law,' is explained by 'I have been crucified with Christ.' SCOTT.

of the law, he avoided two great difficulties, which the contrary opinion was loaded with; he did not frustrate the grace of God, which the doctrine of justification by the works of the law did; so he argues, Rom. 11:6. nor did he frustrate the death of Christ; whereas if righteousness come by the law, then it must follow that Christ is dead in vain; for if we look for salvation by the law of Moses, then we render the death of Christ needless: for to what purpose should He be appointed to die, if we might have been saved without it!

CHAP. III. V. 1—5. The apostle is here dealing with those who, having embraced the faith of Christ, still continued to seek for justification by their own obedience to the moral precepts, as their righteousness before PRACT. OBS. V. 1—5. The faithful preaching of the Gospel so exhibits 'Christ crucified,' as the great Object of the Christian's faith, hope, and admiring love and gratitude, and so shows the nature, glory, and efficacy of his sufferings, from love to our souls, that He is, as it were, 'evidently set forth before men's eyes,' as dying on the cross for their sins. But how very small a portion of the preaching in Christendom answers this description, or tends thus to excite men's affections towards the gracious Redeemer, needs not be told. Alas! who has infatuated and bewitched men's minds, that they should so generally turn away from this fundamental doctrine, to listen to metaphysical subtleties, fabulous and absurd legends, moral harangues, superstitions observances and forms, or enthusiastical reveries? It is plain, that 'the god of this world,' by various instruments, who reciprocally despise each other, has 'blinded men's eyes, lest the Gospel of the glory of Christ should shine into them,' and lest they should learn to trust in a cruci-

NOTES. CHAP. III. V. 1—5. The argument might be reduced to a very compendious decision; the apostle only desired to know from them, whether they had received the miraculous gifts of the Holy Spirit, by the laying on of the hands of those preachers, who proselyted them to the Jewish law, or from him, who brought them the joyful report of free salvation by faith in Christ? Rom. 10:5—17. This open appeal (5) to the Galatians, who were under the influence of those, who opposed the apostle's authority, is a full demonstration, that these gifts (miraculous powers) were actually communicated to them by his ministry. The abruptness and repetitions of his questions also prove, that his mind was greatly agitated by their misconduct, and show how important he deemed their mistake, and we cannot doubt that he regarded all their profession, and sufferings in consequence of it, to be altogether in vain, in case they persisted in it.—This is of the greatest importance in the argument; for submission to the ceremonial law, though burdensome, would not have been a renunciation of the Gospel, if it had not implied a dependence on their own works, instead of the righteousness and propitiatory sacrifice of Christ, and this dependence must be equally incompatible with the grace of the Gospel, even when the obedience itself is necessary from other motives, and for other purposes.

(1.) Foolish.] Without consideration, and stupid, as to this particular matter: for, otherwise, Themistocles calls them, 'sharp and quick-witted,' as indeed were their ancestors the Galli, who had also a characteristic levity and inconstancy. See Bl. 'Having established his commission, Paul now speaks with full authority.' Bewitched.] 'Ebakane: lit. bewitched, fascinated, or rather, in a metaphorical sense, seduced, deceived: and so used by Plut. It occurs not elsewhere in the N. T. nor, in this sense, in the classics; the Gr. comtrs. derive it from phaos and ka'nein, and it seems they thought the evil was communicated through the eyes; as serpents are said to fascinate birds. "Those are

God, and, whercin that was defective, had recourse to the legal sacrifices and purifications, to make it up. These he first sharply reproves, and then endeavors, by the evidence of truth, to convince.

His reproof is very close and warm; he calls them foolish, v. 1. Yea, he represents them as bewitched, or enchanted, by the arts and snares of their seducing teachers, and so far deluded as to act very unlike themselves. Their fault was, they did not obey the truth, did not adhere to the gospel-way of justification, wherein they had been taught, and which they had professed to embrace. Several things proved and aggravated their folly.

1. Jesus Christ had been evidently set forth as crucified among them; i. e. they had had the doctrine of the cross preached to them, and the sacrament of the Lord's supper administered among them, in both which Christ crucified had been set before them. Now, it was the greatest madness for them who had had acquaintance with such sacred mysteries, and admittance to such great solemnities, not to obey the truth which was thus published to them, and signed and sealed in that ordinance.

2. He appeals to their experiences of the working of the Spirit on their souls, v. 2. he puts them in mind, that, on their becoming Christians, they had received the Spirit, that many of them at least had been made partakers, not only of the sanctifying influences, but of the miraculous gifts, of the Holy Spirit; which were eminent proofs of the truth of the Christian religion, and the several doctrines of it, and especially of this, that justification is by Christ only, not by works of law, one of its peculiar and fundamental principles. To convince them of folly, he desires to know, how they came by these gifts and graces; Was it by the works of the law, i. e. the preaching of the necessity of these in order to justification? This they could not say, for that doctrine had not then been preached to them, nor had they, as Gentiles, any pretence to justification that way. Or, was it by the hearing of faith, i. e. the preaching of the doctrine of faith in Christ, as the only way of justification? This, if they would say the truth, they were obliged to own, and therefore must be very unreasonable to reject a doctrine, whose good effects they had had such experience of. Note, The Spirit is usually communicated by the ministry of the Gospel. And they are very unwise, who suffer themselves to be turned away from the ministry and doctrine which have been blessed to their spiritual advantage.

3. He calls on them to consider their past and present conduct, and thence to judge whether they were not acting very weakly and unreasonably, v. 3, 4. He tells them, they had embraced the doctrine of the Gospel, by means of which they had received the Spirit, wherein only the true way of justification is revealed; thus they had begun well. But now they were turning to the law, and expected to be advanced to higher degrees of perfection, by adding the observance of it to faith in Christ, in order to their justification, which could end in nothing but their shame and disappointment; hereby they were pulling down, with one hand, what they had built with the other, and undoing what they had hitherto done in Christianity. Yea, he further reminds them, that they had not only embraced the Christian doctrine, but suffered for it, too; therefore their folly would be the more aggravated, if now they should desert it; for in this case all that they had suffered would be in vain; it would appear that they had been foolish in suffering for what they now deserted, and their sufferings would be altogether in vain, and of no advantage to them.

4. He puts them in mind, that they had had ministers among them, particularly himself, who came with a divine seal and commission; and he appeals to them, whether the doctrine preached by them, and confirmed by the miraculous gifts and operations of the Spirit, was that of justification by the works of the law, or by the faith of Christ; they very well knew it was the latter; therefore they must needs be inexcusable in forsaking a doctrine so signally owned and attested, for one that had received no such attestations.

fiend Savior, 'God manifested in the flesh.' 2 Cor. 4:3—6. 1 Tim. 3:16. But we must observe, with equal grief and astonishment, the folly of numbers, who have often heard the Gospel, most faithfully and pathetically preached; and yet have at length been fascinated, by plausible deceivers, to refuse obedience to the truth.—They who have begun to fear God, to seek mercy, to pray, and to renounce sin, under the preaching of the Gospel, must be foolish indeed, if they think to make further proficiency by returning to legal dependences, or resting on external observances. It is most grievous to see those who have gone through sharp convictions, and even endured persecutions, for attending on the Gospel, afterwards turning aside, and giving cause to fear, that they have 'suffered so many things in vain.' Indeed, any affliction endured, without profit derived from it, should be considered as a cause for sorrow and humiliation; and if the Lord loveth us, we may be assured, that further and sharper chastisements will follow.

(5.) Miracles.] 'All the ancient comtrs. rightly understand this, of the supernatural and miraculous gifts of the apostolic age. Nor do the moderns deny this, except some recent ones, who refer it to Paul's miracles, contrary to the context, which refers to the Spirit, given to and received by the Galatians. So Berger acknowledges. Besides, energein en [the Gr. here] never means patrare inter [manifest among], either in the N. T. or classics; whereas, though it often occurs in Scripture, yet it is always in the sense of, to work or produce effects in any one, and, almost always, miraculous ones. So Mat. 14:2. Mk. 6:19. 2 Cor. 2:8. 1 Cor. 12:6. 1 Thess. 2:13. 2 Thess. 2:7. And numerous are the passages where en following energein signifies in, not among. This and other such passages, in which the apostles make mention of miracles, of which those to whom they wrote were witnesses, are calculated powerfully to establish and confirm the divine origin of the Christian religion. (Comp. 2 Cor. 12:12. 1 Thess. 1:5, &c.) 1. From the example of Abraham's justification, v. 6. an argument he uses, Rom. 4. Abraham believed God, and that was accounted to him for righteousness; his faith fastened on the promise of God, and on his believing he was owned and accepted of God as a righteous man; on this account he is represented as the Father of the faithful, who are the children of Abraham, v. 7. not according to the flesh, but according to the promise; and, consequently, are justified in the same way he was, by faith. To confirm this, the apostle acquaints us, that the promise made to Abraham, Gen. 12:3. had a reference hereunto, v. 8. The Scripture is said to foresee, because He that indited the Scripture, did foresee, that God would justify the heathen world in the way of faith; therefore in Abraham, i. e. in the Seed of Abraham, which is Christ, not the Jews only, but the Gentiles also, should be blessed; not only blessed in the seed of Abraham, but blessed as Abraham was, being justified as he was. This the apostle calls preaching the Gospel to Abraham; and from thence infers, v. 9. that they who are of faith, i. e. true believers, of what nation soever they are, are blessed with faithful Abraham.

2. He shows, that we cannot be justified but by faith fastening on the Gospel, because the law condemns us, v. 10. and Deut. 27:26. The condition of life, by the law, is, perfect, personal, and perpetual, obedience; the language of it is, Do this, and live; or, as v. 12. The man that doeth them shall live in them; and for every failure herein the law denounces a curse. The curse is wrath revealed, and ruin threatened; a separation unto all evil: and this is in full force, power, and virtue, against all sinners, and therefore against all men, for all have sinned, and if, as transgressors of the law, we are under the curse of it, it must be vain to look for justifification by it. But yet the apostle acquaints us, how we may escape, and regain the favor of God, namely, through faith in Christ, v. 13. By a strange method Christ hath redeemed us, being Himself made Sin for us, and so a Curse for us; laid for the present under that infamous token of the divine displeasure, which the law of Moses had put a particular brand upon, Deut. 21:23. and all, that the blessing of Abraham might come on the Gentiles through Jesus Christ; that all who believed on Christ, whether Jews or Gentiles, might become heirs of Abraham's blessing, and particularly of that great promise of the Spirit, which was peculiarly reserved for the times of the Gospel. Hence it appeared, that it was not by putting themselves under the law, but by faith in Christ, that they became the people of God, and heirs of the promise.

3. To prove that justification is by faith, and not by the works of the law, he alleges the express testimony of the O. T. v. 11. Hab. 2:4. quoted, Rom. 1:17. and Heb. 10:38. The design of it is, to show that they only are just or righteous, who do truly live, who are freed from death and wrath, and restored into a state of life in the favor of God; and that it is only through faith that persons become righteous, and, as such, obtain life and happiness; that they are accepted of God, and enabled to live to Him now, and are entitled to an eternal life in the enjoyment of Him hereafter. Hence the apostle says, It is evident that no man is justified by the law in the sight of God, whatever he may be in the account of others: for the law is not of faith; that says nothing concerning faith in the business of justification, nor does it give life to those who believe; but the language of it is, The man that doeth them, shall live in them, as Lev. 18:5. It requires perfect obedience as the condition of life, and therefore now can by no means be the rule of our justification: this argument may give us occasion to remark, That justification by faith is no new doctrine, but was established

V. 10—14. The passage here quoted, follows a variety of curses denounced against transgressors of the moral law, which shows that this was principally referred to. Indeed, the legal dispensation, considered as a covenant of works, was intended; believers were always under the covenant of grace, by faith in the Savior, as promised from the beginning, and prefigured especially by the sacrificing of innocent animals; unbelievers always made the whole law a complex covenant of works, and the nation of Israel was under the Sinai-covenant, in respect of the land of Canaan, and their peculiar privileges. Ex. 19:5, 20:1. But after the promulgation of the Gospel, the whole became entirely a covenant of works, even as much as that of Adam. 4:21—31. Under a covenant of this kind, in one form or other, all men continue, as the rational and accountable creatures of God, and, being transgressors of his law, even according to their own obscure notions of it, they are exposed to the curse and wrath of God, and remain under it, unless they believe in Christ. Rom. 2:12—16. But as the apostle was arguing with Judaizers, he led their attention to the written law itself: which could not confer the blessing, but must denounce the curse on them; for they had not 'confirmed it,' or 'continued' from the beginning of their lives to that day, and would not to the end of life continue, 'in all things written in the law,' so as to perform a perfect obedience to them.—It was therefore evident, at the first glance, that no man could be justified by a law, which peremptorily demanded an obedience so absolute and perfect, as no mere man ever yet rendered to it. But it was further evident, as God had declared another way of justification and eternal life. Hab. 2:4. Rom. 1:17. Heb. 10:35—39.—The apostle evidently supposed the Gentiles to be 'under the curse of the law,' as well as the Jews, but in another sense, else they would not have needed this redemption and justification. (11) The just, &c.] Or, 'the just by faith shall live.' This is the more exact tr.; and as 'the righteousness of faith' does not secure men from temporal death, in any form, or at any time, so deliverance from eternal condemnation, and to eternal life in heaven, must be intended.—(13) Curse of, &c.] As Christ died, not to deliver us from temporal death, but from 'the wrath to come,' it is manifest, that 'the curse of the law,' whether the law of Moses, or any law under which men are supposed to be, is eternal damnation, and not temporal or temporary punishment. Christ, indeed, did not suffer eternal damnation; for, being God as well as man, his temporary sufferings constituted an infinite satisfaction to divine justice, and the fullest display of the evil of sin, and the honor of the divine law which can be conceived.—Many expositors, who contend against the imputation of Christ's righteousness to believers, in disputing against Socinians, argue for the vicarious sufferings of Christ in our stead. Now what is this but imputation? He, though perfectly holy, paid the debt which we sinners had contracted. 'It was exacted, and he became answerable.' We sinners, on believing, are 'made the righteousness of God in Him,' and receive the inheritance which He merited. Thus there is a reciprocal imputation. Is. 53:4—12. 2 Cor. 5:18—21, v. 21. 1 Pct. 2:18—25, v. 24. 3:17, 18. Yet, as the imputation of sin did not render the Savior either criminal or polluted, but had its effect merely in his receiving the punishment we deserved, so the imputation of his righteousness does not render us free either from criminality or pollution, but merely entitles us to the reward of his righteousness. We have still the same need of humiliation and repentance, of sanctification, and personal obedience and holiness, without which we have no evidence that we are made the righteousness of God in Him.—'I wonder that Jerome and Erasmus should labor, and seek, for I know not what figure of speech, to show that Christ was not called "accursed." Truly in this is placed all our hope; in this the infinite love of God is manifested; in this is placed our salvation, that our God, properly and without any figure, poured out all his wrath on his own Son, . . . caused Him . . . to be accursed, that He might receive us into favor. Finally, without any figure, "Christ was made a Curse for us," in such a manner, that, unless He had been truly God, He must have remained under the curse for ever, from which for our sakes He emerged. For, indeed, if the obedience of the Son of God be figurative and imaginary, so must our hope of glory be.' Beza.—(14) The Spirit.] The departure of the Spirit of life and holiness, when Adam sinned, left him spiritually dead, and proved him a condemned criminal; the gift of the Spirit of life and holiness, in Christ Jesus, is the source of spiritual life, and the seal of his justification.—The miraculous or extraordinary gifts of the Spirit cannot, therefore, be exclusively meant, yet they are specially referred to. (Note, 1—5.) (10) Cursed is every one, &c.]

15 Brethren, I speak after the manner of men; Though it be but a man's <sup>x</sup> covenant, yet if it be confirmed, no man disannulleth, or addeth thereto.

16 Now to <sup>y</sup> Abraham and his seed were the promises made. He saith not, And to seeds, as of many; but as of one, And to thy seed, which is Christ.

17 And this I say, That the covenant, that was confirmed before of God in Christ, the law, which <sup>z</sup> was four hundred and thirty years after, cannot disannul, that it should make the promise of none effect.

18 For if <sup>a</sup> the inheritance be of the law, it is no more of promise: but God gave it to Abraham by promise.

19 Wherefore then serveth the law? <sup>b</sup> It was added because of transgressions, till the seed <sup>c</sup> should come to whom the promise was made; and it was ordained by angels <sup>d</sup> in the hand <sup>e</sup> of a mediator.

20 Now a mediator is not a mediator of one, but God <sup>f</sup> is one.

and taught in the church, long before the times of the Gospel. Yea, it is the only way wherein any sinners ever were, or can be, justified.

4. To this purpose, he urges the stability of the covenant God made with Abraham, which was not vacated or disannulled by the giving of the law to Moses, v. 15. &c. Faith had the precedence of the law, for Abraham was justified by faith. It was a promise that he built upon, and promises are the proper objects of faith. God entered into covenant with Abraham, v. 8. and this covenant was firm and steady; even men's covenants are so, therefore much more his. When a deed is executed, or articles of agreement are sealed, both parties are bound, and it is too late then to settle things otherwise; therefore it is not to be supposed, that, by the subsequent law, the covenant of God should be vacated. The original word, diathēkē, signifies both a covenant and a testament. Now the promise made to Abraham, was rather a testament than a covenant. When a testament is become of force by the death of the testator, it is not capable of being altered; therefore the promise that was given to Abraham, being of the nature of a testament, it remains firm and unalterable. But if it should be said, that a grant or testament may be defeated for want of persons to claim the benefit of it, v. 16. he shows that there is no danger of that in this case. Abraham is dead, and the prophets are dead, but the covenant is made with Abraham and his seed. And he gives us a very surprising exposition of that. We should have thought it had been meant only of the people of the Jews. 'Nay,' says the apostle, 'it is in the singular number, and points at a single person,—that Seed is Christ.' So that the covenant is still in force; for Christ abideth for ever in his Person, and in his spiritual seed, who are his by faith. And if it be objected, that the law, which was given by Moses, did disannul this covenant, because that insisted so much on works, and there was so little in it of faith, or of the promised Messiah; he answers, that the subsequent law could not disannul the precedent covenant or promise, v. 18. If the inheritance be of the law, it is no more of promise; but, says he, God gave it to Abraham by promise; and therefore it would be inconsistent with his holiness, wisdom, and faithfulness, by any subsequent act to set aside the promise, and so alter the way of justification, which he had thus established. If the inheritance was given to Abraham by promise, and thereby entailed on his spiritual seed, we may be sure that God would not retract that promise; for He is not a man, that He should repent.

V. 19—29. The apostle, having just before been speaking of the promise made to Abraham, and representing that as the rule of our justification, and not the law, lest they should think he did too much derogate from the law, and render it altogether useless, thence takes occasion to discourse of the design and tendency of it, and to acquaint us for what purpose it was given. It might be asked, 'If that promise was sufficient for salvation, wherefore then serveth the law? Or why did God give the law by Moses?' To this he answers;

I. The law was added because of transgressions, v. 19. not to disannul the promise, and to establish a different way of justification from that settled by the promise; but the Israelites, though chosen to be God's peculiar people, being sinners as well as others, the law was given to convince them of their sin, and obnoxiousness to the divine displeasure; for by the law is the knowledge of sin, Rom. 3:20. and the law entered, that sin might abound, Rom. 5:20. it was also intended to restrain them from the commission of sin, to awe their minds, and curb their lusts; yet, at the same time, to direct them to the true and only way whereby sin was to be expiated, and pardoned, namely, through the death and sacrifice of Christ, which was the special use for which the law of sacrifices and purifications was given.

The apostle adds, that the law was given for this purpose, till the Seed should come to whom the promise was made; i. e. either till Christ should come, the principal Seed referred to, or till the gospel-dispensation should take place, when Jews and Gentiles, without distinction, should, on believing, become the seed of Abraham. But when the Seed was come, and a fuller discovery of divine grace in the promise was made, then the law, as given by Moses, was to cease, Heb. 8:7, 8. And though the law, considered as the law of nature, is always in force, to convince of sin, and to restrain from it; yet we are now no longer under the bondage and terror of that legal covenant. The law, then, was not intended to discover another Wherefore He who gave this law to the Israelites by angels, in the hand of a mediator, was not in friendship with them. But God is in friendship (is one) with all who are righteous: therefore the Israelites were not righteous.' 'But God is only one party in that covenant made with Abraham, of which we have been speaking, and Abraham and his seed, including all that believe, both Jews and Gentiles, are the other. way of justification, different from that revealed by the promise, but only to lead men to see their need of the promise, by showing them the sinfulness of sin, and to point them to Christ, through whom alone they could be pardoned and justified.

As a further proof that the law was not designed to vacate the promise, the apostle adds, It was given to different persons, and in a different manner from the promise, and therefore for different purposes. The promise was made to Abraham, and all his spiritual seed, including believers of all nations, even of the Gentiles as well as Jews; but the law was given to the Israelites as a peculiar people, and separated from the rest of the world. And whereas the promise was given immediately by God Himself, the law was given by the ministry of angels, and the hand of a mediator. Hence it appeared, that the law could not be designed to set aside the promise; for, v. 20. A mediator is not a mediator of one, of one party only; but God is one, but one party in the promise or covenant made with Abraham; therefore it is not to be supposed, that, by a transaction which passed only between Him and the nation of the Jews, He should make void a promise which He had long before made to Abraham and all his spiritual seed, whether Jews or Gentiles. This would not have been consistent with his wisdom, or with his truth and faithfulness. Moses was only a mediator between God and the Israelites, not be- tween God and the spiritual seed of Abraham; and therefore the law, that was given by him, could not affect the promise made them, much less be subversive of it.

II. The law was given to convince men of the necessity of a Savior. The apostle asks, v. 21. as what some might be ready to object, Is the law then against the promises of God? Do they really clash and interfere with each other? Or do ye not set the covenant with Abraham, and the law of Moses, at variance with one another? To this he answers, God forbid; he was far from entertaining such a thought, nor could it be inferred from what he had said; that consequence would much rather follow from their doctrine than from his; for if there had been a law given, that could have given life, verily righteousness should have been by the law; and in that case the promise would have been superseded, and rendered useless. But that, in our present state, could not be, for the Scripture hath concluded all under sin, v. 22. or declared that all, both Jew and Gentile, are in a state of guilt, and therefore unable to attain to righteousness and justification by the works of the law. That discovered their wounds, but could not afford them a remedy: it showed they were guilty, because it appointed sacrifices and purifications, which were manifestly insufficient to take away sin; therefore the great design of it was, that the promise by faith of Jesus Christ might be given to them that believe; that, being convinced of their guilt, and the insufficiency of the law to effect a righteousness for them, they might be persuaded to believe on Christ, and so obtain the benefit of the promise.

III. The law was designed for a schoolmaster, to bring men to Christ, v. 24. In the foregoing v. the apostle acquaints us with the state of the Jews under the Mosaic economy; that before faith came, or before Christ appeared, and the doctrine of justification by faith in Him was more fully discovered, they were kept under the law, obliged, under severe penalties, to a strict observance of the various precepts of it; and at that time they were shut up, held under the terror and discipline of it, as prisoners in a state of confinement: the design of this was, that hereby they might be disposed more readily to embrace the faith which should afterward be revealed, or be persuaded to accept Christ when He came into the world, and to fall in with the better dispensation He was to introduce, whereby they were to be freed from bondage and servitude, and brought into a state of greater light and liberty. Now, in that state, he tells them, the law was their schoolmaster, to bring them to Christ, that they might be justified by faith. As it declared the mind and will of God concerning them, and at the same time denounced a curse against them for every failure in their duty, so it was proper to convince them of their lost and undone condition in themselves, and to let them see the weakness and insufficiency of their own righteousness to recommend them to God. And as it obliged them to a variety of sacrifices, &c. which, though they could not of themselves take away sin, were typical of Christ, and of the great sacrifice He was to offer up for the expiation of it, so it directed them (though in a more dark and obscure manner) to Him, as their only Relief and Refuge. And thus it was their schoolmaster, to instruct and govern them in their state of minority, or, as the word paidagogos [child-leader] most properly signifies, their servant, to lead and conduct them to Christ, (as children were wont to be led to school by those servants who had the care of them,) that they might be more fully instructed by Him as their Schoolmaster, in the true way of justification and salvation, which is only by faith in Him, and which He was appointed to give the fullest and clearest discoveries of. But lest it should be said, If the law was of this use and service under the Jewish, why may it not continue to be so under the Christian state too; the apostle adds, v. 25. that after faith is come, and the gospel-dispensation had taken place, under which Christ, and the way of pardon and life, through faith in Him, are set in the clearest light, we are no longer under a schoolmaster; we have no such need of the law to direct us to Him, as there was then.

In closing the ch. he acquaints us with our privilege by Christ:

(1.) That we are the children of God by faith in Jesus Christ, v. 26. And here, observe, [1.] The great privilege real Christians enjoy under the Gospel; they are the children of God; no longer accounted servants, but sons; not now kept at such a distance, and under such restraints, as the Jews were, but allowed a nearer and freer access to God; yea, admitted into the number, and having a right to all the privileges, of his children. [2.] How they come to obtain this privilege, and that is, by faith in Christ Jesus; having accepted Him as their Lord and Savior, and relying on Him alone for justification and salvation, they are hereupon admitted into this happy relation to God, and are entitled to the privileges of it; for, Jn. 1:12. as many as received Him, to them gave He power to become the sons of God, even to them that believe on his name.

And this faith in Christ, whereby they become the children of God, he reminds us, v. 27. was what they professed in baptism; for he adds, As many of you as have been baptized into Christ, have put on Christ. Having in baptism professed their faith in Him, they were thereby devoted to Him, and had, as it were, put on his livery, and declared themselves to be his servants and disciples; and being thus become the members of Christ, they were through Him owned and accounted as the children of God. Here note, 1st. Baptism is now the rite of admission into the Christian church, as circumcision was into

to let them see the weakness and insufficiency of their own righteousness to recommend them to God. And as it obliged them to a variety of sacrifices, &c. which, though they could not of themselves take away sin, were typical of Christ, and of the great sacrifice He was to offer up for the expiation of it, so it directed them (though in a more dark and obscure manner) to Him, as their only Relief and Refuge. And thus it was their schoolmaster, to instruct and govern them in their state of minority, or, as the word paidagogos [child-leader] most properly signifies, their servant, to lead and conduct them to Christ, (as children were wont to be led to school by those servants who had the care of them,) that they might be more fully instructed by Him as their Schoolmaster, in the true way of justification and salvation, which is only by faith in Him, and which He was appointed to give the fullest and clearest discoveries of. But lest it should be said, If the law was of this use and service under the Jewish, why may it not continue to be so under the Christian state too; the apostle adds, v. 25. that after faith is come, and the gospel-dispensation had taken place, under which Christ, and the way of pardon and life, through faith in Him, are set in the clearest light, we are no longer under a schoolmaster; we have no such need of the law to direct us to Him, as there was then.

Interpret, 'God is consistent with Himself, and remains the same, i. e. always stands to his promises.'
(22, 23.) Concluded. 'Sin is represented as a jailor, holding the whole human race in duress.' Bloomf. 'This law of faith, or method of justification, came at the fall; it was then established: and till it came, Adam was kept in ward without hope, under the law he had broken. In like manner the Gentiles, under the law of nature, and the Jews, under the law of Moses, were kept in ward as criminals, and had no hope of pardon, but what the law of faith gave them, as made known obscurely in the first promise, Gen. 3:15. and afterwards in the covenant with Abraham.'

V. 23—25. This admits of an obvious accommodation to the believer's experience, and the first use of the moral law, in bringing men to Christ: but the above [as in Henry] is the evident scope of the apostle's argument.—God also fully pardoned the sins of the upright Jews, and freed them from the punishments of the other life; but not by virtue of the blood of bulls and goats, . . . but by virtue of their faith in the Messiah, owned by them to be the Messiah their Righteousness.' study of their lessons, and assisted them in preparing for the master (epitropos).' They also attended them at public spectacles. See Bl.

ED.
V. 26—29. It is generally supposed, that the apostle alludes to the custom of baptized persons putting off their old garments; and putting on new, clean, or white raiment, after they had been baptized; but it is by no means certain, that this custom prevailed at so early a period; at least the sacred writers do not mention it. Indeed the connexion of v. 27. with that which precedes, shows, that 'the faith in Christ,' which was publicly professed in baptism, and not the mere outward administration, (whether the baptized person had faith or not,) was especially intended.—'God now looking on them, there appears nothing but Christ; they are, as it were, covered all over with Him, as a man is with the clothes that he hath put on, and hence, in the next v. it is said, they are all one in Christ Jesus, as if there were but that one person.' Locke. The learned writer indeed connects this high privilege with the profession of the Gospel; but certainly it cannot belong to a hypocritical profession.—'Baptism, under the Gospel, as the rite of initiation, is as effectual for making us the sons of God, as circumcision was under the law.' Mackn. We may also add, 'And no more effectual.' Rom. 2:25—29. 6:3, 4. 1 Cor. 12:12—14. Col. 2:11, 12. Tit. 3:4—7. 1 Pet. 3:21, 22. From the time, when any persons 'believe in their hearts unto righteousness, and with their mouths make confession to salvation,' all other distinctions vanish; they are all members of the mystical body of Christ, and entitled to all its blessings, without any need of the Mosaic law.—The question, 28 There is neither Jew nor Greek, there is neither bond nor free, there is neither male nor female: for ye are all one in Christ Jesus.

29 And if ye be Christ's, then are ye Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise.

1 We were under the law till Christ came, as the heir is under his guardian till he be of age. 5 But Christ freed us from the law: 7 therefore we are servants no longer to it. 14 He remembereth their good will to him, and his to them, 22 and sheweth that we are the sons of Abraham by the freewoman.

NOW I say, That the heir, as long as he is a child, differeth nothing from a servant, though he be lord of all; that of the Jews. Our Lord Jesus appointed it to be so, in the commission He gave to his apostles, Mat. 28:19. and accordingly it was their practice to baptize those whom they had disciplined to the Christian faith; and perhaps the apostle might notice their baptism here, and their becoming the children of God through faith in Christ, professed therein, to obviate a further objection, which the false teachers might be apt to urge in favor of circumcision. They might be ready to say, 'Though it should be allowed that the law, as given at mount Sinai, was abrogated by the coming of Christ, the promised Seed; yet why should circumcision be set aside too, when that was given to Abraham, together with the promise, and long before the giving of the law by Moses?' But this difficulty is sufficiently removed, when the apostle says, They who are baptized into Christ, have put on Christ; for from thence it appears, that, under the Gospel,

PRACT. OBS. V. 6—29. We should aim in every good thing to be followers of those, who through faith and patience inherit the promises, and have obtained a good report; and for this end, we ought to study the object, nature, and effects of Abraham's faith. Gen. 22:1—10. P. O. 1—12. Rom. 4. Heb. 6:13—15. 11:8—19. Jam. 2:21—24. Those who partake of his faith, shall surely inherit his blessing, and if we can ascertain that this is our case, we may be sure of sharing all his privileges. But who can, in any other way, escape the curse of the holy law? The sufferings of this 'holy One of God' more loudly warn sinners to flee from the wrath to come, than all the terrors of Sinai, or the curses of the law itself; for how can it be expected, that 'God will spare' any man to whom sin is imputed, seeing 'He spared not his own Son,' when our sins were imputed to Him? (Ps. 32:1, 2. Rom. 4:6—8. 8:32—34, v. 32. 2 Cor. 5:18—21.) Yet, at the same time, Christ, as from the cross, and from the throne of glory, most graciously beseeches sinners to take refuge in Him.—No subsequent transactions, or external alterations, can 'disannul or add to that covenant,' which engages eternal life to every believer. Yet let us not think, that the law was given in vain. The Sinai-covenant, and the ceremonies of the law, have answered their end, and, being fulfilled in Christ, are no more in force; yet are they still replete with instruction to believers; and as the law of Moses was never contrary to the promises of God, to Abraham and his seed; so it would be most absurd to suppose, that the holy, just, and good Law of God, the universal standard of duty, is contrary to the Gospel of Christ, as it is in every way subservient to it, when properly understood and used.—Men in general, even under the Gospel, continue shut up as in a dungeon, as loving their chains; being blinded, intoxi-baptism comes in the room of circumcision, and that they who by baptism are devoted to Christ, and do sincerely believe in Him, are, to all intents and purposes, as much admitted into the privileges of the Christian state, as the Jews were by circumcision into those of the legal, Phil. 3:3. and therefore there was no reason why the use of that should still be continued. Note, 2dly, in our baptism we put on Christ; therein we profess our discipleship to Him, and are obliged to behave ourselves as his faithful servants; being baptized into Christ, we are baptized into his death, that, as He died and rose again, so, in conformity therunto, we should die unto sin, and walk in newness of life, Rom. 6:3, 4. It would be of great advantage to us, did we oftener remember this.

(2.) That this privilege of being the children of God, and of being by baptism devoted to Christ, is now enjoyed in common by all real Christians. The law, indeed, made a difference between Jew and Greek, giving the Jews, on many accounts, the pre-eminence; but it is not so now; all stand on the same level, and are one in Christ Jesus, are accepted of Him, and become the children of God through faith in Him.

(3.) That, being Christ's, we are Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise. Their judaizing teachers would make them believe that they must be circumcised, and keep the law of Moses, or they could not be saved. 'No,' says the apostle, 'there is no need of that; for, if ye be Christ's, if ye sincerely believe on Him, who is the promised Seed, in whom all the nations of the earth were to be blessed, ye thereby become the true seed of Abraham, the father of the faithful, and, as such, are heirs according to the promise, and consequently are entitled to the great blessings and privileges of it.'

Therefore, on the whole, since it appeared that justification was not to be attained by the works of the law, but only by faith in Christ, and that the law of Moses was a temporary institution, given for such purposes as were only subservient to, and not subversive of, the promise; and that now, under the Gospel, Christians enjoy much greater and better privileges than the Jews did under that dispensation, it must needs follow, that they were very unreasonable and unwise, in hearkening to those, who at once endeavored to deprive them of the truth and liberty of the Gospel.

CHAP. IV. V. 1—7. The apostle, in this ch., is still carrying on the same general design as in the former; and,

I. He acquaints us with the state of the O. T. church: it was like a child under age; the Mosaic economy, which they were under, was what they could not fully understand the meaning of, 2 Cor. 3:13. As that was a dispensation of darkness, so it was of bondage too; for they were tied to a great number of burdensome rites and observances, by which, as by a kind of first rudiments, they were taught and instructed, and kept in a state of subjection, like a child under tutors and governors.

II. He acquaints us with the much happier state of Christians under the gospel-dispensation, v. 4—7. The Person employed to introduce this new dispensation, was no other than the Son of God Himself, the only begotten of the Father; He who was truly God, for our sakes became man; and He who was Lord of all, consented to come into a state of subjection, and to take on Him the form of a servant; and one great end of all this, was, To redeem them that were under the law; to save us from that intolerable yoke, and to appoint gospel-ordinances more rational and easy. He had, indeed, something more and greater in his view, for He came to suffer and die for us, that hereby He might redeem us from the wrath of God, and from the curse of the moral law, which, as sinners, we all lay under. But that was one end of it, and then the more servile state of the church was to come to a period, and a better to succeed in the place of it; for He was sent to redeem us, that we might receive the adop- ated, and lulled asleep by Satan, through worldly pleasures, interests, and pursuits. But the awakened sinner discovers his dreadful condition. The more he examines, or labors to escape, the fuller conviction he receives that he cannot effect his own deliverance; then he learns, that the mercy and grace of God form his only hope, and, though his doctrinal knowledge may be scanty, he is 'shut up to the faith, that will shortly be revealed' to him. Eph. 5:8—14. v. 14. The precepts and sanction of the law urge him on to duty, and restrain him from sin, even while they discourage him, and fill him with terrors; and thus, by a kind and beneficial severity, the law is made use of by the convincing Spirit, to show him his need of Christ, and to bring him to rely on his righteousness, propitiation, and mediation, 'that he may be justified by faith.' Then he ceases to be under the tuition of the law, as 'a schoolmaster,' and to be alarmed by its terrors, except as he lives beneath his privileges; yet the precept becomes, by the teaching of the Spirit of Christ, his guide in the delightful path of evangelical obedience, his beloved rule of duty, and his standard of daily self-examination. In this use of it, he learns continually to depend more simply on the Savior, and it puts energy into his prayers, and endears the promises to his soul. Thus sinners 'become the children of God by faith in Christ,' and, being 'baptized into Him,' by the converting grace of the Holy Spirit, they put on Christ, and stand accepted in Him; and all, who thus belong to Him, and are one with Him, are 'the children of Abraham, and heirs according to the promise.' Rom. 4:9—17. 11:16—21. But no outward forms or profession can ensure these blessings, for 'if any man have not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his.' Rom. 2:5—9. SCOTT.

concerning the baptism of infants, is not at all affected by the apostle's language in this passage; for the same way of arguing, by which some have attempted to prove, that they ought not to be baptized because incapable of believing, would also prove them incapable of salvation; Mk. 16:14—16. and also prove, that the male infants of Israel ought not to have been circumcised.—The mention of 'male and female,' in this connexion, and here alone, evidently refers to the difference between circumcision, as restricted to the males, and baptism which is administered to females also 1 Cor. 7:10—14. Col. 3:7—11.—Slaves are now the Lord's freemen, and freemen the Lord's servants; and this consideration makes the free humble, and the slave cheerful.' Doddr. 1 Cor. 7:17—24.

NOTES. CHAP. IV. V. 1—3. The heir of an estate, during his minority, is excluded from the possession of it, and even kept in subjection. And this continues till the time 'appointed by his father,' in his will or otherwise, for his coming of age, and being put in possession of the estate. Thus the church was held in a degree of bondage under the Mosaic law, till the coming of Christ; as being in its childhood, and under tuition. These observances are called 'the elements of this world.' They taught the simplest rudiments of religious knowledge, as the alphabet contains the first principles of science. Heb. 5:11—14. 6:1—3. And the external ceremonies of that dispensation were suited to the ideas of worldly men, and in many things similar to the rites of other nations, rather than the most suitable means of spiritual worship, or adapted to those, who were matured in spiritual judgment and affections. The splendid temple, the priests in their sacred vestments, the multiplied sacrifices and religious festivals, and other things of the same kind, when their typical meaning and use were undiscerned or neglected, were coincident with the gross apprehensions of carnal men concerning God and his worship. Unbelievers had always thus perverted them, and even believers were held in comparative darkness and bondage, by so many external observances. SCOTT.

(2.) Tutors.} Epitropoi. Governors.} Oikonomoi: if there was a difference, the former are thought to be guardians by law, the latter those appointed by parents. Others think the former synonymous with paidagogoi, [persons set over children,] and the latter, to mean those aged servants, to whom was committed, together with the care of the domestic affairs, the superintendance of the education of the children. It is perhaps unnecessary to press on the exact sense of these terms, and their difference. El. Comp. Gen. 24:1. 15:2. ED.

tion of sons ; that we might no longer be accounted and treated as servants, but as sons grown up to maturity, who are allowed greater freedoms, and admitted to larger privileges, than while under tutors and governors. This the course of the apostle's argument leads us to notice, as one thing intended by this expression, though, no doubt, it may also be understood as signifying that gracious adoption which the Gospel so often speaks of, as the privilege of those who believe in Christ. Israel was God's son, his first-born, Rom. 9:4. But now, under the Gospel, particular believers receive the adoption ; and, as an earnest and evidence of it, they have together therewith the Spirit of adoption, putting them on the duty of prayer, and enabling them in prayer to eye God as a Father, v. 6. And hereupon, the apostle concludes this argument, by adding, v. 7. that now, under the gospel-state, we are no longer under the servitude of the law, but, on our believing in Christ, become the sons of God, are accepted of Him, and adopted by Him ; and, being the sons, are also heirs of God, and entitled to the heavenly inheritance, Rom. 8:17. so that it must needs be the greatest weakness and folly to turn back to the law, and to seek justification by the works of it.

V. 8—11. In these vs. the apostle puts them in mind of what they were before their conversion, and what a blessed change that had made on them ; thence he endeavors to convince them of their great weakness in hearkening to those who would bring them under the bondage of the law of Moses.

1. They were grossly ignorant of the true God, and the way wherein He is to be worshipped ; they were under the worst of slaveries, employed in a great number of superstitious and idolatrous services to those, who, though accounted gods, were yet really no gods, but mere creatures, perhaps of their own making, and therefore utterly unable to hear and help them.

2. Now they had known God ; they were brought to the knowledge of the true God, and of his Son Jesus Christ, whereby they were recovered out of their former ignorance and bondage ; or rather were known of God ; it was not owing to themselves, but to Him ; it was the effect of his free and rich grace toward them, and as such they ought to account it ; therefore hereby they were laid under the greater obligation to adhere to the liberty wherewith He had made them free. All our acquaintance with God begins with Him ; we know Him, because we are known of Him.

3. Hence he infers the unreasonableness and madness of their suffering themselves to be brought again into a state of bondage ; he speaks of it with surprise and deep concern of mind, that such as they should do so, v. 9. They had the less reason for it, since they had never been under the law of Moses, as the Jews had been ; therefore they were more inexcusable than the Jews themselves, who might be supposed to have some fondness for that which had been of so long standing among them. Besides, what they suffered themselves to be brought into bondage to, were such things as had no power in them to cleanse the soul, or to afford any solid satisfaction to the mind, and were only designed for that state of pupillage under which the church had been, and which was now come to a period ; therefore their weakness and folly were the more aggravated, in submitting to them, and in symbolizing with the Jews in observing their various festivals, here signified by days, and months, and times, and years.

4. Hereupon he expresses his fears. He had been at great pains in preaching the Gospel to them, and endeavoring to confirm them in the faith and liberty of it ; but now they were giving up these, and thereby rendering his labor fruitless and ineffectual, and this could not but deeply affect him. Those will have a great deal to answer for, on whom the faithful ministers of Jesus Christ bestow labor in vain.

V. 12—16. That these Christians might be the more ashamed of their defection from the truth of the Gospel, Paul here reminds them of the great affection they formerly had for him and his ministry, and puts them on considering how very unsuitable their present behavior was to what they then professed.

1. How affectionately he addresses them ; and thus he endeavors to mollify their spirits toward him, that so they might the better receive the admonitions he was giving them ; teaching us, that, in reproving others, we should take care to convince them that our reproofs do not proceed from any private PRACT. OBS. V. 1—11. While we are or ought to be thankful for the light, liberty, and privileges of the Gospel, we should cheerfully submit to the restraints and corrections of our heavenly Father, in this our state of education for perfect felicity, and patiently wait for the time appointed by Him for our admission to it ; and we ought to delight in the 'easy yoke' of our Redeemer, whose 'service is perfect freedom.' Thus He was also 'made under the law,' being born of a Jewess, and the reputed Son of a Jew, and circumcised ; that so, being 'under the law,' as a covenant of works, He might, as the Surety of the church, in every way answer its full demand. He was pleased, for between 30 and 40 years, to tabernacle here on earth, in perfect obedience to the whole law ; and at length to give Himself, a spotless sacrifice of infinite value, 'to redeem those, who were under the law,' and its righteous curse or condemnation, from that awful curse. 3:10—14. 'Selden brings a very pertinent quotation from the Babylonian Gemara, to prove, that it was not allowed to slaves [v. 1.] to use the title of Abba, in addressing the master of a family to which they belonged, or the correspondent title of Imma, or mother, when speaking to the mistress of it.' Doddr.

V. 8—11. The preceding argument fully proved, that even Jewish converts were redeemed from the yoke of the ceremonial law, as well as from the curse of the covenant of works. How absurd then would it be, for Gentiles to adopt that abrogated system ! In this sense alone could the Galatians be said 'to turn again to the weak and beggarly elements ;' (for they had not before been under the ceremonial law) ; in that, when delivered from idolatry, they were about to substitute the ab-rogated ceremonial law, in the place of the heathen superstitious, and to bring themselves into bondage to judaizing teachers and pharisaical traditions, after having been emancipated from the pagan priests. (9) Beggarly, &c.] 'Thus he calls these rites in themselves, and considered apart from Christ.' Beza. 'Paul calls them "weak and beggarly elements," whereby it should seem, they were empty of all spiritual meaning. I answer, such they were become, indeed, when Christ was once come, . . . when the grace signified in them was brought out into the light, when the inwrapped promises were unfolded and revealed, they were then as empty shells, and like carcasses whose soul was gone. So long as a shell contains a kernel unseen, so long it is full ; when it comes forth to outward view, then the shell is empty. Even so it is with the elements of the law.' Mede.—The best illustration of the absurd conduct, which the apostle ascribes to the Galatians, may be found in the church of Rome, in which the worship of saints and angels succeeded to that of the inferior deities ; the superstitious and often licentious festivals multiplied among them, to those which had been used in pagan Rome. In short, almost every part of the idolatrous worship of pagan Rome, has its counterpart in that of antichristian Rome—this may be clearly perceived by any man, who will take the pains to compare many passages in Virgil, and other Latin and Greek poets, with the rituals of the church of Rome. But, whatever it was, it seems it made no impression on them to his disadvantage. For, (2.) He notices,

PRACT. OBS. V. 12—20. It behooves us, when we think ourselves unkindly treated, to recollect the instances, in which we experienced the candor and affection of our hearers, and when they overlooked those infirmities and defects, if not instances of misconduct, which we feared would have occasioned the rejection of our message. We may also remind them, when they seem about to turn aside, of those tender and sweet seasons, when they welcomed the Gospel as preached by such poor worms; and when their hearts were so full of 'blessedness,' that they scarcely knew how sufficiently to express their gratitude, even to the instruments of their hopes and consolations. Contrasting these happy seasons with that coldness and disaffection, which too frequently follow, without any apparent reason, we may, with efficacy, inquire, but acknowledge his lenity with tears.' Beza.—Being desirous of considering the Galatians as his brethren in Christ, he affectionately entreated them to 'be as he was,' as cordial in their love to him, as he was in his love to them; or rather, of one mind with him, respecting justification and the Mosaic law; for 'he was as they were,' though he had been 'zealous for the law,' (as they were now become!) yet he now trusted only in Christ, and put no more confidence in the law, than if he had been a Gentile; and he entreated them in this to imitate him.—Doubtless the apostle here spake of 'his thorn in the flesh,' which must therefore have been some perceivable infirmity, that exposed him to inward temptations, and to the contempt of his enemies; and indeed it is absurd to explain this of his persecutions, which were no plausible reason why he should be despised, but the contrary.

But I assent to Koppe and Berger, that this sense cannot be elicited from the words. The following sense (of the Syr. and Arab., Ham., Starck, Zeltner, Beausobre, that, notwithstanding his infirmity, they did not despise or reject him on the account of it, but, on the contrary, showed him [the very highest] respect; even as though an angel of God, or Jesus Christ Himself, had preached to them. Yea, so great was their esteem of him, that, if it would have been any advantage to him, they could have plucked out their own eyes, and have given them to him. How uncertain the respects of people, and how easily they are drawn into a contempt of those for whom they once had the greatest esteem and affection! We should therefore labor to be accepted of God, for it is a small thing to be judged of man's judgment, 1 Cor. 4:3.

3. How earnestly he expostulates with them hereupon, v. 15. As if he had said, 'Time was, when you expressed the greatest joy and satisfaction in the glad tidings of the Gospel, and were very forward in pouring out your blessings on me, as the publisher of them; whence is it that you are now so much altered, that you have so little relish of them, or respect for me? You once thought yourselves happy in receiving the Gospel; have you now any reason to think otherwise?' The more to impress on them a just shame of their present conduct, he again asks, v. 16. 'How is it that I, who was heretofore your favorite, am now accounted your enemy? Can you pretend any other reason for it, than that I have told you the truth, endeavored to acquaint you with, and to confirm you in, the truth of the Gospel? And if not, how unreasonable must your disaffection be! It is no uncommon thing for men to account those their enemies, who are really their best friends; and ministers may create enemies to themselves by the faithful discharge of their duty. Yet they must not forbear speaking the truth, for fear of offending others, and drawing their displeasure on them. And lastly, they may be easy in their own minds, when conscious, that, if others are become their enemies, it is only for telling them the truth.'

V. 17, 18. The apostle having, just before, been expostulating with the Galatians about the change of their behavior toward him, he here gives them the character of those false teachers who made it their business to draw them away; which, if they would attend to, they might soon see how little reason they had to hearken to them; he tells them they were designing men, who were aiming to set up themselves, and who, under their specious pretences, were more consulting their own interest than theirs; 'They zealously affect you,' says he; 'they show a mighty respect, and pretend a great deal of affection for you, but not well; not with any good design, for they would exclude you, to engage your affections to them, draw them off from me, and from the truth, that so they may engross you to themselves.' Observe, It is the usual way of seducers, to insinuate themselves into people's affections, and so draw them into their opinions, and so draw them into their opinions. Whatever pretences such may make, they have usually more regard to their own interest than that of others, and will not stick at ruining the reputation of others, if by that mean they can raise their own. On this occasion the apostle gives us an excellent rule, v. 18. What our tr. renders, in a good thing, some render, to a good man, and so consider the apostle as pointing to himself; this sense, they think, is favored both by the preceding context, and the following, and not only when I am present with you; which may be as if he had said, 'Time was, when ye were zealously affected toward me; ye once took me for a good man, and have now no reason to think otherwise of me; surely then it would become you to show the same regard to me, now I am absent, which ye did when I was present.' But if we adhere to our own tr., the apostle here furnishes us with a very good rule to direct and regulate us in the exercise of our zeal; two things to this purpose he more especially recommends to us; (1.) That it be exercised only on that which is good; And, (2.) That herein it be constant and steady. Happy would it be for the church of Christ, if this rule was better observed among Christians!

V. 19, 20. That the apostle might the better dispose these Christians to bear with him, in the reproofs he was obliged to give them, he here expresses his great affection to them, and very tender concern for their welfare; he still bore the same respect to them he had formerly done; (notwithstanding their fickleness;) nor was he like their false teachers, but his concern was sincere, for their good; he sought not theirs, but them. He assures them he was their friend; nay, had the bowels of a parent toward them. He calls them his children, as he justly might, since he had been the instrument of their conversion; yea, he styles them his little children, which denotes a greater degree of tenderness and affection to them, and possibly, that in their present behavior they showed themselves too like little children, who are easily wrought on by the arts and insinuations of others. He expresses his earnest desire of their welfare and soul-prosperity, by the pangs of a travelling woman; and the great thing he was in so much pain about, and so earnestly desirous of, was, that Christ might be formed in them; that they might become Christians indeed, and be more confirmed and established in the faith of the Gospel. Whence note, I.

'what is become of their blessedness, and whether we be looked on as enemies, because we tell them the truth. Alas! this is often the case, not only with false professors of the Gospel, but even with misguided believers.—At such times, the most affectionate warnings, and scriptural arguments, generally give offence, and increase alienation. This is a most trying situation to the faithful minister. He cannot cease to feel for his deluded children, and to long after them. Though he could bear to lose their affections, he cannot be willing that they should lose their souls; he must remind them, that their zealous affections should be towards more substantial good, than new notions and new teachers, as in the sight of God, and not merely in the presence of their ministers.

21 Tell me, ye that desire to be under the law, do ye not hear the law ?

22 For it is written, That Abraham had two sons, the one <sup>n</sup> by a bondmaid, the other <sup>o</sup> by a freewoman.

23 But he who was of the <sup>p</sup> bondwoman was born after the flesh; but he of the freewoman was by promise.

24 Which things are an <sup>q</sup> allegory: for these are the two <sup>r</sup> covenants; the one from the mount <sup>s</sup> Sinai, which gendereth to bondage, which is Agar.

25 For this Agar is mount Sinai, in Arabia, and <sup>t</sup> answereth to Jerusalem which now is, and is in bondage with her children.

26 But Jerusalem <sup>v</sup> which is above is free, which is the mother of us all.

27 For it is written, <sup>w</sup> Rejoice, thou barren that bearest not; break forth and cry, thou that travailest not; for the desolate hath many more children than she which hath an husband.

28 Now <sup>x</sup> we, brethren, as Isaac was, are the children of promise.

29 But as then, he <sup>y</sup> that was born after the flesh persecuted him that was born after the Spirit, even so <sup>z</sup> it is now.

30 Nevertheless what saith <sup>a</sup> the Scripture? Cast out the bondwoman and her son: for the son of the bondwoman shall not be heir with the son of the freewoman.

31 So then, brethren, we are not children of the bondwoman, but of the free.

The very tender affection faithful ministers bear toward those among whom they are employed. 2. The chief thing they long and even travail in birth for, on their account, is, not so much that they may gain their affections, much less make a prey of them, but that they may be renewed in the spirit of their minds, wrought into the image of Christ, and more fully settled in the Christian faith and life; and how unreasonably must those people act, who suffer themselves to be prevailed upon to desert or dislike such ministers! 3. Christ is not fully formed in men till they are brought off from trusting in their own righteousness, and made to rely only on Him and his righteousness.

As a further evidence of his affection and concern, he adds his desire to be with them, that thereupon he might find occasion to change his voice toward them; for at present he was not so fully acquainted with their state, as to know how to accommodate himself to them; he was full of fears, but would be glad to find matters better with them than he feared, and that he might have occasion to commend instead of thus reproving and chiding.

V. 21—31. In these vs. the apostle illustrates the difference between believers who rested in Christ only, and those judaizers who trusted in the law, by a comparison taken from the story of Isaac and Ishmael. Since they were so very fond of being under the law, he would have them duly to consider what is written therein, referring to Gen. chs. 16. and 21. which if they would do, they might soon see how little reason they had for it. And here,

1. He sets before them the history itself, v. 22, 23. Here he represents the different state and condition of these two sons of Abraham; that the one was by a bondmaid, and the other, by a freewoman; and that whereas the former was born after the flesh, or by the ordinary course of nature, the other was by promise, when in the course of nature there was no reason to expect that Sarah should have a son.

2. He acquaints them with the meaning and design of this history, or the use he intended to make of it, v. 24—27. These things, says he, are an allegory, wherein, beside the literal and historical sense of the words, the Spirit of God might design to signify something further to us, and that was, That these two, Agar and Sarah, are the two covenants, or were intended to typify and prefigure the two different dispensations of the covenant. The former, Agar, represented that which was given from Sinai, which though a dispensation of grace, yet, in comparison of the gospel-state, was a dispensation of bondage, and became more so to the Jews, through their mistake of the design of it, and expecting to be justified by the works of it. For this Agar is mount Sinai in Arabia, (mount Sinai was then called Agar by the Arabians,) and it answereth to Jerusalem which now is, and is in bondage with her children; that is, it justly represents the present state of the Jews, who, continuing in their infidelity, and adhering to that covenant, are still in bondage with their children. But the other, Sarah, was intended to prefigure Jerusalem which is above, or the state of Christians under the new and better dispensation of the covenant, which is free both from the curse of the moral and the bondage of the ceremonial law, and is the mother of us all; a state into which all, both Jews and Gentiles, are admitted, on their believing in Christ. And to this greater freedom and enlargement of the church under the Gospel dispensation, which was typified by Sarah, the mother of the promised seed, the apostle refers, Is. 54: 1.

3. He applies the history thus explained, to the present case, v. 28. Now we, brethren, PRACT. OBS. V. 21—31. Not only do allegories and types instruct us, but the plainest language imaginable declares the two covenants, that from Sinai, and that of Christ, to be perfectly distinct, and even of opposite tendency, to those who now are under them. They who are 'born of the flesh,' whether of Jewish or Christian parents, but not 'of the Spirit,' John 3:3—11. and who in any degree depend for justification on circumcision, baptism, or any personal obedience whatsoever, or even on creeds, however scriptural, or on being members of this or the other church, however excellent, are under the covenant of works, mere Ishmaelites, bond-slaves, citizens of the earthly Jerusalem, but under condemnation. But those who 'are born of the Spirit,' and so believe in Christ, trusting only in his merits and grace, are the 'children of the promise,' and of the heavenly Jerusalem; they possess true liberty, and are the heirs of everlasting felicity. Millions have already been thus 'born of God,' in the Gentile world, which once lay desolate; and we should pray, and do what we can in every way, that such places as still continue barren, (alas, how numerous and extensive!) may speedily produce far more converts, than have yet been made in the most flourishing churches; [encouraged as we are by God's gracious promises, and 'the signs of the times;'] and especially, that Israel may speedily be gathered from his abject state, which shall be 'as life from the dead' to the nations of the earth. SCOTT.

V. 21—31. We should not, perhaps, have discovered this allegory, in the history of Sarah and Hagar, if the apostle had not shown it to us; and much sobriety and discretion ought to be used in thus applying scriptural narrations; yet this transaction was so remarkable, the coincidence so exact, and the illustration so instructive, that we cannot doubt it originally was intended by the Holy Spirit, as an allegory and type of those things, to which the inspired apostle referred it; and it should be observed, that it was adduced, as an illustration of the subject under consideration, and not as a direct argument, or proof of it. — (27) Rejoice thou barren, &c.] From the LXX, which accords to the Heb. Is. 54:1.—(30) Cast out, &c.] This varies in things not material to the sense, both from the LXX, and from the Heb. Gen. 21:10. 'An allegory is, when one thing is spoken in words, but another is intended in meaning.' Schleusner. SCOTT.

(23.) 'It was intended to verify the somewhat impossible assertion he had before made, that they (the Galatians) were sons of Abraham; q. d. Ye are such, though not after the flesh; just as Isaac was the more genuine son of Abraham, though himself not born after the flesh, but formed by the Spirit, according to the divine promise; whereas Ishmael was born in the common course of nature; and yet he that was after the flesh was a slave, and had no participation in the inheritance; but he that was after the Spirit was the master and heir. What then is to hinder you from being Abraham's genuine sons, since you have become such by regeneration in baptism?' Theoph., Chrys., Bloomf. But see the note of Scott on 3:26—29. Ed.

(24.) Borzer, in Bloomf., gives the following scheme of correspondence. A. The Jews are servile, as the offspring of Hagar was servile. B. The Jews are sons after the flesh, as Ishmael was after the flesh. A. Christians are free, as the offspring of Sarah was free. B. Christians are sons through the promise, as Isaac was through the promise. Or, with a reference to the image of a mother, thus: A. The Jewish religion is, like Hagar, the mother of slaves. A. The Christian religion, like Sarah, is the mother of a free posterity.' 'I would choose, (says Doddr.) to explain this passage of Paul as an allusion, rather than an argument: which frees it from many objections and embarrassments to which it would otherwise have appeared liable. If any should urge, that such glosses are of little importance, it may be sufficient to reply, that they were much in the Jewish taste, and that we may assure ourselves, that the apostles were preserved from anything in them which was not perfectly agreeable to the mind of the Spirit. On the whole, I entirely agree with Mr. Chandler, that this part of the epistle was not intended to prove Christianity, but to illustrate the different genius of that and Judaism, and to show, that not all the carnal descendants of Abraham, but the spiritual offspring only, were heirs, even according to the principles which the Jews themselves readily admitted.' Doddr. 'This way of reasoning was, to the judaizing zealots, familiar and conclusive.' OWEN.

(24.) A long list of comtrs. in Bl. 'understand the Gr., to Agar, as not the name of the bondwoman, Hagar, but the Arabic word, Hagar, a rock or rocky mountain, as Sinai is, and was eminently called. That it bore the name Hagar, is attested by all the ancient commentators, and especially Chrys., himself a native of the E. And so many modern travellers; see Busching. El-hagar, also, is the name given to Arabia Petraea.' Ed.

(26.) Jerusalem from above. 'The Christian church, the economy of the N. T. (Schoettg., Wets., Chrys., &c.); the most common opinion, however, is, that it signifies the heavenly Jerusalem: which, however, I see not how we can understand otherwise than of the gospel-dispensation, as the earthly Jerusalem represented the old. So I would combine both senses.' BLOOMF.

(29.) Persecuted. 'Vexed; the Gr. denotes injurious treatment of every kind, both by words as well as deeds; as in Gen. 21:9. See also the Rabbins in Wets. From Gen. 21:10. &c., it appears, that Ishmael not only mocked Isaac, but claimed a share of the inheritance with him, which (as he had no just title [in law] to it, and derided the pretensions of the lawful heir) was a persecution, and thus typified the contempt and violence with which the Jews, the natural seed of Abraham, urged their claim to a spiritual inheritance, deriding and excluding those who expected justification by faith.' 1 He moveth them to stand in their liberty, 3 and not to observe circumcision: 13 but rather love, which is the sum of the law. 19 He reckoneth up the works of the flesh, 22 and the fruits of the Spirit, 25 and exhorteth to walk in the Spirit.

STAND <sup>a</sup> fast therefore in the <sup>b</sup> liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free, and be not entangled again with the yoke of bondage.

2 Behold, I Paul say unto you, That if ye be circumcised, Christ shall profit you nothing.

3 For I testify again to every man that is circumcised, that he is a debtor to do the whole law.

4 Christ is become of no effect <sup>c</sup> unto you, whosoever of you are justified by the law: ye are fallen <sup>d</sup> from grace.

says he, we Christians, who have accepted Christ, and rely on Him, and look for justification and salvation by Him alone, as hereby we become the spiritual, though not the natural, seed of Abraham, so we are entitled to the promised inheritance, and interested in its blessings. But lest these Christians should be stumbled at the opposition they might meet with from the Jews, who were so tenacious of their law as to be ready to persecute those who would not submit to it, he tells them that this was no more than was pointed to in the type; for as then, he that was born after the flesh persecuted him that was born after the Spirit, they must expect it would be so now. But, for their comfort in this case, he desires them to consider what the Scripture saith, Gen. 21:10. Cast out the bond-woman and her son, for the son of the bond-woman shall not be heir with the son of the free-woman. Though the judaizers should persecute and hate them, yet the issue would be, that Judaism would sink, and wither, and perish; but true Christianity should flourish and last for ever. And then, as a general inference from the whole, or the sum of what he had said, he concludes, v. 31. So then, brethren, we are not children of the bond-woman, but of the free.

CHAP. V. In this ch. the apostle comes to make application of his foregoing discourse.

V. 1—12. This ch., or these vs. in particular are, as it were, the general inference or application of all that discourse in the last ch. Since then we can be justified only by faith in Christ, and not by the righteousness of the law; and that the law of Moses was no longer in force, nor Christians under any obligation to submit to it; therefore he would have them to stand fast in the liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free, and not to be again entangled with the yoke of bondage.

Here observe, 1. Under the Gospel we are enfranchised; freed from the yoke of the ceremonial law, and from the curse of the moral law; so that we are no longer tied to the observance of the one, nor tied up to the rigor of the other, which curses every one that continues not in all things written therein to do them, ch. 3:10. 2. We owe this liberty to Jesus Christ; by his merits He has satisfied the demands of the broken law, and by his authority as a King He has discharged us from the obligation of those carnal ordinances which were imposed on the Jews. And, 3. It is therefore our duty constantly and faithfully to adhere to the Gospel, and to the liberty of it, and not to suffer ourselves, on any considerations, to be again entangled with the yoke of bondage, or persuaded to return back to the law of Moses. This general caution, or exhortation, the apostle enforces, in the following verses, by several arguments. As,

I. That their submitting to circumcision, and depending on the works of the law for righteousness, was an implicit contradiction of their faith as Christians, and a forfeiture of all their advantages by Jesus Christ, v. 2—4. This he declares with great solemnity, and much assurance, v. 2, 3. He is not speaking of mere circumcision, nor was it his design to say, that none who are circumcised could have any benefit by Christ; for all the O. T. saints had been circumcised, and he himself had consented to the circumcising of Timothy. But he is to be understood as speaking of circumcision in the sense in which the judaizing teachers did impose it, who taught, that except they were circumcised, and kept the law of Moses, they could not be saved, Acts 15:1. That this is his meaning, appears from v. 4. where he expresses the same thing by their being justified by the law, or seeking justification by the works of it. Now, in this case, if they submitted to circumcision in this sense, he declares that Christ would profit them nothing; that they were debtors to do the whole law; (which required such an obedience as they were not capable of; [and never would perform;] denouncing a curse against those who failed [in the least article], and condemned them [irremediably];) so that Christ was become of no effect to them; and that they were fallen from grace. Therefore there was the greatest reason why they should steadfastly adhere to that doctrine they had embraced, and not suffer themselves to be brought under this yoke of bondage. Note, Though Jesus Christ is able to save to the uttermost, yet there are multitudes to whom He shall profit nothing. All who seek to be justified by the law, do thereby render Christ of no effect to them; by building their hopes on the works of the law, they forfeit all their hopes from Him, for He will not be the Savior of any who do not own and rely on Him as their only Savior.

II. To persuade them to steadfastness in the doctrine and liberty of the Gospel, he sets before them his own example, and that of other Jews who had embraced the Christian religion, v. 5. Though Jews by nature, they looked for justification and salvation only by faith in Christ; and therefore it must needs be the greatest folly in those who had never been under the law, to suffer themselves to be brought into subjection to it, and to found their hopes on its works. Here observe, 1. What Christians wait for, the hope of righteousness, i. e. chiefly, the happiness of the other world, called the hope of Christians, as being the great object of their hope above everything else, and the hope of righteousness, as their hopes of it are founded on righteousness, not their own, but that of our Lord Jesus; for though a life of righteousness is the way that leads to this happiness, yet the righteousness of Christ alone has procured it for us, and we can expect it only on account of that. 2. How they hope to obtain this happiness, by faith in our Lord Jesus Christ, not by the works of the law, or anything they can do to deserve it, but only by faith, receiving and relying on Him as the Lord our Righteousness. And, 3. Whence it is they thus wait for the hope of righteousness, through the Spirit; herein they act under the direction and influence of the Holy Spirit; by his assistance they are both persuaded and enabled to believe on Christ, and to look for the hope of righteousness through Him.

III. He argues from the nature and design of the Christian institution, which was to abolish the difference between Jew and Gentile, and to establish faith in Christ, as the way of our acceptance with God. He tells them, v. 6. that in Christ Jesus, or under the gospel-dispensation, neither circumcision availeth anything, nor uncircumcision. While the legal state lasted, there was a difference between Jew and Greek, between those who were, and those who were not, circumcised; but now it was neither here nor there whether a man was circumcised or uncircumcised, neither the one nor the other would recommend him to God; therefore their judaizing teachers were very unreasonable in imposing circumcision on them, and they very unwise in submitting to them herein. But he acquaints them what would avail, and that is, faith; such faith in Christ as discovers itself to be true, and genuine, by a sincere love to God and our neighbor. If they had this, it mattered not whether they were circumcised or uncircumcised, but without it nothing else would stand them in any stead.

IV. To recover them from their backslidings, and engage them to greater steadfastness for the future, he puts them in mind of their good beginnings, and calls on them to

NOTES. CHAP. V. V. 1—6. He [the apostle] did not oppose the observance of the ceremonial law, as evil in itself; but as their dependence on it was wholly incompatible with the method of justification revealed in the Gospel.—It is to be noted, that circumcision is here to be considered, partly from the circumstances of the times, (when it had ceased to be “the seal of the righteousness of faith,” as by baptism it was abolished,) and partly from the sentiments of those adversaries, who were desirous to connect it with Christ, as if some part of salvation resided in it. Beza. “If the whole confidence of the soul do not rest on Him for salvation, He will reject those divided regards which are offered to Him, and interpret them as an affront, rather than an acceptable homage.” Doctr.—It is not easy to perceive, how they should have justification and salvation from Him, from whom, after the revelation made of Him, they did not expect it; nor have faith in Him for justification, by whom they thought not they should be justified. Whit. Sc.

(3.) Again.] “I. e. furthermore, on the other hand. Whole law.] “For circumcision demands sacrifices, and observes days; sacrifice requires place, and mode, and purifications. Purification, again, requires other observances, all having a necessary connexion; so that, if you undertake a little of the law, you submit to the burden of the whole.” Theoph. BLOOMF.

(4.) Become of no effect, &c.] “The Gr. signifies, properly, “to be [370]

So Theoph. Justified.] Seek to be justified. So Æc. The words following tes charitos [tr. from græc] are added by way of explanation, and the sense is: “ye miss of justifying græc.” See Wets. Or, as Borger explains, (with a reference to us, vs. 5, 6.) “ye no longer profess the Christian religion, and therefore are not to be accounted Christians at all.” Bl. “Yea, by this mean, whatever your profession may have been of a regard to Christ, ye are indeed fallen from the grace of the Gospel, and have in effect renounced your expectations from it.” Down.

(5.) Spirit.] “We (Christians) do not expect or hope for salvation by any external rites, but by the internal feelings, i. e. by faith. So Borger, Ros., Par., Grot. But this seems a very frigid, feeble, and forced sense. Far preferable is that of Wolf, who explains pneumati of the doctrine of the Gospel, or the economy of the new covenant, as opposed to the flesh, just called the law. And to this Koppe inclines, thinking it equivalent to through grace; as at 4:29. by the Spirit is equivalent to by the promise. But after all, I see no reason to desert the ancient and common opinion, that pneuma here signifies the Holy Spirit.—Wait for.] The Gr. is very energetic, denoting anxious longing and earnest hoping, thrusting and stretching forward the neck, as it were; and Paul seems to have had in mind the beautiful passage, Deut. 28:32. *Comp. 8 This persuasion cometh not of him that calleth you.

9 A little <sup>d</sup> leaven leaveneth the whole lump.

10 I have confidence in you through the Lord, that ye will be none otherwise minded; but he that troubleth you shall bear <sup>e</sup> his judgment, whosoever he be.

11 And I, brethren, if I yet preach circumcision, why do I yet suffer <sup>f</sup> persecution? then is the offence <sup>g</sup> of the cross ceased.

He tells them, that at their first setting out in Christianity they had discovered a becoming zeal in it; they did run well, lived up to their profession. But they had been obstructed in their progress, and were either turned out of the way, or at least made to flag and falter in it. 2. Therefore, though he well knew, he asks them, and calls on them to ask themselves, Who did hinder them? He would have them seriously consider, whether they had any good reason to hearken to those who gave them this disturbance, and whether what they offered was sufficient to justify their present conduct. Note, Young converts must expect that Satan will be doing all he can to divert them from the course they are in; but whenever they find themselves in danger of being turned out of it, they will do well to consider who hinders them. Whoever they were that hindered these Christians, the apostle tells them, that by hearkening to them, they were kept from obeying the truth, and thereby in danger of losing the benefit of what they had done in religion. If therefore they should suffer themselves to be drawn away, they must needs be guilty of the greatest weakness and folly. Note, The truth is not only to be believed, but to be obeyed; to be received, not only in the light of it, but in the love and power of it. They do not rightly obey the truth, who do not steadfastly adhere to it. There is the same reason for our

PRACT. OBS. V. 1-12. While so many are struggling for personal and political liberty, or disputing about it, as the greatest of earthly blessings, let us aspire after and 'stand fast in the liberty wherewith Christ has made his people free;' that walking before God with the humble and obedient confidence of children, we may steadfastly reject every 'yoke of bondage,' with which Satan or his ministers may attempt to entangle us. Especially we should regard the apostle's warnings, to keep clear of all dependence on our own works for justification; as in that case 'Christ will profit us nothing.' It is to be feared, that very large numbers impose on themselves in this matter; they imagine that the obeying the truth that there was for our embracing it; therefore they act very unreasonably, who, when they have begun to run well in the Christian race, suffer themselves to be hindered, so as not to persevere in it.

V. He argues for their steadfastness in the faith and liberty of the Gospel, from the ill rise of that persuasion, whereby they were drawn away from it, v. 8. The opinion or persuasion he here speaks of, was, no doubt, that of the necessity of their being circumcised, and keeping the law of Moses, or of their mixing the works of the law with faith in Christ, in the business of justification. This persuasion did not come of Him that called them, i. e. either of God, by whose authority the Gospel had been preached to them, and they had been called into the fellowship of it; or of the apostle himself, who had been employed as the instrument of calling them hereunto: not from God, for it was contrary to that way of justification and salvation He had established; nor from Paul himself; for, whatever some might pretend, he had all along been an opposer of circumcision; and if in any instance he had submitted to it for the sake of peace, yet he had never pressed the use of it on Christians, much less imposed it on them as necessary to salvation. Thus, he leaves them to judge whence it must arise; and sufficiently intimates, that it could be owing to none but Satan and his instruments, who by this mean were endeavoring to overthrow their faith, and obstruct the progress of the Gospel; and therefore that the Galatians had every reason to reject it, and to continue steadfast in the truth they had before embraced. Note, 1. In order to our judging aright of the different persuasions in religion there are among Christians, it concerns us to inquire, whether they come of Him that calleth us, whether or no they are founded on the authority of Christ and his apostles. 2. If, on inquiry, they appear to have no such foundation, how forward soever others may be to impose them on us, we should by no means submit to them, but reject them.

VI. The danger there was of the spreading of this infection, and the ill influence it might have on others, is a further argument the apostle urges against their complying with their false teachers, in what they would impose on them. To extenuate their fault, they might say, there were but few of those teachers among them, who endeavored to draw them into this persuasion; or, that they complied only in some less matters. Or, they might further say, there were but few among them, who had done so, and therefore he needed not be so much concerned about it. Now, to obviate such pretences, and to convince them there was more danger in it than they were aware of, he tells them, v. 9. that a little leaven leaveneth the whole lump; that the whole of Christianity may be tainted, and corrupted, by one such erroneous principle; or the whole of the Christian society be infected by one member of it; therefore, that they were greatly concerned not to yield in this single instance; or, if any had done so, to endeavor by all proper methods to purge out the infection from among them. Note, It is dangerous for Christian churches to encourage those among them, who entertain, especially who set themselves to propagate, destructive errors.

VII. That he might conciliate the greater regard to what he had said, he expresses his hopes concerning them, v. 10. He had many fears and doubts about them, yet he hoped that, through the blessing of God on what he had written, they might be brought to be of the same mind with him, and to own and abide by that truth, and that liberty of the Gospel, which he had preached to them, and was now endeavoring to confirm them in. Herein he teaches us, that we ought to hope the best, even of those concerning whom we have cause to fear the worst. That they might be the less offended, and sooner reformed, by the reproofs he had given them, for their unsteadfastness in the faith, he lays the blame of it more on others than themselves; possibly he may point to some one man, who was more busy and forward than others, and the chief instrument of the disorder among them; and this may give us occasion to observe, that in reproving sin and error, we should always distinguish between the leaders and the led. But as for him or them that troubled them, whoever he or they were, he did not doubt but God would deal with them according to their deserts; and out of his just indignation against them, as enemies of Christ and his church, he wishes that they were even cut off; not from Christ, and all hopes of salvation by Him, but by the censures of the church, which ought to witness against those teachers, who thus corrupted the purity of the Gospel. Those, whether ministers or others, who set themselves to overthrow the faith of the Gospel, and disturb the peace of Christians, do thereby forfeit the privileges of Christian communion, and deserve to be cut off from them.

VIII. To dissuade these Christians from hearkening to their judaizing teachers, and to recover them from their ill impressions, he represents them as men who had used very base and disingenuous methods to compass their designs, for they had misrepresented him, the more easily to gain their ends on them. They had given out, that Paul himself was a preacher of circumcision, v. 11. It plainly appears that they had reported him to have done so, and that they had made use of this, as an argument to prevail with them to submit to it. Probably they grounded this report on his having circumcised Timothy, Acts 16:3. To prove the injustice of this charge on him, he offers such arguments, as, merits of Christ will make up for their deficiencies, while their real dependence is placed on their own morality, alms, devotions, or superstitions. May we then keep at a distance from this fatal rock, and be of that number, who 'through the Spirit wait for the hope of righteousness by faith?' Yet many, who 'seemed to run well' in this evangelical race, have been hindered from obeying the truth, by those who perplexed them with refined notions, or labored to proselyte them to some new sect or form; so that, instead of 'the work of faith, and labor of love, and patience of hope,' they have turned aside to vain jangling, and zeal for trifling distinctions, and the 'shibboleths' of a party. V. 7-12. Why did he not command the Galatians to excommunicate them, as he had required the Corinthians to deliver the incestuous person to Satan? 1 Cor. 5:1-5, 9-13. 2 Cor. 2:5-11. It is probable, because the infection had spread so wide in the churches of Galatia, the persons to be censured possessed so great influence, and so very many were concerned in some degree, that there was little prospect, except by the intervention of miracles, that such a command would be obeyed. Their crime, likewise, however ruinous to themselves and others, was of a more plausible nature, than the scandalous conduct of the incestuous Corinthian.—It is also to be noted, that the apostle did not command the Corinthians to excommunicate the false teachers, though he most decidedly testified against them. 2 Cor. 11:13-15. In both cases, having intimated their duty, he waited a more favorable opportunity of interposing his own authority. Cut off.] Mk. 9:43, 45. Jn. 12:10, 26.

13 For, brethren, ye have been called unto liberty; only use not liberty for an occasion to the flesh, but by love serve one another.

14 For all the law is fulfilled in one word, even in this, Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself.

15 But if ye bite and devour one another, take heed that ye be not consumed one of another.

16 This I say then, Walk in the Spirit, and ye shall not fulfil the lust of the flesh.

17 For the flesh lusteth against the Spirit, and the Spirit against the flesh: and these are contrary the one to the other; so that ye cannot do the things that ye would.

18 But if ye be led of the Spirit, ye are not under the law.

if they would allow themselves to consider, could not fail to convince them of it. It was evident, he was hated and persecuted by the Jews; but what account could be given of their behavior toward him, if he had so far symbolized with them as to preach circumcision, and the observance of the law of Moses, as necessary to salvation? For this great point they were contending. He acquaints us, 1 Cor. 1:23. that the preaching of the cross of Christ, (or the doctrine of justification and salvation only by faith in Christ crucified,) was to the Jews a stumbling-block. What they were most offended at in Christianity, was, that thereby circumcision, and the whole frame of the legal administration, were set aside, as no longer in force. Now if Paul and others could have given into this opinion, that circumcision was still to be retained, and the observance of the law of Moses, joined with faith in Christ, as necessary to salvation, their offence against it would have been in a great measure removed, and they might have avoided the sufferings they underwent for its sake. But though others, and particularly those who were so forward to asperse him, could easily come into it, yet he rather chose to hazard his ease and his credit, yea, his very life-self, than thus to corrupt the truth, and give up the liberty of the Gospel. Thus the apostle clears himself from the unjust reproach his enemies had cast on him, and at the same time shows, how little regard was due to those men who could treat him in such an injurious manner, and how much reason he had to wish that they were even cut off.

V. 13-26. Here the apostle comes to exhort these Christians to serious, practical godliness, as the best antidote against the snares of the false teachers. Two things especially he presses on them:

1. That they should not strive with one another, but love one another, v. 13. He would have them very careful not to indulge themselves in any corrupt affections and practices, and particularly such as might create distance and disaffection, and be the ground of quarrels and contentions among them: but, on the contrary, he would have them maintain that mutual love and affection, which, notwithstanding any less differences there might be among them, would dispose them to all those offices of respect and kindness to each other, which the Christian religion obliged them to. Note, 1. Christian liberty is not a licentious liberty; Christ has redeemed us from the curse of the law, yet not from the obligation of it; the Gospel is a doctrine according to godliness, 1 Tim. 6:2. and so far from giving the least countenance to sin, it lays us under the strongest obligations to avoid and subdue it.

2. Though we ought to stand fast in our Christian liberty, yet we should not insist on it to the breach of Christian charity; we should not use it as an occasion of strife and contention with our fellow Christians, who may be differently minded from us; but should always maintain such a temper towards each other, as may dispose us by love to serve one another. This the apostle endeavors to persuade these Christians to, from two considerations. (1.) Love is the sum of the whole law, v. 14. As love to God comprises the duties of the first table, so love to our neighbor those of the second. The apostle notices the latter here, because he was speaking of their behavior to one another; and when he uses this as an argument to persuade them to mutual love, he intimates, both that this would be a good evidence of their sincerity in religion, and also the most likely means of rooting out their dissensions and divisions. (2.) The sad and dangerous tendency of a contrary behavior, v. 15. Note, Mutual strifes among brethren, if persisted in, are likely to prove a common ruin. Christian churches cannot be ruined but by their own hands; but if Christians, who should be helps to one another, and a joy one to another, be as brute beasts, biting and devouring each other, what can be expected but that the God of love should deny his grace to them, and the Spirit of love should depart from them, and that the evil spirit, who seeks the destruction of them all, should prevail?

II. That they should all strive against sin; and happy would it be for the church, if Christians would let all their quarrels be swallowed up of this, even a quarrel against sin; if, instead of biting and devouring one another, on the account of their different opinions, they would all set themselves against sin, in themselves, and the places where they live. This is what we are chiefly concerned to fight against, and that which above everything else we should make it our business to oppose and suppress. To excite Christians hereunto, and to assist them herein, the apostle shows,

1. That there is in every one a struggle between the flesh and the spirit, v. 17. the corrupt and carnal part of us, and the renewed part of us, the one opposing the will and desire of the other: hence it comes to pass, that we cannot do the things that we would; as the principle of grace in us will not suffer us to do all the evil which our corrupt nature would prompt us to, so neither can we do all the good that we would, by reason of the oppositions we meet with from that corrupt and carnal principle. Even as in a natural man there is something of a struggle between conscience [&c.*] and the corruption of the heart; so in a renewed man, there is a struggle between the old nature and the new nature, the remainders of sin and the beginnings of grace; and this Christians must expect will be their exercise, as long as they continue in this world.

2. That it is our duty and interest, in this struggle, to side with the better part, our convictions against our corruptions, and our graces against our lusts, v. 16. By the Spirit, here, may be meant, either the Holy Spirit Himself, who condescends to dwell in the hearts of those whom He has renewed and sanctified, to guide and assist them in the way of their duty; or that gracious principle which He implants in the souls of his people, and which lusts against the flesh, the corrupt principle which still remains in them. Accordingly, the duty here recommended, is, that we set ourselves to act under the guidance and influence of the blessed Spirit, and agreeably to the motions and tendency of the new nature in us; and if this be our care in the ordinary course and tenor of our lives, we may depend on it, that, though we may not be freed from the stirrings and op-

PRACT. OBS. V. 13-18. It becomes us most steadfastly to maintain the pure Gospel of a crucified Savior, whatever offence may be taken, or persecution endured by means of it. 'By love' we should become the willing servants of one another and of all men, and in 'loving our neighbor as ourselves,' according to the requirement of the holy commandment, we shall most effectually promote our own comfort, and the happiness of families, of the church, and the community.—The most eminent Christians, indeed, do not attain to all that they desire and aim at, yet those 'who are led by the Spirit,' habitually oppose, subdue, and mortify those sinful workings, which they cannot wholly extirpate. Sc.

V. 16-18. 'According to his manner, the apostle calls that part of a man "the Spirit," which is newly quickened by the Holy Spirit, which is "dead unto sin, and alive unto God," . . . and "the flesh," whatever in man is not renewed by grace, through Christ, as apprehended by faith. He here justly adds, that in the same regenerate man is both "flesh and spirit," the conflict between which is copiously shown Rom. ch. 7. Beza.—The apostle, in his epistle to the Romans, says, "As many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God." Here he says, "If ye be led by the Spirit, ye are not under the law." Hence it follows, that they, who are "not under the law," are "the sons of God." "Ye will not gratify the lusts of your animal nature," (says Mackn.) But all sin has its source and seat in the soul, and the body, even in gross, sensual indulgences, is only "the instrument of unrighteousness to sin." Mat. 15:15-20. Rom. 6:12, 13, 16-19. (16) Walk in the Spirit.] 5:25.—As pneumatized is without the article, it properly signifies, as Beza explains it, that which "is born of the Spirit, and is spirit;" yet this does not alter the meaning of the exhortation, as, when we are influenced by this new principle, we walk in dependence on the Holy Spirit, who both communicated it, preserves it, and works in and by it.—(17) Are contrary.] See on Luke, 21:15. Scorr.

(17.) 'As it is plain that by the flesh, which is the same with what the apostle elsewhere calls the body of sin, and the old man, (Ro. 6:6.) we are to understand, that natural corruption, and depravity, which is the ruling principle in a state of nature, and has so far infected all the faculties of man, that even the regenerate are troubled still with the remainders of it, and find it working in the motions of indwelling sin with them: so by the Spirit, which is here set in opposition to it, and is elsewhere expressed by the new man, that is put on by such as are renewed in the spirit of their mind, (Eph. 4, 23: 24.) we are to understand, that supernatural principle of grace, which is imparted from above to the renewed soul, to overcome the passions of the carnal mind, to set us free from the dominion of our lusts, and to inspire us with a love to holiness; which divine and heavenly principle being communicated to us by the Holy Spirit, has frequently the title of the Spirit given to it, as it is plainly the effect and fruit of it; for that which is born of the Spirit, is Spirit, (Jn. 3:6.) And there is such a contrariety in these two principles, that they are continually opposing one another in their desires and tendency, so that (as the apostle adds) ye do not the things that ye would, (for so it is expressed in the original, and not, ye cannot do, &c.) ye do them not without doing violence to the opposite principle, that would be drawing you another way; which is agreeable to Ro. 7:19. the good I would, I do not, the evil I would not, I do.' Doddr.

V. 19-21. Several of the sins here specified, as 'the works of the flesh,' have no connexion with [what are usually termed] the bodily appetites; which proves, that we are not to understand, by 'flesh and Spirit,' the animal part of man, as distinguished from the intellectual, but the whole of our fallen nature, as opposed to the new nature communicated by regeneration, and the gracious influence of the Holy Spirit acting upon it and by it. Rom. 8:5-9. There can be no doubt about 'adultery, fornication, &c.' being, in every sense, 'works of the flesh.'

positions of our corrupt nature, we shall be kept from fulfilling it in the lusts thereof; so that though it remain in us, yet it shall not obtain a dominion over us. Note, The best antidote against the poison of sin, is, to walk in the Spirit. And this, too, would be good evidence that they were Christians indeed, v. 18. If, in the prevailing bent and tenor of your lives, you are led by the Spirit; if you act under the guidance and government of the Holy Spirit, and of that spiritual nature and disposition He has wrought in you; if you make the Word of God your rule, and the grace of God your principle; it will hence appear, that you are not under the law; not under the condemning, though you are still under the commanding, power of it. Rom. 8:1-14.

3. The apostle specifies the works of the flesh, which must be watched against and mortified, and the fruits of the Spirit, which must be cherished and brought forth, v. 19, &c., and by specifying particulars he further illustrates what he is here upon.

(1.) The works of the flesh, past dispute, are the product of corrupt and depraved nature; and most, here mentioned, are condemned by the light of nature itself, and all, by the light of Scripture. Some are sins against the seventh commandment, such as adultery, fornication, uncleanness, lasciviousness; not only the gross acts of these sins, but all such thoughts, words, or actions, as have a tendency toward the great transgression. Some are sins against the first and second commandments, as idolatry, and witchcraft; others are sins against the royal law of brotherly love, such as hatred, variance, emulations, wrath, strife, which too often occasion seditions, heresies, envyings, and sometimes break out into murders, not only of the names and reputation, but even of the very lives, of our fellow-creatures. Others are sins against ourselves, such as drunkenness and revellings; and he concludes the catalogue with an et cætera, and gives fair warning to all to take care of them, as they hope to see the face of God with comfort. These are sins which will undoubtedly shut men out of heaven. The world of [happy] spirits can never be comfortable to such as plunge themselves in the filth of the flesh; nor will the righteous and holy God admit such into his favor and presence, unless they are first washed and sanctified, and justified in the name of our Lord Jesus, and by the Spirit of our God, 1 Cor. 6:11.

(2.) He specifies the fruits of the Spirit, or the renewed nature, which as Christians we are concerned to bring forth, v. 22, 23. And as, before, he had chiefly specified those works of the flesh, which are not only hurtful to men themselves, but tend to make them so to one another, so here he chiefly notices those fruits of the Spirit, which have a tendency to make Christians agreeable one to another, as well as easy to themselves: and this was very suitable to the caution or exhortation he had before given, v. 13. that they should not use their liberty as an occasion to the flesh, but by love serve one another. He particularly recommends to us, Love, to God especially, and to one another for his sake,—Joy, by which may be understood cheerfulness, in conversation with our friends, or rather a constant delight in God,—Peace, with God and conscience, or a peaceableness of temper and behavior towards others,—Long-suffering, patience to defer anger, and a contentedness to bear injuries,—Gentleness, such a sweetness of temper, and especially towards our inferiors, as disposes us to be affable and courteous, and easy to be entreated when any have wronged us,—Goodness, kindness and beneficence, which shows itself in a readiness to do good to all as we have opportunity,—Faith, fidelity, justice, and honesty in what we profess and promise to others,—Meekness, wherewith to govern our passions and resentments, so as not to be easily provoked, and, when we are so, to be soon pacified,—and Temperance, in meat and drink, and other enjoyments of life, so as not to be excessive and immoderate in

1 Cor. 6:18-20. Idolatry also is 'a work of the flesh,' as it springs from man's carnal enmity to the holy character, worship, and service of God, in the stead of whom he deifies imaginary beings more congenial to himself, and worships them in a manner more suited to his pride and lusts. Ex. 20:3. Rom. 1:21-27. 'Witchcraft,' (implying all kinds of sorcery, charms, divinations, incantations, fortune-telling, and attempted intercourse with evil spirits, real or pretended,) is 'a work of the flesh,' as it results from man's carnal dislike of submission to God, and dependence on Him, and a desire of seeking help and information from other quarters; by both these, men virtually worship the devil. Ex. 22:18. 'Hatred and variance' are also 'works of the flesh,' and 'emulations' seem in this connexion to signify that ambition of pre-eminence, and thirst for glory, which excite men to vie with one another, and eagerly to aspire after distinction, according to the nature of their objects and pursuits. Poets, orators, historians, philosophers, moralists, and all men, who do not attend to the Bible, deem this the noblest principle of human activity; yet it springs from unmingled pride [vanity] and selfishness, and is nearly allied to envy. When the object of emulation is evil, its effects are dreadful; when the object is good, the glory of man is sacrilegiously substituted in the place of the glory of God; and this thirst for human applause, has caused more horrible violations of the law of love, and done more to desolate the earth, than even the grossest sensuality ever did. Jam. 3:13-16. Along with 'strife, and seditions,' by which, schisms in the church and factions in the state may be meant, 'heresies' are called 'works of the flesh.' Pride, ambition, avarice, or other carnal affections, induce men to pervert the truth of God's words, and, espousing some pernicious error, to seek distinction by propagating it. Hence arise contentions, separations, and the most fatal effects to individuals and to the church. 1 Cor. 11:17-22. 2 Pet. 2:1-3. These were therefore joined by the apostle along with adulteries, and unnatural lusts, drunkenness, envy, revellings, seditions, and even murders, as equally the result of a carnal heart, and marks of unregeneracy. Many more he might have mentioned; for covetousness, and the sins connected with it, are elsewhere mentioned, 1 Cor. 6:9-11, but these 'and such like' would, without repentance and its fruits, certainly exclude men from 'inheriting the kingdom of God,' as the apostle had formerly declared to them, and now again forewarned them.—The word tr. 'witchcrafts,' is by some rendered poisonings; as if the apostle in this compendium would pause to distinguish one kind of murder from another, when the difference did not at all alter the nature or degree of the crime! 'Witchcrafts' had the name used in the original, from the magical compositions of certain ingredients, which attended these diabolical practices.—'Revellings' were such feasts, as were accompanied with music and dancing, and whatever could promote hilarity and sensual gratification. The Greeks and Romans had an imaginary god, called Comus, (from the Greek word here used,) who was supposed to preside over these feasts, and was in that character worshipped by hymns, oblations, and libations. Rom. 13:11-14. Eph. 5:3-7. 1 Pet. 4:3-5. The word rendered 'lasciviousness' (19), is used by Demosthenes, in describing the enormous ambition and rapacity of Philip, king of Macedon. It seems to denote the exorbitancy of any passion, which is left without restraint; though in Scripture it is generally used of unbridled sensual indulgence. SCOTT.

(19.) Works of the flesh .. (comp. v. 22.) .. fruits of the Spirit. Evil works come from ourselves alone; therefore they are called the works of the flesh: but virtuous ones require, not our own exertions alone, but the co-operating aids from above; therefore the apostle calls them the fruits of the Spirit, the seed (namely, the intention) being from ourselves [in a sense, Ed.], but the fruit resting with God.' Chrys., Theoph., Bloomr. The flesh. 'That natural corruption (note, v. 17.) which has infected all the faculties of man, and so extends to all the powers of the mind, as well as to the appetites of the body: that corruption, by means of which, even the mind and conscience is defiled. Tit. 1:15.' DODDR. The whole group of vices in this verse, are abuses, in different degrees, of the amative propensity (common to man and other animals), assisted by the intellectual faculties, and the body. ED.

(20.) 'Idolatry is rightly numbered among the works of the flesh, since it originates in a grovelling and sensual mind, which cannot worship God in Spirit, but brings Him down to the senses, and represents Him to corporal eyes by images. Thus idolatry originally arose from sensuality, and tended ever to produce and perpetuate it.' BL. Idolatry is the direction of the religious feelings or sentiments towards improper objects; and we know that gods were worshipped, of characters fitted solely to the selfish, animal propensities of our nature in abuse; as Mars, the god of fighting and destroying; Comus, the god of gluttony, &c.; Bacchus, of drunkenness; Venus, the goddess of animal love; Mercury, the god of covetousness; Vulcan, the god of mechanical ingenuity, &c.; all gods of animalism and selfishness. Witchcraft, too, was the art of propitiating the capricious favor, and averting, or directing to malicious ends, the capricious wrath of deities; and, as being the offspring of fear, revenge, &c., and not of virtuous principle, is well put in with other selfish and animal propensities. In the next group, we find the abuses of the same elementary propensities as are seen in beasts, to fight and destroy, united with the more strictly (though not exclusively) human sentiments of pride and vanity. DODDR. paraphrases 'enmities, outrageous strifes, and quarrels; inordinate transports of ill-placed and ill-proportioned zeal; deep resentments, treasured up in the mind; clamorous contentions, vented with eagerness, and obstinately carried on; together with the keen divisions of a party-spirit, among those who ought to be united in one interest and affection: yea, sometimes, these ill principles proceed so far as to produce seditions in the state, and heresies also in religious communities, by which professing Christians are induced to separate from each other, and to form sects, who, instead of maintaining true candor and benevolence, renounce and condemn each other.' Note, Titus 3:10.—Sectarism is, indeed, of the lower propensities. ED. 'Heresy, according to the Scripture notion, being not a pure mistake of judgment, but [of will also, in] an espousing of false doctrine out of disgust, pride, or envy, or from worldly [selfish] principles, or to avoid persecution or trouble in the flesh, may well be ranked among carnal lusts.' WHITBY. 'Heresies in the ecclesiastical sense, as distinguished from the scriptural, may generally be said to be works of the flesh; as bad inclinations of mind naturally lead to bad opinions, and to a haughty, [sectarian,] and factious manner of obtruding them on others.' DODDR.

(21.) Envyings arise from selfishness, with malice: and, with murder, arise from propensities shared by men with animals, combined with faculties more peculiarly human. Drunkenness and revellings, too, are abused animal appetites. ED.—'No sin has fewer apologies than intemperance. The suffrage of the world is against it; and yet there is no sin so naked in its character, and whose commencement and progress is indicated by so many signs, concerning which there is among mankind such profound ignorance. All reprobate drunkenness; and yet, not one of the thousands who fall into it, dreams of danger when he enters the way that leads to it.' DR. BEECHER.

V. 22-26. The holy affections, and the conduct resulting from them, as here enumerated, are not called 'the works of a believer,' but 'the fruit of the Spirit,' dwelling in the new nature and working by it, which He has produced by regeneration. Eph. 5:8-14, v. 9. 'Love' of God and man, of the Savior, his people, and all men, for his sake, and according to his command and example; a joyful frame of mind in the salvation and service of God; a peaceful conscience, and a submissive will, leading to a peaceable conduct towards man; a disposition to bear injuries and affronts, without seeking revenge, or expressing resentment; a mild, unassuming, inoffensive deportment, united with beneficence and philanthropy; truth, sincerity, fidelity, and integrity to man, springing 23 Meekness, temperance: against such there is no law.

24 And they that are Christ's have crucified the flesh with the affections and lusts.

25 If we live in the Spirit, let us also walk in the Spirit.

26 Let us not be desirous of vain glory, provoking one another, envying one another.

their use. Concerning these things, or those in whom these fruits of the Spirit are found, the apostle says, There is no law against them, to condemn and punish them. Yea, hence it appears, that they are not under the law, but under grace; for these fruits of the Spirit, in whomsoever they are found, plainly show, that such are led by the Spirit, and, consequently, that they are not under the law, as v. 18.

And as, by specifying these works of the flesh, and fruits of the Spirit, the apostle directs us both what we are to avoid and oppose, and what we are to cherish and cultivate; so, v. 24. he acquaints us, that this is the sincere care and endeavor of all real Christians; they have crucified the flesh with the affections and lusts. They have not yet obtained a complete victory, but sin does not now reign in them, Rom. 6: 12. and they are seeking the utter ruin and destruction of it. Note, If we would approve ourselves to be Christ's, we must make it our constant care and business to crucify the flesh with its corrupt affections and lusts. No doubt, it is also here implied, that, on the other hand, we should show forth those fruits of the Spirit which he had just before been specifying; this is no less our duty than that, nor is it less necessary to evidence our sincerity in religion. It is not enough that we cease to do evil, but we must learn to do well. If, therefore, we would make it appear that we do indeed belong to Christ, this must be our sincere care and endeavor, as well as the other: and that it was the design of the apostle to represent both the one and the other of these as our duty, and as necessary to support our character as Christians, may be gathered from what follows, v. 25. He had before told us, that the Spirit of Christ is a privilege bestowed on all the children of God, ch. 4: 6. 'Now,' says he, 'if we profess to be of this number, and as such to have obtained this privilege, let us show it by a temper and behavior agreeable hereunto; let us evidence our good principles by good practices. Our conversation will always be answerable to the principle we are under the guidance and government of. Rom. 8: 5.

The apostle concludes this ch. with a caution against pride and envy, v. 26. He had before been exhorting these Christians by love to serve one another, v. 13. and had put them in mind of what would be the consequence, if, instead of that, they did bite and devour one another, v. 15. Now, as a mean of engaging them to the one, and preserving them from the other, he here cautions them against being desirous of vain glory, or giving way to an undue affection of the esteem and applause of men; because this, if it were indulged, would certainly lead them to provoke one another, and to envy one another. This, therefore, the apostle would have us by all means to watch against. An undue regard to the approbation and applause of men, is one great ground of the unhappy strifes and contentions that are among Christians.

CHAP. VI. V. 1—10. This ch. chiefly consists of two parts. In the former the apostle gives us several plain and practical directions, which more especially tend to instruct Christians in their duty to one another, and to promote the communion of saints in love; in the latter he revives the main design of the epistle, which was to fortify the Galatians against the arts of their judaizing teachers, and confirm them in the truth and liberty of the Gospel.

The apostle, having, in the foregoing ch., exhorted Christians by love to serve one another, v. 13. and also cautioned us, v. 26. against a temper, which, if indulged, would hinder us from showing the mutual love and servicableness he had recommended, he proceeds to give us some further directions, which, if duly observed, would both promote the one, and prevent the other of these, and render our behavior both more agreeable to our Christian profession, and more useful and comfortable to one another: particularly,

I. We here are taught to deal tenderly with persons overtaken in a fault, v. 1. who are brought to sin by the surprise of temptation, not by contrivance and deliberation, and full resolution in sin. By they who are spiritual, is meant, not only ministers, but other Christians, especially those of the higher form in Christianity. Here observe, 1. The duty,—to restore such; Gr. to set in joint, as a dislocated bone; we should endeavor to set them in joint again, to bring them to themselves, by convincing them of their sin and error, persuading them to return to their duty, comforting them in a sense of pardoning mercy thereupon, and, having thus recovered them, confirming our love to them. 2. The manner wherein this is to be done,—with the spirit of meekness; not in wrath and passion, as those who triumph in a brother's falls, but with meekness, as those who rather mourn for them. 3. A very good reason why this should be done in meekness,—considering thyself, lest thou also be tempted. We ought to deal very tenderly with those who are overtaken in sin, [as] we none of us know but it may some time or other be our own case.

II. We are here directed to bear one another's burdens, v. 2. This may be considered either as referring to what goes before, or as a more general precept, directing us to sympathize with one another, under the various trials and troubles we may meet with, and to be ready to afford each other the comfort and counsel, the help and assistance, which our circumstances may require. And hereunto the apostle adds, by way of motive, that so we shall fulfil the law of Christ. This is to act agreeably to the law of his precept, and would be also agreeable to his pattern and example, which have the force of a law to us. Note, Though as Christians we are freed from the law of Moses, yet we are under the law of Christ; and therefore, instead of laying unnecessary burdens on others, (as those who urged the observance of Moses' law did,) it much more becomes us to fulfil the law of Christ, by bearing one another's burdens.

The apostle, being aware how great a hindrance pride would be to the mutual condescension and sympathy he had been recommending, and that a conceit of ourselves would dispose us to censure and condemn our brethren, instead of bearing with their

PRACT. OBS. V. 19—26. The apostle has, indeed, repeatedly and plainly forewarned us, that they 'who do such things,' as are here mentioned, or others of a similar nature, 'shall not inherit the kingdom of God;' yet, what numbers of professed Christians live habitually in the grossest of them, and, notwithstanding their adultery, fornication, shameful uncleanness, or secret lasciviousness, still hope for heaven, in neglect of evangelical repentance and faith! Nor can the most idolatrous covetousness, the most exorbitant pride, ambition, and emulation, the most notorious malice, wrath, hatred, envy, or even the murders, committed in revengeful duels, deprive them of their presumptuous confidence. For 'he that believeth not, hath made God a liar.' Nay, some even attempt to revive the worship of Satan, by various divinations and prognostications, who would, nevertheless, be offended to be denied the name of Christians! Many, also, who are zealous for the apostle's doctrine of justification, and suppose themselves 'not to be under the law,' are so far from being 'led by the Spirit,' that they are evidently and habitually 'fulfilling the lusts of the flesh;' though the feeble remonstrances of a conscience, not totally callous, deceives them into an imagination, that they are engaged in the conflict of the flesh and spirit! But let us never forget, that those 'who are not under the law' for condemnation, are 'led by the Spirit' into the love of its precepts, and an earnest desire to obey them. If we bring forth 'the fruits of the Spirit,' as here described, in our habitual temper and conduct, we can have no objection to the daily examination of ourselves by that perfect standard of sin and holiness; that our love may be exercised 'in knowledge, and in all judgment;' for 'against such things there is no law.' SCOTT.

from faith in God and faithfulness to Him; a humble, teachable, unambitious temper and demeanor, and an evident moderation about earthly objects, and in respect to every animal indulgence; these, and such like, are 'the fruits of the Spirit;' and 'against these there is no law,' for they are what the moral law requires. 1 Cor. 13:4—7. Jam. 3 17, 18. 2 Pet. 1:5—7. So that obedience to the law, as a rule, and as 'written in the heart' by the Holy Spirit, with delight and satisfaction, and earnest desires after more exact conformity to it, is the apostolical evidence of deliverance from the law, as a covenant of works. 'If we live in,' or by, 'the Spirit,' as regenerate persons; 'let us also walk in the Spirit,' and order our daily conversation according to that holy influence, and in dependence on the guidance, and powerful assistance of the Holy Spirit; especially in mortifying the desire of 'vain glory' and human applause, and refraining from whatever may tend to exasperate the minds of other men; or manifest envy of their gifts, reputation, or prosperity. The 'body,' as meaning the animal nature, must be 'kept under and brought into subjection,' by proper discipline, as a child; but 'the flesh' must be crucified, as an enemy and malefactor, which is doomed to inevitable destruction. (22, 23.) All the virtues here mentioned are more or less practised by all men; heathen, Jew, Mohammedan, or Christian; as they are the results of endowments common to the race: in the true Christian alone are they habitually dominant, under the Holy Spirit. ED.

NOTES. CHAP. VI. V. 1—5. The apostle, having concluded the argumentative part of the epistle, added some particular admonitions before he closed it.—The word rendered 'spiritual,' when applied to persons, seems to denote the spirituality, or heavenly mind and judgment, of those who are thus distinguished: 1 Cor. 2:12—16. 3:1—3. 12:1—3. and is never used, as I recollect, of men endued with miraculous gifts. All rulers, teachers, and workers of miracles, were not 'spiritual,' spiritually minded, 'led by the Spirit,' and filled with 'the fruits of the Spirit,' and many private Christians were. The duty of restoring the fallen might belong to the teachers and rulers primarily, but not exclusively.—Some indeed suppose, that persons endued with spiritual gifts superintended the churches for some time, without any regular appointment, and that there were no other bishops or elders in Galatia at infirmities, and endeavoring to restore them when overtaken with a fault, takes care, v. 3. to caution us against this; he supposes it very possible for a man to look upon himself as wiser and better than other men, and as fit to prescribe to them, when in truth he has nothing of substance or solidity in him, or that can be a ground of confidence and superiority. To dissuade us from giving way to this temper, he tells us that such an one, while he imposes on others, by pretending to what he has not, puts the greatest cheat on himself, as sooner or later he will find. Note, Self-conceit, as it is inconsistent with that charity we owe to others, 1 Cor. 13: 4. so it is a cheat on ourselves; and there is not a more dangerous cheat in the world. As a mean of preventing this evil,

III. We are advised, Every one to prove his own work, v. 4. i. e. chiefly our own actions or behavior. These the apostle directs us to prove, i. e. seriously and impartially to examine, by the rule of God's Word, to see whether or no they are agreeable to it, and therefore such as God and conscience approve. The better we are acquainted with our own hearts and ways, the less liable shall we be to despise, and the more disposed to compassionate and help, others, under their infirmities and afflictions.

1. This is the way to have rejoicing in ourselves alone. If we set ourselves in good earnest to prove our own work, and, on trial, can approve ourselves to God, as to our sincerity and uprightness towards Him, then may we expect to have comfort in our own this time, as little mention is made of them (6); but this by no means agrees with the history, which mentions the ordaining of elders by the apostles, 'in every city,' either personally, if they had leisure, or by apostolical men, or evangelists, (as Timothy, Titus, and others,) if compelled previously to leave the new converts. It is, however, probable, that these elders, and the deacons, also, were generally chosen from among those who had been endued with miraculous powers by the laying on of the hands of the apostles. Acts 8:14-17. 14:21-23. 19: 1 Tim. 5:21, 22, 24, 25. Tit. 1:5-9.

(4.) 'Paul is still occupied in lowering their pride; and as, at v. 2. he shows them how empty is all vain boasting, so here he tells them, that not even when any one, on examination, has found anything to authorize boasting, ought he to make a boast of it, (that he is better than another, to that other's injury, say Grot., &c.)' Borger. V. 8. 'Sowing to the flesh, is equivalent to living to the flesh, the fruit of which will be corruption and mortality, namely, spiritual death, i. e. eternal punishment. On the contrary, he that sows to the Spirit, i. e.

souls, 2 Cor. 1: 12. and this, he intimates, would be a much better ground of joy and satisfaction, than to be able to rejoice in another; either in the good opinion others may have of us, or in having gained over others to our opinion, which the false teachers were wont to glory in, as we see, v. 13. or by comparing ourselves with others, as, it should seem, some did, who were ready to think well of themselves, because they were not so bad as some others. Note, If we have the testimony of our consciences, that we are accepted of God, we need not much concern ourselves about what others think or say of us; and without this the good opinion of others will stand us in little stead.

2. The other argument the apostle uses, to press this duty of proving our own work, is, That every man shall bear his own burden, v. 5. i. e. that at the great day every one shall be reckoned with according as his behavior here has been. He declares that then the judgment will proceed, and the sentence pass, not according to the sentiments of the world concerning us, or any ungrounded opinion we may have had of ourselves, or on our having been better or worse than others, but according as our state and behavior have really been in the sight of God. And if there be such an awful time to be expected, surely we ought to be often calling ourselves to an account here, to see whether or no we are such as God will own and approve then: and as this is our duty, so, if it were more our practice, we should entertain more becoming thoughts both of ourselves and our fellow-Christians; and instead of bearing hard on one another, on account of any mistakes or failings, we should be more ready to fulfil that law of Christ, by which we must be judged, in bearing one another's burdens.

IV. Christians are here exhorted to be free and liberal in maintaining their ministers, v. 6. 1. The apostle speaks of it as a thing known and acknowledged, that, as there are some to be taught, so there are others who are appointed to teach them. The office of the ministry is a divine institution, which does not lie open in common to all, but is confined to those only whom God has qualified for it, and called to it; even reason itself directs us to put a difference between the teachers and the taught; for if all were teachers, there would be none to be taught, and the Scriptures sufficiently declare that it is the will of God we should do so. 2. Ministers are to teach and preach the Word of God, 2 Tim. 4: 2. to declare his counsel, Acts 20: 27. and it is the duty of those who are taught in the Word, to support those who are appointed to teach them. Ministers are to give attendance to reading, to exhortation, to doctrine, 1 Tim. 4: 14. they are not to entangle themselves with the affairs of this life, 2 Tim. 2:4. and, therefore, it is but fit and equitable, that, while they are sowing to others spiritual things, they should reap their carnal things. And this is the appointment of God Himself, 1 Cor. 9: 11, 13, 14.

V. A caution to take heed of mocking God, or of deceiving ourselves, by imagining that He can be imposed on by mere pretensions or professions, v. 7. This may be considered as referring to the foregoing exhortation; or it may be taken in a more general view, as respecting the whole business of religion, and so as designed to take men off from entertaining any vain hopes of enjoying its rewards, while they live in the neglect of its duties. The apostle directs us to lay it down as a rule to ourselves, that according as we behave ourselves now, so will our account be in the great day. And he further acquaints us, v. 8. that as there are two sorts of seedness, sowing to the flesh, and sowing to the Spirit, so accordingly will the reckoning be hereafter. They who live a carnal, sensual life, must expect no other fruit of such a course than corruption; a mean and short-lived satisfaction at present, and ruin and misery at the end of it. But they that, under the guidance and influence of the Spirit, do live a holy and spiritual life, a life of devotedness to God, and of usefulness and serviceableness to others, may depend on it, they shall have the trust comfort in their present course, and an eternal life and happiness at the end of it. Hypocrisy in religion is the greatest folly, as well as wickedness.

VI. A further caution given us, not to be weary in well doing, v. 9. There is in all of us too great a proneness hereunto; this, therefore, the apostle would have us carefully to watch and guard against; and he gives this very good reason for it, because in due season we shall reap if we faint not,—if not in this world, yet undoubtedly in the next; if we hold on and hold out in well-doing. Though our reward may be delayed, yet it will surely come, and will be so great as to make us an abundant recompense for all our pains and constancy. Perseverance in well-doing is our wisdom, for to this only is the reward promised.

VII. An exhortation to all Christians to do good in their places, v. 10. It is not enough that we be good ourselves, but we must do good to others, if we would approve ourselves to be Christians indeed. The duty here recommended, is, the same as that spoken of in the foregoing vs.; and as there the apostle exhorts us to sincerity and perseverance in it, so here he directs us both as to its objects and rule. 1. The objects are more generally all men; all who partake of the same common nature with us, and more especially the household of faith, or those who profess the same common faith, and are members of the same body of Christ, with us: though others are not to be excluded, yet these are to be preferred. 2. The rule we are to observe in doing good to others, is, as we have opportunity; while life lasts, the only season wherein we can do good to oth-lives to the Spirit, will reap the fruits in eternal life, i. e. eternal happiness. "He that lays out his substance, time, and thoughts, only for his own gratifications, for his own necessities and conveniences, shall at the harvest find the fruit and product of such husbandry to be corruption; but he who applies his capacities, abilities, and possessions, to that which is spiritual, to promote the interests of religion, shall inherit eternal glory, and be fully recompensed at the resurrection of the just, (Lu. 14:14.) when all the hope of the sinner is perished." Valpy. BLOOMF.

V. 9. 'Persons of known benevolence are not only more frequently called on for charity than others, but (what is still more calculated to disgust and tire them out), they are liable to frequent impositions, abuses of their charity, and ungrateful returns; but let them not weary, their harvest is in eternity. See Bloomf. And the disinterestedly benevolent will recollect Luke 6:32, 33. Ed.

V. 10. 'Borger thus ably recapitulates what Paul has said on Christian liberty, its use and abuse. "He had taught, that those who are subject to the Mosaic law, lead a life of servitude, and are themselves slaves, 3:23-26. 4:1-3, 7-9. that from this subjection to the law, Christians indeed are freed, but still are in a state of servitude, though an easier and more gentle, inasmuch as we are by love to serve one another, 5:13. He had declared, that the force and efficacy of the Mosaic law is broken and worn away, 3:13, 24-27. 4:4-6. And yet (he shows) it is not to be thence inferred, that Christians, being exempted from this servitude (3:13.) are to be no longer subject to any law, since the law of love and benevo-

ers. Too many defer it till they come to die, under a pretence of doing something of this nature then: but we cannot be sure that we shall then have an opportunity for it; neither, if we should, have we any ground to expect that what we do will be so acceptable to God, much less that we can atone for our past neglects, by leaving something behind us for the good of others, when we can no longer keep it ourselves. But we should take care to do good in our lifetime, yea, to make this the business of our lives. Whenever fresh occasions offer, as far as our capacity reaches, we should be ready to embrace them, too, Eccl. 11: 2. Note, As God has made it our duty to do good to others, so He takes care in his providence to furnish us with opportunities for it, Mat. 26: 11. and He expects we should improve each according to our capacity and ability. But we have need of godly wisdom and discretion to direct us in the exercise of our charity.

V. 11—18. The apostle, having at large established the doctrine of the Gospel, and endeavored to persuade these Christians to a behavior agreeable to it, seems as if he intended here to end the epistle; especially when he had acquainted them, that, as a particular mark of his respect to them, he had written this large letter with his own hand; but such were his affection to them, and concern to recover them from the ill impressions made on them by their false teachers, that he cannot break off, till he has once again given them the true character of those teachers, and an account of his own contrary temper and behavior; that, by comparing these together, they might the more easily see how little reason they had to depart from the doctrine he had taught them, and to comply with theirs.

I. He gives them the true character of lence remains to be observed by them, 5:14. this is the law of Christ, 6:2. The apostle had said, that by the works of the law shall no flesh be justified, 2:16. And yet (he warns them) it does not follow from thence that Christians may do what they please, and basely abuse their liberty; for, as by the works of the law, so by the works of the flesh, shall no one attain felicity, 5:19—21. But that it is necessary to follow after virtue; every one must prove his own work, 6:4. on Christians it is incumbent to do good, 6:9, 19. That salvation and felicity, indeed, do not depend on the Mosaic law (2:16. 21:3. 11:12, 13, 24.); yet those err grievously who abuse this liberty into utter disregard of virtue, as if to the attainment of felicity nothing on our part were necessary, but to follow the usual routine of life; for that this present existence contains the commencement, and, as it were, seeds of a future one; which seed will produce fruits, either of joy or sorrow, to be gathered at the general harvest, 6:7, 8, 9."

V. 11—14. The words here tr. 'how large a letter,' are supposed by many to signify, with what kind of letters, referring to the apostle's want of skill and readiness in writing Greek. He had, however, bestowed great pains to write the epistle 'with his own hand,' either because he had not an amanuensis with him, or rather because he did not choose to employ one; but he wrote the whole himself, that he might convince the Galatians of his love to, and anxiety about them.—His [Paul's] view of the cross of Christ, and of the obligations, motives, and instructions connected with it, had crucified the world to him and him to the world.

those teachers, in several particulars. As, 1. They were men who, v. 12. were very zealous for the externals of religion; forward to observe, and to oblige others to observe, the rites of the ceremonial law, though at the same time they had little or no regard to real piety; for, as the apostle says of them in the following v., neither do they themselves keep the law: frequently those have least of the substance of religion, who are most solicitous to make a show of it. 2. They were men who were afraid of suffering, for they constrained the Gentile Christians to be circumcised, only lest they should suffer persecution for the cross of Christ. It was not so much out of a regard to the law, as to themselves. And, 3. Another part of their character was, that they were men of a party-spirit, and who had no further zeal for the law than as it subserved their carnal and selfish designs; for they desired to have these Christians circumcised, v. 13. only that they might say, they had made proselytes of them, of which they carried the mark in their flesh. And thus while they pretended to promote religion, they were the greatest enemies of it; for nothing has been more destructive to the interest of religion than men-siding and party-making. Note, Ti. 3: 10.

II. He acquaints us, on the other hand, with his own temper and behavior; particularly,

1. That his principal glory was in the cross of Christ, v. 14. here meant of his sufferings and death on the cross, or the doctrine of salvation by a crucified Redeemer. The cross of Christ is the Christian's chief glory, and there is the greatest reason, for to it we owe all our joys and hopes.

2. That he was dead to the world. By Christ, or by the cross of Christ, the world was crucified to him, and he to the world; he had experienced the power and virtue of it in weaning him from the world, and this was one great reason of his glorying in it. The false teachers were men of a worldly temper, their chief concern was about their secular interests, therefore they accommodated their religion thereunto. But Paul was a man of another spirit; he was got above both the smiles and the frowns of the world, as one who is a-dying out of it. This is a temper of mind all Christians should be laboring after; and the best way to attain it, is, to converse much with the cross of Christ; the higher esteem we have of Him, the meaner opinion shall we have of the world; and the more we contemplate the sufferings our dear Redeemer met with from the world, the less likely shall we be to be in love with it.

3. That he did not lay the stress of his religion on one side or other of the contesting interests, but on sound Christianity, v. 15. There was at that time an unhappy division among Christians; circumcision and uncircumcision, -ch. 2: 9, 12. The false teachers were very zealous for circumcision;

yea, to that degree, as to represent it as necessary to salvation. But Paul made very little account of it. It was indeed of great importance to the interests of Christianity, that circumcision should not be imposed on the Gentile converts, and therefore this he had set himself with the utmost vigor to oppose: but as for mere circumcision or uncircumcision, whether those who had embraced the Christian religion had been Jews or Gentiles; and whether they were for or against continuing the use of circumcision, so that they did not place their religion in it,—this was comparatively a matter of little moment with him; for he very well knew, that in Jesus Christ, in his account, or under the Christian dispensation, neither circumcision availed anything, nor uncircumcision, as to men's acceptance with God, but a new creature. Here he acquaints us, both wherein real religion does not, and wherein it does consist; it does not consist in circumcision or uncircumcision, in our being in this or the other denomination of Christians; but it consists in our being new creatures; not in having a new name, or putting on a new face, but in our being renewed in the spirit of our minds, and having Christ formed in us. If we compare this text with some others, we may more fully see what it is that renders us most acceptable to God, and which therefore we should be chiefly concerned about. Here we are told, that it is a new creature; and ch. 5: 6. that it is faith which worketh by love, and, 1 Cor. 7: 19. that it is the keeping the commandments of God: from all which it appears, that it is a change of mind and heart, whereby we are disposed and enabled to believe in the Lord Jesus, and to live a life of devotedness to God; and that where this inward, vital, practical religion is wanting, no outward professions, or particular names, will ever stand us in any stead, or be sufficient to recommend us to Him. Were Christians duly concerned to experience this in themselves, and to promote it in others; if it did not make them lay aside their distinguishing names, yet it would at least take them off from laying so great a stress on them as they too often do. Note, Christians should take care to lay the stress of their religion where God has laid it, i. e. on those things which are available to our acceptance with Him; so we see the apostle did, and it is our wisdom and interest herein to follow his example.

The apostle having shown what was of chief consideration in religion, and what he laid the greatest stress on, that is, a sound and saving change, here, v. 16. pronounces a blessing on all who walk according to this rule; i. e. either more generally the whole Word of God, which is the complete and perfect rule of faith and life; or that doctrine of the Gospel, or way of justification and salvation, which he had laid down in this epistle, by faith in Christ without the works of the law; or, as more immediately

'So that he viewed the world, as little impressed by all its charms, as a spectator would be, by anything that had been graceful in the countenance of a crucified person, when he beholds it blackened in the agonies of death, and was no more affected by the objects around him, than one that is expiring would be struck with any of those prospects, which his dying eyes might view from the cross, on which he was suspended.'

(12.) Persecution.] 'This seems to open the main, secret spring of that zeal for the Jewish ceremonies, in some who professed themselves Christians, which occasioned so much uneasiness in the apostolic churches. The persecuting edicts of the Jewish Sanhedrim, the influence of which extended to remote synagogues, had induced many who secretly believed in Christ, to decline an open acknowledgment of Him (Ja. 9:22. 12:42. 19:38.), which yet our Lord Himself had so expressly required, that their consciences, during this state of dissimulation, must be in great anxiety. (See Mark 8:38.) But afterwards, when a scheme arose, of extending Judaism with Christianity, it may be supposed that this would abate the edge of persecution against those who fell in with it, and especially against those who urged the Gentile converts to such complete proselytism, though it might sharpen it against other Christians; and this might, perhaps, weigh more with some than they themselves were aware, in concurrence with the desire of making disciples, and to the prejudices of education, which must naturally be supposed to have their share. Comp. 5:11.'

16 And as many as walk according to this rule, peace <sup>be</sup> on them, and mercy, and upon the Israel of God.

17 From henceforth let no man trouble me; for <sup>I</sup> I bear in my body the marks of the Lord Jesus.

18 Brethren, the <sup>grace</sup> of our Lord Jesus Christ <sup>be</sup> with your spirit. Amen.

referring to the new creature, which he had just before been speaking of. The  blessings  he desires for those who walk according to this rule, are,  peace and mercy ,—peace with God and conscience, and all the comforts of this life, as far as they are needful for them,—and mercy, that is, an interest in the free love and favor of God in Christ, which are the spring and fountain of all other blessings. These, he declares, shall be the portion of  all the Israel of God , i. e. all sincere Christians, whether Jews or Gentiles; all who are Israelites indeed, who, though they may not be  natural , yet are become the  spiritual  seed of Abraham. The Jews and judaizing teachers were for confirming these blessings only to such as were circumcised, and kept the law of Moses; but the apostle declares that they belong to all who walk according to the rule of the Gospel, or of the new creature, even to all the Israel of God; intimating, that those only are the true Israel of God, who walk according to this rule, and not that of circumcision, which  they  insisted so much on; and therefore that this was the true way to obtain peace and mercy.

4. That he had cheerfully suffered persecution for the sake of Christ and Christianity, v. 17. while the false teachers were afraid of it, and so were zealous for circumcision, as we see, v. 12. But this was the least of Paul's concern; he was not  moved  at any of the afflictions he met with, Acts 20: 24. He had already suffered much in the cause of Christ, for  he bare in his body  the scars of those wounds he had sustained from persecuting enemies, for his steady adherence to Him, and that doctrine of the Gospel which he had received from Him. As hence it appeared he was firmly persuaded of the  truth  and  importance  of it, and far from being a favorer of circumcision, as they had falsely reported him to be; so, hereupon, with a warmth and vehemence suitable to his authority as an apostle, and to the deep concern he was under, he insists on it, that  no man should henceforth trouble him , by opposing his doctrine and authority, or by any such calumnies and reproaches as had been cast on him; for as, both from what he had said, and what he had suffered, they appeared to be highly unjust and injurious, so also they were very unreasonable, who either raised or received them.

The apostle, having now finished what he intended to write for the conviction and recovery of the churches of Galatia, concludes the epistle with his apostolical benediction, v. 18. His usual farewell, as we see, Rom. 16: 20, 24. and 1 Cor. 16: 23. He prays that they might enjoy the favor of Christ, receive from Him all the grace needful to guide them in their way, to strengthen them in their work, establish them in their Christian course, and encourage and comfort them under all the trials of life, and the prospect of death itself. This is fitly called  the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ , as He is both the sole Purchaser and the appointed Dispenser of it: and though these churches had done enough to forfeit it, by suffering themselves to be drawn into an opinion and practice highly dishonorable to Christ, as well as dangerous to them; yet, out of his great concern for them, and knowing of what importance it was to them, he earnestly desires it on their behalf; yea, that it might  be with their spirit , that they might continually experience the influences of it on their souls, disposing and enabling them to act with sincerity and uprightness in religion. We need desire no more to make us happy, than the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

PRACT. OBS. The reality and degree of our spirituality should be evinced, by tender and compassionate endeavors to restore the fallen, and confirm the weak, 'in the spirit of meekness;' conscious that we too are liable to be tempted, and have need of humble watchfulness, and constant dependence on God.—Our Christian liberty is enjoyed, in proportion as we 'fulfil the law of Christ,' in loving the brethren, and 'bearing one another's burdens' with compassion and self-denial.—If hitherto any man have 'sown to the flesh,' and is afraid, that 'of the flesh he shall reap corruption,' let him begin, by repentance, faith, and prayer, to 'sow to the Spirit,' that he may at length reap everlasting life.—If we then are 'in Christ, new creatures,' we have the kernel and the substance of religion, and may leave others to contend about the shell or the shadow of it.—They are peculiarly blamable, who trouble and grieve those soldiers of Christ, that 'bear in their bodies' the scars of the wounds they have received in 'fighting the good fight of faith;' but we should not wonder, or be disconcerted, should our most disinterested and self-denying labors meet with this recompense alone, from those whom we have most loved. There have always been professors and teachers of religion, who 'desired to make a fair show in the flesh,' to render religion subservient to worldly interests or distinctions, and to escape the cross. But the consistent Christian is nobly disdainful of such low aims; he glories in the cross of Christ alone, and desires to 'live no longer to himself, but to Him who died for him, and rose again.' 1 Cor. 1:26—31, vv. 30, 31. 3:18—23. 2 Cor. 5:13—16. 10:17, 18. (17.) Trouble me, &c.] 'It seems most natural to understand, with the ancient contrs. and Jaspis, Paul's fixed determination. So Chrys. and Theoph. observe, that the apostle says this as giving them to understand, that the rules he has laid down are immovably fixed, and that they need not expect anything else from him, but receive this from him as an absolute determination, once for all. Yet, I think, he means also to hint, that he had had trouble and chagrin enough on this question already. "For, (says he) v. 12. I have trouble now: I bear," &c.' In bear, &c.,

I see no reference to a triumph, as the ancients suppose; nor do I think (as do Potter, Deyling, Wets., &c.) there is a reference to a custom of the ancients, by which those who were dedicated to the service of any god, had a brand stamped on them. See Herod. [and notes and cut, De. 32:6. Ps. 18:5.] Paul, in the word stigmata, rather refers to the weals, bruises, and scars, left by the scourgings, beatings, and stonings he had received. Bloomf., and so Dr. A. C., who adds, 'or to the stigmata or marks with which servants and slaves were often impressed, to show whose they were.' Soldiers are also said to have had the names of their corps, or general, imprinted on their hands. The common way of stigmatizing, in the E., was, by burning the member with a red-hot iron, marked with certain letters, till a fair impression was made, and then pouring ink into the furrows.' Comp. 1 Cor. 3:3, 4. Gal. 5:20. Rom. 16:17. 1 Cor. 12:12. Eph. 4:3—6. Gal. 2:11, 14. [In most of which places, Paul asserts sectarianism to be 'carnal,' 'of the flesh,' i. e. of the lower propensities, under the direction of self-esteem, and other kinds of selfishness.] It would seem, therefore, to be irresistibly evident, that the unity of the church ought to be sacredly preserved by all who love the Lord Jesus; and without stopping, at this stage of our investigation, to ascertain all the precise features of this unity, which will hereafter appear, it is evident, that the union inculcated by the apostle is such as is inconsistent with the divisions which he rebukes; and such divisions substantially are those of the present day, which are all based on some difference of doctrine, forms of government, or mode of worship among acknowledged Christians.

11. Obligation to preserve the unity of the church, is evident from the example of the apostles, of the apostolic and subsequent age.

It would be superfluous to affirm, that no one of the apostles or their fellow-laborers established any sects in the Christian church. The bare supposition of the contrary, is absurd and revolting to every mind acquainted with the inspired record. Yet what ample ground was there for such a course, if it had been thought lawful? There was a difference of opinion among the apostles, and difference among the first Christians; but neither was regarded as a cause for schism or division in the church. Paul differed from Peter, and disapproved of his conduct so much, that he says, (Gal. 2:11—14.) "at Antioch, I withstood him to the face, for he was to be blamed;" yet neither of them dreamed of forming a sect for the defence and propagation of his distinctive views. Paul and Barnabas differed about their arrangements for missionary operations, and when the contention grew sharp, each took as fellow-laborers those whom he preferred, and thus prosecuted his work; but it never entered into their minds to form different sects in the church. In the apostolic age, there existed differences of opinion and practice between the Jewish and Gentile converts, far greater than those which divide some of the religious denominations of our land. Ac. 15:5. Gal. 4:10. Yet they did not divide the church into different sects, under the guidance of the apostles. On the contrary, the apostle enjoined mutual forbearance, Ro. 14:5—10. No did any schism actually arise from these differences, till the apostles had gone to their rest, when, in direct opposition to this advice, the Nazareans, in the reign of Adrian, separated from the body of Christians, who however strongly disapproved of their conduct. It is certain, too, that during several hundred years, there continued to be persons in the church, who exhibited a lingering attachment to the Mosaic ceremonial observances, yet they were not excluded, nor advised to form themselves into a separate sect. The observance of the Lord's day or Christian Sabbath was universal (see Justin Martyr's apology); but some Christians, during several centuries, continued also to observe the Jewish Sabbath as a sacred day. The time for the observance of Easter was another point of difference, and even of warm controversy; yet, excepting some intolerant individuals, neither party seriously thought of dividing the church, or disowning their brethren on this ground; see Euseb. Book v. ch. 24. Had these differences existed in our time, who can doubt, not only that separate sects would have grown out of them, but that their formation would be approved by Christians generally? . . . Christians were, in those days, called nothing but Christians. This ought certainly to be a solemn fact to those, who have taken it for granted, that sectarian divisions of the church are right; that they were doing God service by their utmost efforts to perpetuate them, by inscribing, on the tender and infant mind, the lineaments of their denominational peculiarity. One thing does appear undeniable. If the sectarian form of Christianity be its best mode of development, the blessed Savior Himself,—with reverence be it spoken! —the Savior and his apostles failed to enjoy it; on the contrary enjoined and practised directly the reverse!! The writer does not, from these facts, infer the obligation of Christians immediately to renounce their present organizations, and all merge into one church. Difficulties now exist, arising from honest diversity of views on church government, which did not exist in the apostolic age, and which render it impossible for persons, thus differing, to unite geographically; but the essence of Christian union may exist, and ought to be promoted immediately, as will be seen in a subsequent stage of this discussion. As to a union of all the churches of the land in one compact ecclesiastical system of judicature, such a one did not exist in the apostolic age, is undesirable, and dangerous.

EPHESUS.

AN EXPOSITION
PAUL'S EPISTLE TO THE EPHESIANS,
WITH
PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS AND NOTES.

(Henry's Exposition, completed by Mr. Roswell.)

SOME think this epistle to the Ephesians was a circular letter, sent to several churches; and that the copy directed to the Ephesians, happened to be taken into the canon. The reason is, that this is the only one of all Paul's epistles, that has nothing in it peculiar to the state or case of that particular church, but much of common concern to all Christians, especially Gentile Christians. But it may be observed, on the other hand, the epistle is expressly inscribed, ch. 1:1. to the saints at Ephesus; and, in the close of it, he tells them, that he had sent Tyehieus unto them, whom, in 2 Tim. 4:12. he says, he had sent to Ephesus.*

It bears date out of a prison; and some have observed, that it has the greatest relish and savor in it of the things of God. When his tribulations did abound, his consolations and experiences did much more abound. Whence we may observe, that the afflictive exercises of God's people, and particularly of his ministers, often tend to the advantage of others, as well as to their own.

The apostle's design is, to settle the Ephesians in the truth; and further to acquaint them with the mystery of the Gospel, in order to it.† In the former part, he represents the great privilege of the Ephesians, who, having been in time past idolatrous heathens, were now converted to Christianity, and received into covenant with God, which he illustrates from

* 'Although it does not appear to have been disputed, that the epistle before us was written by Paul, yet it is well known a doubt has long been entertained concerning the persons to whom it was addressed. The question is founded on some ambiguity in the external evidence. Marcion, a heretic of the second century, as quoted by Tertullian, . . . calls it the epistle to the Laodiceans.—The name Ephesus, in the first v., on which word singly depends the proof that the epistle was written to the Ephesians, is not read in all the manuscripts now extant. I admit, however, that the external evidence preponderates, with a manifest excess, on the side of the received reading.' Paley. The same learned writer proceeds to argue, from internal evidence, that the epistle could hardly be written to a people, with whom the apostle had resided three years. Acts 19:9—12. 20:29—31. and it must be acknowledged, that in this respect it more resembles the epistle to the Romans, and that to the Colossians, than those epistles which the apostle wrote to the Corinthians, Galatians, Philippians, and Thessalonians, in which there are constant allusions and appeals to what had past when he resided among them. As, however, the 'external evidence preponderates, with a manifest excess, in favor of the received reading,' [note, 1:1.] and as Dr. Paley seems to be mistaken in supposing, that the word Ephesus was wanting in any manuscript extant, (see Middleton, on the Gr. article, p. 510,) it is in this exposition adhered to; though it may be observed, that the change of the word Ephesus for Laodicea, or the total omission of it, would in no respect deduct from the abundant instruction, contained in the epistle itself.—It has been said, that if this epistle was directed to the Ephesians, it is difficult to understand how the apostle contented himself with giving them a general salutation, without mentioning any of his numerous friends and acquaintance, with whom he had been intimate during his long residence at Ephesus. But the answer is, . . . there are no particular salutations, in the epistles to the Galatians, the Philippian, the Thessalonians, and to Titus; because, to have sent particular salutations to individuals, in churches where the apostle was so generally and intimately acquainted, . . . might have offended those who were neglected. . . . And to have mentioned every person of note in those churches, would have taken up too much room. In writing to the Romans, the case was different. The apostle was personally unknown to most of them; . . . and therefore he could, . . . without offence to the rest, take particular notice of all his acquaintance.' Mackn. Scott. For the present state of Ephesus, see notes, end of Acts, and Pref. to Rev. Ed.

† 'Paul's design was, "to establish the Ephesians in the faith; and to this end to give them more exalted views of the eternal love of God, and of the glorious excellence and dignity of Christ; to show them they were saved by grace; [as 'destined by gratuitous election, and adoption,' says Calvin, 'to eternal life, before they were born;'] and howsoever wretched they were once, the Gentiles [so wretched before] now have equal privileges with the Jews; to encourage them, by declaring with what steadfastness he suffered for the truth, and with what earnestness he prayed for their establishment and perseverance in it; and finally, in consequence of their profession, to engage them to the practice of those duties that became their character as Christians.'" Doddr.

a view of their deplorable state before their conversion, ch. 1—3. In the latter part (which we have in the 4th, 5th, and 6th chs.) he instructs them in the principal duties of religion, both personal and relative; and exhorts and quickens them to the faithful discharge of them. Zanchy observes, that we have here an epitome of the whole Christian doctrine, and of almost all the chief heads of divinity.*

The apostle wrote this epistle, some years after his charge to the elders of Ephesus at Miletus, during his imprisonment at Rome, probably near the close of it; (6:20.) to establish them in the great doctrines of the Gospel, guard them against errors, excite them to a holy conversation, and animate them in their Christian warfare.—This epistle, and the two that follow it, which were also written during his imprisonment, and probably about the same time, are remarkable for a peculiar pathos and ardor, or rapture, as some have called it; and this is generally ascribed to the extraordinary consolations enjoyed by the apostle, during his sufferings for Christ's sake. But his mind was doubtless enlarged to a remarkable degree in writing to those, whom he had no occasion to rebuke, and with whom he was not under the necessity of engaging in controversy; so that, entire confidence of affection took place of the caution, reserve, or sharpness, which were requisite in the three preceding epistles.—Learned men, according to their different hypotheses, suppose, that the apostle continually refers, in this epistle, to the mysteries of Diana, to the Gnostics, or to the judaizing teachers; but it may fairly be questioned, whether, writing with an inexpressible flow of holy affections, on the great subjects which rejoiced his heart, he had express reference to any of those things, which expositors, more coldly speculating on his words, have imagined.—Perhaps he had some general regard to the judaizing corrupters of the Gospel; † but, as the epistle to the Colossians, which was written about the same time, and in other respects greatly resembles this, is far more explicit on that subject, it may be supposed that the Ephesians were less in danger from that quarter.

HENRY.

* This epistle Dr. Goodwin considers, as the richest and noblest of all, and thinks it was peculiarly intended to be so, to reward the generous zeal of the Ephesians in burning their curious books, by a book of divine knowledge, incomparably more valuable than any or all of them. A thought, as Doddr. says, most remarkable and ingenious: though, with a prudence which I cannot but commend, he declines instituting any comparison of the excellency of the epistle, with that of others. † See a full analysis of the epistle in Doddr.'s Pref. to Eph. Ed.

† It is likely, Paul feared, lest false apostles, thinking them but half instructed, should disturb their faith. For they were Gentiles, and having embraced pure Christianity, had heard nothing of ceremonies or circumcision. But those who were obtruding the law upon Christians, clamored, that all were profane who were not initiated to God by circumcision; for this was the burden of their cry, that no one was to be deemed of God's people, but the circumcised: that all the Mosaic rites were to be kept. Now, they calumniated Paul, as making Christ common to Jews as well as Gentiles; and asserted, that his apostleship was a profanation of the heavenly doctrine, as it prostituted the covenant of grace, to impure men, indiscriminately. Therefore, lest the Ephesians, urged by such calumnies, should slip, he comes to their aid; contending that they also were thus diligently called to the Gospel, because they were elected before the creation of the world: and on the other hand, he forbids them to think that the Gospel was brought to them rashly, by the will of man, or had flown to them by chance, because, the preaching of Christ among them, was nothing else than the publication of his eternal decree. CALVIN.

1 After the salutation, 3 and thanksgiving for the Ephesians, 4 he treateth of our election, 6 and adoption by grace, 11 which is the true and proper fountain of man's salvation. 13 And because the height of this mystery cannot be easily attained unto, 16 he prayeth that they may come 19 to the full knowledge, and 20 possession thereof in Christ.

2 Grace <sup>e</sup> be to you, and peace, from God our Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ.

CHAP. I. V. 1, 2. Here is, 1. Paul's title, an apostle of Jesus Christ, &c. one of his messengers to the sons of men, furnished with extraordinary gifts, and the immediate assistance of the Spirit. Such an one Paul was, and that not by the will of man, or by his own intrusion; but by the will of God, very expressly and plainly signified to him; he being immediately called (as the other apostles were) by Christ Himself to the work. 2. The persons to whom this epistle is sent,—the saints at Ephesus, the Christians, members of the church at Ephesus, the metropolis of Asia; saints in profession, and bound to be in truth and reality, as many of them were, faithful in Christ, believing in Him, firmly adhering to Him, [devotedly true to God's service, and] to the profession they make of relation to their Lord, even Christ Jesus, from whom they derive all their grace and spiritual strength, and in whom their persons, and all that they perform, are made accepted. 3. The apostolical benediction,—Grace be to you, &c. the token in every epistle; it speaks the apostle's goodwill to his friends, and a real desire of their welfare. By grace we are to understand, the free and undeserved love and favor of God, and those graces of the Spirit which proceed from it; by peace, all other blessings, spiritual and temporal, the fruits and product of the former. These proceed from God, not as a Creator, but as a Father, by special relation: and they come from our Lord Jesus Christ, who, having purchased them for his people, has a right to bestow them on them. Indeed the saints, and the faithful in Christ Jesus, had already received grace and peace; but the increase of these is to be earnestly prayed for, both for ourselves and others; for the best saints stand in need of fresh supplies of the Spirit, and cannot but desire to improve and grow.

After this short introduction, he comes to the matter and body of the epistle; and though it may seem somewhat peculiar in a letter, yet the Spirit saw fit his discourse of divine things in this ch. should be cast into prayers and praises: solemn addresses to God, yet conveying weighty instructions to others. Prayer may preach; and praise may do so too.

V. 3—14. He begins with thanksgivings and praise, and enlarges, with great fluency and copiousness of affection, on the exceeding great and precious benefits we enjoy by Jesus Christ. For the great privileges of our religion are very aptly recounted and enlarged on in our praises to God.

In general, v. 3. he blesses God for spiritual blessings; where he styles Him the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ: for, as Mediator, the Father was his God; as God, and the second Person in the blessed Trinity, God was his Father. All blessings come from God, as the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ. No good can be expected from a righteous and holy God to sinful creatures, but by his mediation. He hath blessed us with all spiritual blessings: whom God blesses with some, He blesses with all spiritual blessings; not so with temporal blessings; some are favored with health, and not with riches; some with riches and not with health, &c. Spiritual blessings in heavenly places; i. e. say some, in the church, distinguished from the world, and called out of it. Or it may be read, in heavenly things, such as come from heaven, and are designed to prepare men for it, and to secure their reception into it. These we are blessed with in Christ: for as all our services ascend to God through Christ, so all our blessings are conveyed to us the same way; He being the Mediator between God and us.

The particular spiritual blessings we are blessed with in Christ, and for which we ought to bless God, are (many of them) here enumerated and enlarged upon.

1. Election and predestination, which are the secret springs whence the others flow, v. 4, 5, 11. the former respects that lump or mass of mankind, out of which some are chosen, from which they are separated and distinguished; the latter, the blessings they are designed for; particularly the adoption of children: it being the purpose of God, that in due time we should become his adopted children, and so have a right to all the privileges, and to the inheritance, of children. We have here the date of this act of love; it was before the foundation of the world: not only before God's people had a being, but before the world had a beginning; for they were chosen in the counsel of God from all eternity; which magnifies God's love. NOTES. CHAP. I. V. 1. Bl. says, the genuineness of the words, 'those who are in Ephesus,' has been called in question, but successfully defended; referring to 'Stale's note, Koppe's Introd. to Eph., Ros., Mich., Hug., or Horne's Introd. Horne coincides with Macknight's opinion, that Paul sent the Ephesians word by Tychicus, who carried their letter, to send a copy of it to the Laodiceans, with an order to them to communicate it to the Colossians.' See also the remarks on Eph., in the 'Supplement to the Comprehensive Commentary.' Eo.

Faithful, &c.] 'I cannot think, with Locke and Wells, that it signifies those, who kept the doctrine of Christ, free from the corrupt admixtures of Judaism, or (with Grot.) those who persevered in the profession of that doctrine. A criticism which Doddr. rightly rejects, observing, that Paul uses the same title to the Colossians, (Col. 1:2.) whom yet he reproves on this very account, (Col. 2:16, 20.) It should rather seem to mean, as Whitby and Mackn. interpret, believers in general. See Schl. Lex. Both this, and "saints," are simply a designation of Christians; since that appropriate term was then not yet come into use. Sometimes, Paul simply says, "those in Christ."

V. 2. Grace.] 'Charis: all spiritual blessings; Peace, (eirēnē, Heb. shalom,) i. e. all temporal blessings.'

V. 3—8. Vs. 3—14. properly speaking, form one sentence. The apostle's mind was so full of his subject, that he was not very exact about his style, and this renders a double degree of attention requisite in those readers, who would fully enter into his meaning.—Reflecting on the great things God had done for him, and by him, especially among the Gentiles, the apostle broke out into the most rapturous praises and thanksgivings unto God on that account. (3) Blessed, &c.] When we bless God, we speak well of Him, when He blesses us, He powerfully proceed from a sudden resolve ; but the provision a parent makes for his children, is the result of many thoughts, and is put into his last will and testament with a great deal of solemnity. God acts in pursuance of his eternal purpose in bestowing spiritual blessings on his people. He hath blessed us, —according as He hath chosen us in Him, in Christ, the great Head of the election, who is emphatically called, God's Elect, his Chosen ; and, in the chosen Redeemer, an eye of favor was cast on them. Observe, here, one great end and design of this choice ; chosen,—that we should be holy ; not because He foresaw they would be holy, but because He determined to make them so. All who are chosen to happiness as the end, are chosen to holiness as the means. Their sanctification, as well as their salvation, is the result of the counsels of divine love. And without blame before Him ; that their holiness might not be only external and in outward appearance, so as to prevent blame from men ; but internal and real, and what God Himself will account such, who looketh at the heart ; such holiness proceeding from love to God, and to our fellow-creatures ; this charity being the principle of all true holiness. The original word signifies, such an innocence as no man can carp at ; therefore some understand it, of that perfect holiness which the saints shall attain to in the life to come, which will be eminently before God ; they being in his immediate presence for ever.

Here is also the rule, and the fountal cause of God's election ; it is according to the good pleasure of his will, v. 5. not for the sake of anything in them foreseen, but because it was his sovereign will, and a thing highly pleasing to Him. It is according to the purpose, the fixed and unalterable will, of Him who worketh all things after the counsel of his own will, v. 11. who powerfully accomplishes whatever concerns his elect, as He has wisely and freely foreordained and decreed : the last and great end and design of all which, is, his own glory. To the praise of the glory of his grace, v. 6. That we should be to the praise of his glory, v. 12. that we should live and behave ourselves in such a manner that his rich grace might be magnified, and appear glorious, and worthy of the highest praise. All is of God, and from Him, and through Him, and therefore all must be to Him, and centre in his praise. Note, The glory of God is his own end, and it should be ours, in all that we do. The next spiritual blessing the apostle notices, is,

2. Acceptance with God through Jesus Christ ; Wherein, or by which grace, He hath made us accepted in the Beloved, v. 6. Jesus Christ is the Beloved of his Father, Mat. 3:17. as well as of angels and saints. It is our great privilege to be accepted of God, which implies his love to us, and his taking us under his care, and into his family. We cannot be thus accepted of God, but in and through Jesus Christ. He loves his people for the sake of the Beloved.

3. Remission of sins, and redemption, through the blood of Jesus, v. 7. No remission without redemption. We were captivated by reason of sin ; and cannot be released but by the remission of our sins. This redemption we have in Christ, and this remission through his blood. The guilt and the stain of sin could be no otherwise removed, than by the blood of Jesus. This great benefit, which comes freely to us, was dearly bought and paid for by our blessed Lord : and yet it is according to the riches of God's grace. Christ's satisfaction and God's rich grace are very consistent in the great affair of man's redemption. God was satisfied by Christ as our Substitute and Surety ; but it was rich grace that would accept of a surety, when He might have executed the severity of the law on the transgressor ; and it was rich grace to provide such a Surety as his own Son, and freely to deliver Him up, when nothing of that nature could have entered into our thoughts, or have been any otherwise found out for us. In which instance He has not only manifested riches of grace, but hath abounded toward us in all wisdom and prudence, v. 8. wisdom, in contriving the dispensation, and prudence, in executing the counsel of his will, as He has done.

4. Another privilege the apostle here blesses God for, is, divine revelation, v. 9. This we owe to Christ, who, having lain in the bosom of the Father from eternity, came to declare his will to men. According to his good pleasure, his secret counsels concerning man's redemption, which He had purposed, or resolved upon, merely in and from Himself, confers blessings on us.—(4) Chosen, &c. [He speaks of whole societies in general, as consisting of saints, . . . because this was the prominent character. . . Nor did he always judge it necessary to make exceptions, in reference to a few hypocrites who had crept in among them, any more than Christ judged it so, to speak of Judas as excluded, when he mentions the 12 thrones on which the apostles should sit. Mat. 19: 23.—In this view, he says of them in general, that they were chosen, . . . not to those present privileges, which they as all professed Christians enjoy, but to real holiness and everlasting glory.] Predestinated, &c. [Predestination to the adoption of children,] should be carefully distinguished from actual adoption, which is subsequent to regeneration and actual believing, and makes way for the Spirit of adoption. John 1:10—13. Rom. 8:14—17.

(3.) Us. [Himself and the Ephesians, most of whom were Gentile converts. By thus beginning with thanks, he at once declares his firm persuasion of the calling of the Gentiles, and his hearty joy in it. With all, &c.] The apostle everywhere represents the graces of the Spirit, as so much preferable to its gifts, it appears very surprising, that Whithy should refer the words entirely to those gifts. [Bl., with the ancient comtrs., Dr. Wells, &c., understands the latter, chiefly, though not to the exclusion of the former.] The phrase manifestly takes in every spiritual blessing (so the Gr.), and principally must refer, not to extraordinary and miraculous gifts, but to the sanctifying and saving graces of the Spirit ; such as effectual calling, justification by grace, the adoption of children, the illumination of the Spirit, and all the graces of the Christian life, which are common unto all believers, and are communicated to them in all their several branches. And these are blessings in the heavens (so the Gr. lit.), or in heavenly things [and so Bl. tr.], as they are things that have a manifest relation and respect to heaven, and have a tendency to fit us for it, and to lead us not to seek after the enjoyments of this present world, but to be conversant about, and to be waiting for, those of the heavenly state.] DODDR. Schoettgen says, 'the apostle opposes spiritual and celestial things to Paganism and Judaism,' with their vain, or merely typical externalities ; and he refers to his 'Diss. on the heavenly Jerusalem,' 5, 2 and 3. See Bl. Ed.

(4.) 'The Jews imagined, none were elect but themselves, and that for them alone the world was created, 2 Esdras 6:55—59.' Wells, in Bl. 'Steadfastness and purity of faith, the ancients rightly understand by "holy," and by "without blame," purity of morals. The words, in love, are united by the ancients and most eminent modern critics, to the next v. yet it seems awkward to unite it with predestinated, and Koppe, more naturally, takes it with chosen.' BLOOMF.

(8.) Wisdom, . . . prudence. [Certainly not "their own prudent returns to be made to divine goodness ;" but it refers to God's having, with infinite wisdom, contrived a way to glorify all his attributes in the salvation of men, even those which seemed to have the most different claims ; dispensing mercy in a way of judgment, and awakening a humble awe and reverence [and wonderfully exciting the superior sentiments to action, Ed.] in the soul, by the very method used for granting pardon and peace.]

V. 9—12. The blessings before mentioned were communicated to believers, by the Lord's 'making known to them the mystery of his will,' respecting the method of redemption and salvation, and the admission of sinners into his family by faith in Christ, whether Jews or Gentiles. All these arrangements had been made 'according to his good pleasure, which He had purposed in Himself ;' for, as He advised with no counsellor, so He gave no account of his holy, wise, and righteous appointments. Notes, Job 33:12, 13. Rom. 11:33—36. Having revealed these things to the apostles, and by them to the church, his divine teaching had led those whom 'He had chosen,' to see the glory of those truths, which others were left to blaspheme. Thus were they made to 'know the mystery of his will,' and to understand, that 'in the dispensation of the fulness of times,' which at length had been introduced, the Lord purposed to gather together in one kingdom or family, in his beloved Son, and under his government, 'all things in heaven and earth.' So that not only Jews and Gentiles would become one church, not only were the saints, who had before gone to heaven, to be considered as one body under one Head, with believers on earth ; but even holy angels, and all the inhabitants of heaven, as confirmed in Christ, and his worshippers and subjects, would form one kingdom with redeemed sinners, and join with them in adoration, love, and obedience. SCOTT.

(9.) Mystery. [As impervious to human knowledge, not being attainable by natural religion (Ro. 11:25. 16:25. Col. 1:26.) ; nay, not perfectly known even to the angels. 1 Pet. 1:2.] KOPPE. Ros. Bl.

(10.) Dispensation. Oikonomia : 'a similitude from a family, in which the father, or his substitute, measures out, to each, what is taken from the common store-room.' GROT. 'God, in Christ, unites the earthly family to the upper family, his family in heaven, v. 21. and 3:15. which families, says Theoph. "had been split and separated, and had not one head. God determined to unite them in one Head, even Christ ; over the angels by his incorporeal, over men according to his incarnate nature." Bl. Gather together.] 'Lit. unite again, under one head.' DODDR., whom see. Ed.

(11.) We, &c. [Locke (alluding to De. 32:9) refers this to the admission of the Gentiles into the church, which is God's heritage : but as we in this and the next v. seems opposed to you, in v. 13. it must signify the Jews who first trusted in Christ, or the body of the Christian church, incorporated long before the Ephesians were brought into it. Worketh, &c.] God takes such methods to answer his purposes as He knows will be effectual. But it does not prove anything like an over-and not for anything in them. In this revelation, and in his making known unto us the mystery of his will, the wisdom and the prudence of God do abundantly shine forth. It is described, v. 13, as the Word of truth, and the Gospel of our salvation. It contains and instructs us in the most weighty and important truths, and is confirmed and sealed by the very oath of God; from whence we should learn to betake ourselves to it in all our searches after divine truth. It is the Gospel of our salvation: it publishes the glad tidings of salvation, and contains the offer of it: it points out the way that leads to it; and the blessed Spirit renders the reading and the ministrations of it effectual to the salvation of souls. Oh, how we ought to prize this glorious Gospel, and to bless God for it!

5. Union in and with Christ, is a great bearing impulse on men's minds, to determine them in such a manner as to destroy the natural freedom of their volitions, and so to prevent their being justly accountable to God for such actions.' DODDR.—'The original reference is still kept up here, in the word prooristhentes, being predestinated; as in the word proorisas, v. 5. (from pro, before, and orizō, I define, finish, bound, or terminate.) And as Paul speaks of obtaining the inheritance, he most evidently refers to that of which the Promised Land was the type and pledge. And as that land was assigned to the Israelites by limit and lot, both of which were appointed by God; so the salvation now sent to the Gentiles was as expressly their lot or portion, as the Promised Land was that of the people of Israel. All this shows, that the Israelites were a typical people; their land, the manner of possessing it, their civil and religious code, &c. &c. all typical; and that in, by, and through them, God had fore-determined, fore-described, and fore-ascertained, a greater and more glorious people, among whom the deepest counsels of his wisdom should be manifested; and the most powerful works of his eternal mercy, grace, holiness, goodness, and truth, be fully exhibited. Thus there was nothing fortuitous in the Christian scheme; all was the result of infinite counsel and design; God deriving all the reasons of his conduct from his own eternal benevolence, v. 5. his own infinite goodness.'

V. 13, 14. Sealed by the Holy Spirit, &c.] This cannot, with any propriety, be explained of miraculous powers. These were not the 'earnest,' pledge, and foretaste of heaven, as this 'seal' is declared to have been; for many unsanctified persons exercised miraculous powers. But the sanctifying and comforting influences of the Holy Spirit seal believers, as the children of God and heirs of heaven; they are the first-fruits of that holy felicity, and they impress the holy image of God upon their souls. (Notes, 4:30—32. 2 Cor. 1:21, 22.)—Thus the Ephesian converts were preserved, supported, and comforted, and would be, during their time of trial and suffering, in life and death, till they should at last be put in full possession of that complete redemption, which Christ had ensured to his 'purchased people;' or till the inheritance, which sin had forfeited, but which Christ had 'purchased' for them, should be, so to speak, fully rescued from the hands of their enemies, and they put in complete possession of it, at the resurrection of the dead, to be forever monuments erected 'to the praise of the glory of God.' All these things are so evidently distinguishing of true Christians, and so inapplicable to collective bodies of professors of Christianity, that we must conclude the apostle spoke of election, as gratuitous, as personal, and not national, and of effectual vocation as inseparably connected with eternal life; and learned men need far more ingenuity, than has yet been employed in the argument, to make the apostle's words speak any other language, consistently with the rules of grammar and of common sense. Rom. 8:23—31. 9:1—5. 11:1—6.

(13.) 'By, or through, whom ye (Gentiles) having heard the Word of truth, the Gospel of your salvation, and having believed, were sealed with the Spirit of the promise, (even) the Holy Spirit.' 'So Ros., and formerly Grot., and so the ancient comtrs., and well; for to insert some verb after "ye also," as "trusted," "hoped," or "inherited," is too violent, and breaks up the whole construction, Seal.] "Though the extraordinary gifts of the Spirit, whereby the believing Jews and Gentiles, in the first age, were sealed as heirs of the promises, have long ago been withdrawn, the ordinary influences of the Spirit of God still re-privilege, a spiritual blessing, and the foundation of many others, v. 10. All religion centers in Him. Jews and Gentiles were united to each other, by being both united to Christ. Things in heaven, and things on earth, are gathered together in Him; peace made, correspondence settled, between heaven and earth, through Him. The innumerable company of angels become one with the church through Christ: this God purposed in Himself, and it was his design in that dispensation which was to be accomplished by his sending Christ in the fulness of time, at the exact time that God had prefixed and settled.

6. The eternal inheritance is the great blessing with which we are blessed in Christ, v. 11. Heaven is the inheritance, the happiness of which is a sufficient portion for a soul: it is conveyed in the way of an inheritance; being the gift of a Father to his children. If children, then heirs. Christians are said to have obtained this inheritance, as they have a present right to it; and even actual possession of it, in Christ, their Head and Representative.

7. The seal and earnest of the Spirit are of the number of these blessings. We are said to be sealed with that holy Spirit of promise, v. 13. The blessed Spirit is holy Himself, and He makes us holy. He is called the Spirit of promise, as He is the promised Spirit. By Him believers are sealed; i. e. separated and set apart for God, and distinguished and marked as belonging to Him. The Spirit is the Earnest of our inheritance, v. 14. The earnest is part of payment, and it secures the full sum: so is the gift of the Holy Ghost; all his influences and operations, both as a Sanctifier and a Comforter, are heaven begun, glory in the seed and bud. He is said to be the Earnest, until the redemption of the purchased possession. It may be called here the possession, because this earnest makes it as sure to the heirs as though they were already possessed of it; and it is purchased for them by the blood of Christ. The redemption of it is mentioned, because it was mortgaged and forfeited by sin; and Christ restores it to us, and so is said to redeem it, in allusion to the law of redemption. Observe, from all this, what a gracious promise that is, which secures the gift of the Holy Ghost to them who ask Him.

The apostle mentions the great end and design of God in bestowing all these spiritual privileges; that we should be to the praise of his glory, who first trusted in Christ, as Rom. 16:7. they who have for a longer time experienced the grace of Christ, are under more special obligations to glorify God. They should be strong in faith, and more eminently glorify Him; but this should be the common end of all. For this we were made, and for this we were redeemed; this is the great design of our Christianity, and of God, in all that He has done for us; unto the praise of his glory, v. 14. He intends that his grace and power, and other perfections, should by this mean become conspicuous and illustrious, and that the sons of men should magnify Him.

V. 15—23. We are come to the last part of this ch. which consists of Paul's earnest prayer to God in behalf of these Ephesians. Note, We should pray for those for whom we give thanks.

One inducement to pray for them, was, the good account he had of them, of their faith in the Lord Jesus, and love unto all the saints, v. 15. Faith in Christ, and love to the saints, will be attended with all other graces. Another inducement was, because they had received the earnest of the inheritance: this we may observe, from the words being connected with the preceding ones by the particle wherefore. 'Perhaps you will main; and if they produce in any man a new nature, he is thereby marked, or declared to be, God's son; and that mark, or seal, is to him a stronger evidence of his title to the inheritance, than if he possessed the miraculous gifts; nay, than if an angel from heaven assured him of his title.' MACKN.

(14.) Which.] Hos., 'Rather, who is the Earnest, &c.' DODDR.—'Here hos, [nasc. who.] is put, by a common idiom, for ho, [neut. which.] and used by Paul, from his considering the Holy Spirit as one of the persons of the Godhead; and therefore, by association of ideas, he accommodated the gender accordingly. This, then, affords a strong, though indirect and undesigned proof of the personality of the Holy Spirit. And so Œcum. Purchased possession, &c.] Περιποίησις: 'The construction is very harsh, and quite Hebraic, and so con tort and obscure, that I see not how it can be reconciled with the usus loquendi, or accounted for by the ordinary rules of construction. Comtrs. are exceedingly divided as to the sense. Whitby understands, redemption of life; and quotes many texts from the Sept., where the Gr. means, to save alive: observing, that there are two redemptions, or grand deliverances; (for that is plainly his idea of redemption;) the one, that of justification, consequent upon believing; the other, that by which we are delivered from death, and all the other penal consequences of sin, in the redemption of the body from corruption, that it may partake of eternal life. Comp. Ro. 8:23. This, adds Doddr., nearly coincides with Beza's interpretation, who would tr. till the redemption of vindication, i. e. till we are set at liberty, and receive complete deliverance and salvation. Bos tr. "of salvation," but this is obscure and unauthorized. Doddr. expl. the people whom Christ has purchased, to be his peculiar property; as "very agreeable to the signification elsewhere." Slade explains, "property acquired by any valuable consideration," comparing the Heb. shih, peculium. He tr. "for the final deliverance of the people purchased (by his blood). Thus Dr. Wells, "For the redemption of the purchased possession." But I confess, I do not see anything here that approaches to probability: and further than that no interpretation can well rise. I subjoin two others which seem to approximate the truth: 1. that of Ros., and Schl., who understand, liberation from this life, and all its evils. The sense will then be, "with the complete liberation of Christians from all their miseries, until their departure from this earth, when they will receive the promised inheritance;" or, as Schl. tr.: "until the time when Christ shall deliver his worshippers (whom He purchased by his blood. Ac. 20:28.) from this body." 2. that of Koppe, who regards the phrase as the Heb. status constructus, in the place of a participle, joined to a noun substantive, put for "which is purchased and obtained for." He comp. 1 Th. 5:9. 2 Th. 2:14. He. 20:39. and observes a similar construction at v. 18. and 1 Pet. 2:9. This mode is somewhat confirmed by the ancient comtrs. See Theoph., between whom and Koppe the truth seems to lie.' BLOOMF. Calvin understands, till the day of the full redemption of the church; the judgment-day. See his comment. En.

V. 15—23. The apostle had, for some time, witnessed the conduct of the Ephesians; but, having been absent from them at least 6 or 7 years, he had again heard of their faith in Christ, and love to all his saints, which excited him, without ceasing, to thank God for his grace and mercy towards them, and animated him in mentioning them expressly by name, in all his secret and social prayers. It is remarkable, that the think, that, having received the earnest, it should follow, therefore, ye are happy enough, and take no further care : you need not pray for yourselves, nor I for you. No, quite the contrary. Wherefore,—I cease not to give thanks for you, making mention of you in my prayers, v. 16. While he blesses God for giving them the Spirit, he ceases not to pray that He would give unto them the Spirit, v. 17. greater measures of the Spirit. Observe, Even the best of Christians need to be prayed for, that they may abound and increase yet more and more.

Now Paul prays, not that they might be freed from persecution ; nor that they might possess the riches, honours, or pleasures of the world ; but the great thing he prays for, is, that their knowledge might increase and abound : he means it of a practical and experimental knowledge. The graces and comforts of the Spirit are communicated to the soul by the enlightening of the understanding. In this way He gains and keeps possession. Satan takes a contrary way ; HE GETS POSSESSION BY THE SENSES AND PASSIONS ; CHRIST, BY THE UNDERSTANDING. Observe,

1. Whence this knowledge must come ; from the God of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the Father of glory, v. 17. It is a Hebraism, God is infinitely glorious in Himself ; all glory is due to Him from his creatures, and He is the Author of all that glory with which his saints are, or shall be, invested. Now He gives knowledge, by giving the Spirit of knowledge ; for the Spirit of God is the Teacher of the saints ; the Spirit of wisdom and revelation. We have the revelation of the Spirit in the Word : but need also the wisdom of the Spirit in the heart ; the knowledge of Him ; not only a speculative knowledge of Christ, and of what relates to Him, but an acknowledgment of Christ's authority by an obedient conformity to Him, which must be by the help of the Spirit of wisdom and revelation. This knowledge is first in the understanding. He prays that the eyes of their understanding may be enlightened, v. 18. Observe, Christians should not think it enough to have warm affections, but they should labor to have clear understandings ; they should be ambitious of being knowing Christians, and judicious Christians.

2. What he more particularly desires they should grow in the knowledge of. (1.) The hope of his calling, v. 18. Christianity is our calling. God has called us to it, and on that account it is said to be his calling. And it is desirable to know what this hope of our calling is, to have such an acquaintance with the immense privileges of God's people, and the expectations they have from God, and with respect to the heavenly world, as to be quickened thereby to the utmost diligence and patience in the Christian course. (2.) The riches of the glory of his inheritance in the saints. Besides the heavenly inheritance prepared for the saints, there is a present inheritance in the saints: grace is glory begun, and holiness is happiness in the bud. There is a glory in this inheritance ; riches of glory, rendering the Christian more excellent and more truly honorable than all about him : and it is desirable to know this experimentally ; to be acquainted with the principles, pleasures, and powers, of the spiritual and divine life. It may be understood of the glorious inheritance in or among the saints in heaven, where God does, as it were, lay forth all his riches, to make them happy and glorious, and where all that the saints are in possession of is transcendently glorious : as the knowledge that can be attained of this on earth, is very desirable, and must be exceedingly entertaining and delightful. Let us endeavor, then, by reading, contemplation, and prayer, to know as much of heaven as we can, that we may be desiring and longing to be there. (3.) The exceeding greatness of God's power toward them who believe, v. 19. The practical belief of the all-sufficiency of God, and of the omnipotence of divine grace, is absolutely necessary to a close and steady walking with Him. It is a desirable thing to know experimentally the mighty power of that grace beginning and carrying on the work of faith in our souls. It is a difficult thing to bring a soul to believe fully in Christ, and to venture its all on his righteousness, and on the hope of eternal life. It is nothing less than an almighty power that will work this in us. The apostle speaks here with a mighty fluency and copiousness of expression, and yet, at the same time, as if he wanted words to express the exceeding greatness of God's almighty power, that power which God exerts toward his people, and by which He raised Christ from the dead, v. 20. That, indeed, was the great proof of the truth of the Gospel to the world : but the transcript of that in ourselves, (our sanctification, and rising from the death of sin, in conformity to Christ's resurrection,) is the great proof to us. Many understand the apostle here as speaking of that exceeding greatness of power, which God will exert for the raising of the bodies of believers to eternal life, even the same mighty power which He wrought in Christ when He raised Him, &c. And how desirable a thing must it be to become at length acquainted with that power, by being raised out of the grave thereby unto eternal life !

Having said something of Christ and his

PRACT. OBS. Faith in Christ, and faithfulness to Him, unite in forming the character of his saints ; and to the sovereign grace of God we wholly owe it, if we are either true believers, or approved ministers. The appointment of the eternal Son of the Father, as the Surety for fallen man, in the divine foreknowledge, is the source of all the hopes and comforts of those who were chosen in Him before the foundation of the world, that they should be holy, and without blame before Him in love. —The mysteries of God, in man's redemption, must have been for ever hidden from us, if He had not made them known to us by his Gospel, and his Spirit of truth. Thus, in every respect, He dispenses his blessings according to 'the good pleasure, which He hath purposed in Himself.' We need not wonder that self-wise and self-sufficient men deride, and dispute against, these humbling and spiritual mysteries ; nor is it at all desirable, that they should embrace them as a scheme of doctrine, in a proud, carnal mind. But, that humble, believers, who allow their own hearts to be as evil (except as renewed by divine grace) as those of their most irreligious neighbors, should be afraid of tracing back their present experience of that grace, to the sovereign purpose and electing love of God in Christ, that in giving Him the whole glory of having 'made them to differ,' they may also possess a ground of assurance of his perfecting his good work in their souls ; this, I say, is matter of surprise to those, who find the sweetest animation and encouragement from the glorious review and prospect, and in every past and present mercy possess a pledge and earnest of future and eternal felicity. If any, who appear to have 'faith in the Lord Jesus, and love to all the saints,' are dazzled by the sublime mysteries above stated ; their more established brethren should not forget, 'who has made them to differ' in this respect also ; and, instead of forming rash judgments, and engaging in angry disputations, they should thank God, for what He has done for them, and pray always for those whom they deem mistaken. We shall do far more, in this way, towards bringing believers to 'be of one mind and judgment,' than by eager and acrimonious controversies, however ably conducted ; 'for a man can receive nothing, except it be given him from above ;' and high confidence, on one side of the question, commonly excites the same on the other side, with all its hateful consequences. But, if we disputed with less earnestness, and prayed with greater fervency for each other, 'the eyes of our understandings being enlightened,' we should daily see more and more 'what is the hope of our calling, and the riches of God's glory, in the inheritance of his saints.' SCOTT.

apostle seems here studiously to have exhausted the utmost vigor of the Greek language to express, by a beautiful accumulation of energetic words, the omnipotence of God, as effecting the believer's conversion and salvation ; continuing, as it were, that exertion of it, by which the Redeemer was raised from the dead. 2:4—10. 3:20, 21. 1 Pt. 1:3—5. —Our version well renders the passage ; yet the emphasis of the original is not preserved, nor perhaps can be, in a translation. And this may be suitable to the man, Jesus (see Jn. 20:17.) ; but since Jesus was Son of God, and, on that account, united to the Father, in a peculiar manner, who will venture to say, that some profounder sense is not intended by the apostle ?' It is sufficient, with the ancient comtrs, and most judicious modern ones, to consider Christ as here spoken of in his human nature ; as when He speaks of his God, Jn. 20:17. 1 Co. 11:3. 3:23. It is strange, therefore, that the recent foreign comtrs. should dispute this. resurrection, the apostle [in the fulness of his heart] digresses a little, to make some further honorable mention of the Lord Jesus and his exaltation, v. 20, 21. Jesus Christ is advanced above all, and He is set in authority over all, they being made subject to Him. The Father hath put all things under his feet, v. 22. according to the promise, Ps. 110: 1. All must either yield Him sincere obedience, or fall under the weight of his sceptre, and receive their doom from Him. God GAVE Him to be Head over all things. It was a gift to Christ, considered as Mediator, to be advanced to such dominion and headship, and to such a mystical body prepared for Him; and it was a gift to the church, to be provided with a Head, endued with so much power and authority. God gave Him to be the Head over all things. He gave Him all power, both in heaven and in earth. But what completes the comfort of this, is, that He is the Head over all things to the church; He is therefore intrusted with all power, that He may dispose of all the affairs of the providential kingdom, in subserviency to the designs of his grace concerning his church. With this therefore we may answer the messengers of the nations, that the Lord hath founded Zion. The same power that supports the world, supports the church; and we are sure He loves his church, for it is his body, v. 23. his mystical body, and He will care for it. It is the fulness of Him that filleth all in all. Jesus Christ filleth all in all; He supplies all defects in all his members, filling them with his Spirit, and even with the fulness of God, ch. 3: 19. And yet the church is said to be his fulness; because Christ, as Mediator, would not be complete if He had not a church.

CHAP. II. The apostle endeavors to affect them with a due sense of the wonderful change divine grace had wrought in them; and this is very applicable to what the same grace works in all who are brought into a state of grace. So that we have here a lively picture both of the misery of unregenerate men, and of the happy condition of converted souls; enough to awaken and alarm those who are yet in their sins, and to put them on hastening out of that state; and to comfort and delight those whom God hath quickened, with a consideration of the mighty privileges with which they are invested.

V. 1—3. The miserable condition of the Ephesians by nature, is here in part described. Observe,

1. Unregenerate souls are dead in trespasses and sins; all sorts of sins, habitual and actual; sins of heart and of life. Sinners are dead in state, being destitute of the principles and powers of spiritual life; and cut off from God, the Fountain of life: and they are dead in law, as a condemned malefactor is said to be a dead man.

2. A state of sin is a state of conformity to this world, v. 2. In v. 1. he speaks of their internal state, in this of their outward conversation; Wherein, in which trespasses and sins, in time past, ye walked: ye lived and behaved yourselves as men of the world.

3. We are by nature bond-slaves to sin and Satan, the prince of the power of the air, the devil, or the prince of devils, Mat. 12: 24, 26. The legions of apostate angels are as one power, united under one chief; therefore, what is called the powers of darkness, elsewhere, is here spoken of in the singular number, and the air is represented as the seat of his kingdom. It was the opinion of both Jews and heathens, that the air is full of spirits, and that there they exercise and exert themselves. But wicked men are slaves to Satan, for they walk according to him, according to his suggestions, and in compliance with his temptations; they are subject to him, and are led captive by him at his will; whereupon he is called the god of this world, and the spirit that now worketh in the children of disobedience. The children of disobedience are such as choose to disobey God, and to serve the devil; in these he works very powerfully and effectually. The apostle adds, Among whom, also, we all had our conversation in times past; which words refer to the Jews, whom he signifies here to have been in the like sad and miserable condition by nature, and to have been as vile and wicked as the unregenerate Gentiles themselves; and whose natural state he further describes in the next words.

4. We are by nature drudges to the flesh, and to our corrupt affections, v. 3. By fulfilling the desires of the flesh and of the mind, men contract that filthiness of flesh and spirit which the apostle exhorts Christians to cleanse themselves from, 2 Co. 7: 1. The fulfilling the desires of the flesh and of the mind, includes all the sin and wickedness that are acted in, and by, both the inferior and the higher and nobler powers of the soul. Fulfilling [the wills] of the flesh, &c. so the word may be rendered; denoting the fining itself to its own territory, spreads far and near, and thus fills various regions. Ps. 24: 1.

NOTES. CHAP. II. V. 1, 2. The words, hath He quickened, seem to have been properly, from v. 5. supplied by our trs.; as, in the original, that v. appears to take up and conclude the sentence here begun, merely by changing you into us, entirely in the apostle's manner. To be 'dead in trespasses and sins,' implies an utter incapacity for spiritual employments and satisfactions; the want of all desire after that felicity, which holy creatures enjoy in the favor and service of God, and a moral inability of worshipping and obeying Him with love and delight; even as a dead man is utterly incapable of the business and enjoyments of life. The employments and pleasures of animal nature, and even those of a rational being, are within the capacities of a man who is 'dead in sin;' but he cannot relish or desire spiritual pleasures. He may be an epicure, or a philosopher, but he cannot find satisfaction in [the will of God] the peculiar employments of a saint. For while 'dead in sin,' he must be 'carnal,' and 'the carnal mind is enmity against God,' and opposition to the holy law. Jn. 3: 3. Rom. 5: 12—14. 8: 5—9. Such a man, therefore, must be an apostate and an idolater, who seeks happiness in the creature, not in the Creator; and he lives only to disobey, to pursue worldly things, to corrupt himself and others, and to aggravate his condemnation as a transgressor of the divine law. 'According to the course of this world,' and according to the will of the devil; a dreadful advance on the preceding clause, though evidently contained in it. Whether [the prevalent opinion as to air-geni and demons] is to be understood literally or figuratively, was sufficient for the apostle's purpose. There, 'in the air,' Satan and the legions of fallen angels, which are subordinate to him, continually wait their opportunity of tempting men to sin, by keeping from their minds good thoughts, and serious impressions, or quenching them, and exciting the enmity of their hearts against them, and by suggesting others of a contrary tendency. In this way, the devil maintains his dominion, and men in general copy his example of rebellion, enmity, and contemptuous defiance of God; of pride, ambition, envy, malice, deceit, and destruction; or they gratify his malignity, by destroying themselves and each other, through gross sensualities, or by horrid war, and murder, committed in various ways, and under many plausible pretences; or his ambition, by idolatry, impiety, and infidelity. Thus he rules in man's heart; he possesses, as it were, all unbelievers, and he prompts, and, as it were, inspires with wit and ingenuity, the advocates for vice, impiety, and infidelity, by whom he maintains his empire in the world. Mat. 12: 29, 30. Lu. 11: 14—26. 1 Jn. 4: 4—6. 5: 19. Worketh.] See on 1: 11. 'It expresses the influence of Satan over them, as if they were inspired and possessed by him.—It is well known, the word, energoumenoi, among the ancients, signified the same with demoniacs.' Doddr.

(1.) Dead.] 'The philosophers called backsliders from philosophy, and those who again yielded themselves to the dominion of animal passions, dead.' See Wets.; but the allusion seems not the same.' (2.) Course of this world.] Aiōna tou kosmou: here aiōna denotes (as often), like the Latin ævum and seculum, the manner of life. Rosenm.

compares [the classic] genus scuti, the way of the world. He might more aptly have cited Tacitus, (Germ. c. 19.) "to corrupt and be corrupted, is called the age (seculum)." By this world is plainly meant the wicked of that time. Prince, &c.] The Jews and heathens, especially the Pythagoreans, thought the air thickly peopled with spirits and demons. See Wets. Thus Philo speaks of the most holy troop of bodiless souls in the air, and in many other passages, representing them as equal in number to the stars, i. e. innumerable. [Compare Milton's "Millions of spiritual creatures walk the earth, Unseen, both when we wake, and when we sleep;" &c.] Manilius, 2. 13. speaks of "deities flying thick through the vast universe." Diog. Laert. 8. 32. "all the airs are filled with souls, and these are thought to be demons and heroes." And Porphyry ascribes the lusts of the flesh to these demons. Plutarch speaks of such powerful spirits of the air, p. 2, 361 b. Also Apuleius and Lucan. And Koppé cites, among the rabbinic writings, Pirke Aboth, fol. 63. p. 2. "You must know, that from the earth, even to the firmament, all is full of troops and prefects, and below are many creatures, injuring and accusing, and all stand and fly about in the air; nor is any place void, but all are fully preoccupied; of whom some excite to good, some to bad; some to life, some to death." And so Ignatius, (Ad Ephesios. § 13.) "In which [i. e. the air] all war is carried on, of spirits on the earth and aerial."—Wets. remarks, that "Paul only speaks thus according to the principles of the Pythagorean philosophy, with which those to whom he wrote were imbued, but does not give it as a part of the doctrine revealed to him by Christ, and to be believed by all." Yet Paul not only expresses no disapprobation of it, but the expression, "spirit now energizing," &c., seems to profess his belief of the reality of Satan's agency, and the term archonta [ruling] implies others. Yet it should be remembered, that the other words, "power of the air," do not indicate how far the apostle's belief on that subject extended. Nor are we to ascribe to him all the dreams of the rabbins. On the other hand, to exclude, as many do, the influence of this demoniacal agency altogether, and to represent Paul himself, as disbelieving it, and yet countenancing it for temporary purposes, is not only doing the greatest injustice to Paul, but is running counter to the testimony both of Paul and the other sacred writers. Indeed, to suppose, because there is no appearance of demoniacal influence now, that there was none in the apostolic age, is as irrational as to suppose, that because no miracles are now worked in proof of the Gospel, none were then worked. That were to confound the ordinary and the extraordinary dispensations of Providence; which would be unphilosophical as well as presumptuous. It should seem that the Almighty permitted, and, as it were, let loose [the minds and hearts of men having then so far depraved themselves] those demons to exercise their power to oppose the spread of the Gospel, in order thereby to put to the proof the obedience of his faithful servants, and evince the divine mission of the preachers of the Gospel, by enabling them to cure evils which heretofore had admitted of no remedy. And the "now" may be thought to favor this opinion. On the kinds of demons, see Grot.—Disobedience.] i. e. of the will of God, and the moral law; as was the case with the great bulk of both Gentiles and Jews, in whom Satan effectually worked. Though he often energized in the good, yet he did not prevail, because they were not children of disobedience. BLOOMF.

[plurality and] efficacy of these lusts, and what power they have over those who yield themselves up unto them.

5. We are by nature the children of wrath, even as others. The Jews were so, as well as the Gentiles; and one man is as much so as another by nature, not only by custom and imitation, but from the time when we began to exist, and by reason of our natural inclinations and appetites. What reason have sinners then to be looking out for that grace that will make them, of children of wrath, children of God and heirs of glory! V. 4—13. Here the apostle begins his

V. 3. The apostle before spoke of the Gentile converts exclusively, or at least principally; but here (in the same manner as, in the epistle to the Romans, he proved the Jews also to be under sin) he turns his discourse, and includes both himself, and all the converts from his nation, among those who once were 'dead in sin,' and slaves to Satan; and he proceeds to use the first person plural to the end of v. 7. and then he again addresses the Gentile converts.—'He could not mean the Jews,' say many learned men, 'because they had not been idolaters.' But had the apostle at all mentioned idolatry? and is there no way of conforming to the world, and serving the devil, except by gross idolatry? To suppose that the apostle spake of himself, as one of the Gentiles, or one of the church of Rome, where he then was, as chiefly consisting of Gentile converts, is so absurd in itself, so unsuitable to his argument, so needless, after what he had said of the Gentiles, and so contrary to his language, and that of the most eminent saints in other parts of Scripture, that nothing, it may fairly be presumed, could have reconciled learned writers to it, but the necessity of adopting it, in order to avoid the doctrine of 'original sin,' in the full and proper meaning of the terms, as true of all men Jew, Gentile, or Christian, as 'naturally engendered of Adam's race,' and so to avoid also the doctrine of 'regeneration,' or a real new creation of the soul, by the power of the Holy Spirit.—The author of these notes was once deeply engaged in this scheme, [see in the Supplement to this Commentary, the life of Dr. Scott. Ed.] being strongly attached to Mr. Locke's views; but this very text shook his whole system to the foundation. Much above 40 yrs. have elapsed since that time; and he has had abundant time, and has bestowed no little pains, in reconsidering the subject; but is more and more deeply convinced, that the interpretation is wholly unscriptural, and that it tends to evaporate the meaning of the sacred oracles, as if we had little concern in the greatest part of them.—Not only were the idolatrous Ephesians thus 'dead in sin,' and under the power of Satan, but the apostle, and all other Christians then on earth, had 'in times past their conversation among them,' as alienated from God, and disobedient to Him. So that the Jews, as well as the Gentiles, and the Christians, as well as those who remained unconverted, were 'by nature' 'dead in sin,' and children of wrath,' one as well as another. For, being born of Adam's fallen race, averse to good and prone to evil, they were alike, in the temper of their hearts, and the conduct of their lives, deserving of the wrath of God, and meet objects of it. Rom. 9:22, 23.—Great pains, as it has been observed, have been employed to prove, that 'nature' may signify custom, or habitual practice. But the attempt has been evidently baffled in the critical argument. At the same time, stubborn facts prove, that men called Christians are 'dead in sin,' as much as the Gentiles were, and that the children of believers are as prone to evil, and averse to good, as those of idolaters. And surely no one can suppose, that 'worldly lusts' are more excusable in Christians, than in heathens!—The word rendered 'by nature,' seems never to have been used for any other emotions, than such as resulted from innate propensities [note, end of Ro. 7]; and the whole tenor of the Scripture, as well as the experience and confessions of the most pious persons who ever lived, confirm the interpretation, and expressly contradict that mere flattering one, which some have attempted to substitute in its place. SCOTT.

(3.) We, &c.] Thus the apostle delicately spares their feelings. (See, BLOOMER. Desires.) Paul includes intellectual, moral, and animal, in fine, total depravity. He includes himself, his former sins 'were those of the mind, spiritual pride, and disobedience to God's will, so clearly revealed by Jesus.' The apostle intended to show the utter depravity account of the glorious change wrought in them by converting grace.

I. By whom, and how. 1. Negatively; not of yourselves, v. 8. Our faith, our conversion, and our eternal salvation, are not the mere product of any natural abilities, or of any merit of our own, v. 9. There is no room for any man's boasting, as though he had done anything that might deserve such immense favors from God. 2. Positively, v. 4. God Himself is the Author of this great and happy change, and his great love is the spring and fountal cause of it; thence He resolved to show mercy. Love is his inclination to do us good, considered simply as creatures; Mercy respects us as apostate and as miserable creatures. Observe, God's eternal love or good-will toward his creatures, is the fountain whence all his mercies vouchsafed to us proceed; and that love of God is great love, and that mercy of his is rich mercy; inexpressibly great and inexhaustibly rich. Then, by grace ye are saved, v. 5. and that through faith,—It is the gift of God, v. 8. the free, undeserved goodness and favor of God; both faith and salvation are his gift. The great objects of faith are made known by divine revelation, and made credible by the testimony and evidence God hath given us; and that we believe to salvation, and obtain salvation through faith, is entirely owing to divine assistance and grace.

II. This change consists in several particulars, answering to the misery of our natural state; some enumerated in this section, others below. 1. We who were dead are quickened, v. 5. saved from the death of sin, and have a principle of spiritual life implanted in us. Grace in the soul is a new life in the soul. Sin, like death to the natural senses, seals up the soul's faculties: but a regenerate sinner becomes a living soul: he lives a life of sanctification, being born of God; and he lives in the sense of the law, being delivered from the guilt of sin by pardoning and justifying grace. He hath quickened us together with Christ; our spiritual life results from our union with Christ; in Him we live: Because I live ye shall live also. 2. We who were buried, are raised up, v. 6. What remains yet to be done, is here spoken of as passed; though indeed we are raised up in virtue of our union with Him whom God hath raised from the dead. When He raised Christ from the dead, He did in effect raise up all believers together with Him, He being their common Head; and when He placed Him at his right hand, in heavenly places, He advanced and glorified them in and with Him, their raised and exalted Head and Forerunner. And made us sit together in heavenly places in Christ Jesus. This may be understood in another sense; sinners roll themselves in the dust; sanctified souls sit in heavenly places, are raised above the world; the world is as nothing to them, compared with what it has been, and compared with what the other world is. Saints are not only Christ's freemen, but assessors with Him; by the assistance of his grace they have ascended with Him above this world to converse with another, and they live in the constant expectation of it.

III. Observe, what is the great design and aim of God in producing and effecting this change: And this, 1. With respect to others, v. 7. that He might give a specimen and proof of his great goodness and mercy, for the encouragement of sinners in future time. God having this in his design, poor of the natural man, ouden pneumatikon phronōn, [minding nothing spiritual.] Chrys., Theoph., Beza, Bloomf. The difficulty attending the reconciliation of this doctrine with that of free will, has been fruitful of controversy, and is well answered, in these words of a respected and beloved friend: 'This [Jn. 6:6. &c.] is a hard saying,—who can hear it? This sentence means, not that a sinner has no power to hear the humbling doctrine of total depravity? but, who, as we say, can bear it, i. e. be willing,—be pleased with it? From that time many of Christ's disciples went back, and walked no more with Him. It was those that could not bear such sayings. Comp. the expressions of natural inability, Ex. 33:20. 2 S. 12:23. Lu. 6:26. &c. with those which mean, aversion of will, moral inability, from disinclination or contrary choice, Mat. 19:20. with Tit. 1:2. He. 6:18. 1 S. 15:29; Is. 1:18. with 15; Jn. 4:4. Mk. 6:5; Mat. 9:15. Mk. 10:33. 26:39. 1:40; Josh. 24:19. with 21; Jn. 5:44. 1 Co. 2:14. with 2 Co. 4:3. Jn. 6:44. The carnal mind is enmity against God, not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be. If this means a natural inability, how does regeneration help the matter, as it includes the creation of no new natural powers or faculties? But if it means, that the carnal mind is one which, by its friendship for the world, is at enmity with God, then it is plain, that the mind which prefers the creature to God, cannot, at the same time, prefer God to the creature; though the hindrance is not natural, but the inability of the will,—a moral inability,—a duty prevented by a contrary choice. . . These examples [adduced above], to which thousands might be added, decide, that the Scriptures of the O. and N. T., given by inspiration of God, do maintain the distinction between things, whose existence is perverted for want of sufficient capacity in the agent, and things which lie within the limits of his capacity, and are only prevented by his choice,—and that both are expressed by the terms, cannot, impossible, unable, &c.,—leaving it to the nature and connexions of the subject, to indicate the peculiar meaning,—and never, except in theological controversy, or the cavillings of sinners, leading to any mistake.' V. 6, 7. 'By means of that relation between Him and us, which divine grace has established, we may look upon his resurrection and exaltation to the right hand of God, as the certain pledge and security of ours, and may be said to share in those felicities and dignities, which are conferred on Him.' Doddr. Jn. 14:18—20. The apostle would, therefore, repeat and enlarge on the hint before given, that 'they had been saved by grace.'—Their disposition and ability to love God, and to do good works, should be considered as a part of their salvation, not as the cause of it: for it was the purpose of God, that his redeemed people should habitually walk in good works, from their conversion till they finished their course; and their holy lives were the effect, evidence, and recommendation of their salvation by grace.—'Both faith and works are God's workmanship, both are necessary; but the one the fruit of the other.' Maclaurin. SCOTT.

sinner should take great encouragement from it. And what may we not hope for from such grace and kindness, from riches of grace, and from exceeding riches of grace, to which this change is owing? Through Christ Jesus, by and through whom God conveys all his favor and blessings to us. 2. With respect to the regenerated sinners themselves, v. 10. It appears that all is of grace, because all our spiritual advantages are from God. We are his workmanship; he means in respect of the new creation; not only as men, but as saints. The new man is a new creature; and God is its Creator. In Christ Jesus, on the account of what He has done and suffered, and by the influence and operation of his blessed Spirit. Unto good works, &c. The apostle having before ascribed this change to divine grace, in exclusion of works, lest he should seem thereby to discourage good works, here observes, that though the change is to be ascribed to nothing of that nature, yet God, in this new creation, has designed and prepared us for good works, with a design that we should be fruitful in them. Whenever God by his grace implants good principles, they are intended to be for good works. Which God hath before ordained, decreed and appointed. Or, the words may read, To which God hath before prepared us, by blessing us with the knowledge of his will, and with the assistance of his Holy Spirit; and by producing such a change in us. That we should walk in them, glorify God by an exemplary conversation, and by our perseverance in holiness.

The apostle proceeds, v. 11, 12, in his account of the miserable condition of these Ephesians by nature, which he would have them remember, v. 11, as all converts ought frequently to reflect on the sinfulness and misery of the estate they were in by nature. They were called uncircumcision by that, &c. i. e. were reproached and upbraided by the formal Jews, who made an external profession, and who looked no further than the outward ordinance. The apostle describes the misery of their ease in several particulars, v. 12. They were Gentiles, and in an unconverted state, without the knowledge of the Messiah, without any saving interest in Him, or relation to Him; so all unconverted sinners are; a sad and deplorable thing. Being without Christ, they did not belong to his church, and had no communion with it, that being confined to the Israelitish nation. It is no small privilege to share with the members of the church in the advantages peculiar to it. They were strangers from the covenants of promise. The covenant of grace has ever been the same for substance; but, having undergone various additions and improvements in the several ages of the church, it is called covenants; and the covenants of promise, because it is made up of promises, and particularly contains the great promise of the Messiah, and of eternal life through Him. Now the Ephesians, in their gentilism, were strangers from this covenant, having never had any information or overture of it; and all unregenerate sinners are strangers to it, as they have no interest in it. They had no hope, none beyond this life; no well-grounded hope in God; no hope of spiritual and eternal blessings. They were in a state of distance and estrangement from God; Without God in the world; not without some general knowledge of a deity, for they worshipped idols; but living without any due regard to Him, any acknowledged dependence on Him, and any special [communion with, or confidence, or] interest in Him. The words are, atheists in the world.

The apostle proceeds further, v. 13, to illustrate the happy change made in their state. 'From being far off, on your conversion, by virtue of union with Christ, and interest in Him by faith, you are made nigh.' They were brought home to God, received into the church, taken into the covenant, and possessed of all other privileges consequent. Note, The saints are a people near to God. Salvation is far from the wicked; but God is a Help at hand to his people; and this is by the blood of Christ, by the merit of his sufferings and death. Every believing sinner owes his nearness to God, and his interest in his favor, to the death and sacrifice of Christ.

V. 14—22. Between the Jews and the Gentiles there had been a great enmity; so there is between God and every unregenerate man. Now Jesus Christ is our peace, v. 14. He made peace by the sacrifice of Himself; and came to reconcile, 1. Jews and Gentiles to each other; taking away the binding power of the ceremonial law, so removing that cause of enmity and distance between them; and forming one church of believers, whether they had been Jews or Gentiles. Thus He made in Himself of twain one new man. He framed both these parties into one new society, or body of PRACT. OBS. V. 1—10. We cannot duly value the Gospel, unless convinced that we are in ourselves 'dead in trespasses and sins,' and that we must have perished, if God had left us, as He most justly might have done. Yet, when we had neither title to happiness, nor capacity for it, when we were unable to help ourselves, and unwilling to attempt it; when we were utterly insensible of our danger, ready to vindicate our conduct, and perhaps proud of our wisdom, strength, and goodness, the love and mercy of God were extended to us!—The 'prince of the power of the air' illudes his numerous votaries with gay phantoms of fancied good, and enables them to build magnificent palaces in his unsubstantial element, that they may neglect 'the gift of God, which is eternal life, through Jesus Christ our Lord.' Thus millions copy his example of rebellion, and do as he would have them. There is no doubt a black inspiration; and Satan and his angels working on the hearts of ungodly men, teach them to invent, propagate, and ingeniously defend, impious or infidel notions, and to excuse or palliate their ungodliness and worldly lusts.—When we reflect on the infinite majesty of God, the immensity of the creation, the meanness and wickedness and deep depravity of man, and the stupendous plan of redemption, we shall not be able to account for such favor shown to [repentant sinners], except we also consider, that 'the exceeding riches of divine grace,' will be proportionably displayed and glorified, in the view of the whole creation, on account of each of these circumstances, and of very many others, to eternal ages!

V. 8. That not.] If this be understood of the whole of salvation, faith must be included. Jn. 1:10—13.—The term 'good works,' is never used, in the N. T., for ritual obedience or moral virtue, as practised by unbelievers, or for any other works than 'the fruits of the Spirit.' If any one doubt of this, let him consult a good concordance. The only text, which seems an exception, is Rom. 13:3. and that means 'works good before God,' primarily, though perhaps not exclusively. Without doubt, regeneration and sanctification by the Spirit of Christ, are as much a part of our salvation, as redemption and justification.

V. 11—13. Having spoken of the general state of fallen man, and the salvation of all believers, by the rich grace and mercy of God, the apostle next proceeded to show the Gentile converts the peculiarities of their case, which had placed them much further out of the way of mercy than the Jews had been.—How rude and affronting would a company of unhumiliated, impenitent sinners, especially in a superior station of life, consider it, should a friend in a letter, or a minister in a sermon, at present address them in this language!—If, indeed, 'no man knoweth the Father, but he to whom the Son reveals him;' all men, who reject the Gospel, whether idolaters, unbelieving Jews, Mohammedans, deists, or Socinians, must be 'without God,' according to the apostle's meaning in that expression. Mat. 11:27. Lu. 10:21, 22. Jn. 5:20—23. 2 Cor. 1:1—7. 1 Jn. 2:20—25. 'Separate from Christ,' 'having no hope,' 'atheists in the world.' What was the apostle's view of the state of the Gentiles, in respect of salvation? What his judgment as to the duty of seeking, by all scriptural means, their conversion to Christianity? Ro. 1:16—20. 2:12—18. 10:14—17. 1 Th. 2:12—16. 1 Pet. 2:9, 10 'The Gentiles had no God, to whom they prayed for eternal life, as the fathers often remonstrate.' Doddr.

(12.) 'Though several of the heathens speak of their Jupiter, in terms properly applicable to the one self-existent and eternal Deity only, yet they taught and believed other things of him quite inconsistent with such perfections; and those who had some knowledge of one supreme, eternal Cause, yet practically disregarded him.' Doddr. Perhaps the same may be said of the Hindoos' magnificent description of Brama. Ep. Afr. . . nigh.] 'An allusion to the Jewish custom of allowing different degrees of approach to the presence of God in his tabernacle or temple, according to the character of the worshipper. Le. 10:3. Ps. 65:4. 143:14. WHITBY.—No hope.] 'That the heathens had among them the doctrine of a future state, and that it was popularly taught and generally believed by the common people, must, I think, appear incontestible to any who are at all acquainted with antiquity. [Note, end of Pr., and cuts, Dan. 5:27. &c.] But it is as apparent, that they reasoned very weakly upon the subject, that they had no well grounded hope of future happiness, and that they were but very little impressed with it; so that they had no deity to which they prayed for eternal life, [as has been already remarked, and see Supplement, pt. 4.] And by far the greater part of their most learned philosophers either expressly denied, in private lectures to their own pupils, the doctrine of future rewards and punishments, or taught principles quite inconsistent with it! as must, I think, plainly appear to any one who will impartially peruse what Warburton has written upon the subject, so judiciously defended in the Critical Review.' DODDR.

(13.) 'One cannot help observing how studiously the apostle introduces, wherever it is possible, the fundamental doctrine of the ATONEMENT.'

V. 14—18. In every sense, Christ was to be considered as 'the Peace' of all Christians; the Author, Centre, and Substance of reconciliation to God, and of the union of Gentile converts with Jewish believers in one church. To the ceremonial law the Gentiles were extremely averse, even when otherwise favorable to the worship of JEMOAH; and the Jews were tenacious and proud of this partition-wall, to a degree of disgusting bigotry. But Christ, by assuming human PRACT. OBS. V. 11-22. Besides the general ruined state of all men, every one of us should recollect those peculiarities of situation, character, and disposition, which set us at a greater distance from salvation, than others of our fellow-sinners.—How harmoniously should we live together as members of one body, and children of one family! May his grace reconcile all, who profess his truth, to God and to each other!—We have no 'law of commandments contained in ordinances,' to keep us in bondage, to drive us to a distance, or to excite enmity among brethren; except such as are of human invention. The instituted ordinances of worship, appointed by our Savior, as well as his moral precepts, are suited to aid and encourage our approach to God, and our walk with Him; to excite holy affections, and to conduce to our peace with one another, when properly understood and attended on. Let us then inquire, whether we are 'builded on this foundation,' whether our nature, and fulfilling, in his priestly character, especially by his sacrifice on the cross, these typical institutions, had abolished them. So that this law, (the commands of which consisted of external ordinances,) having lost all its use and obligation, the Gentiles were admitted into the Christian church, without submitting to the yoke of the ceremonial law, or being deemed unclean because uncircumcised. Notes, Ac. 10:9-16:27-33. Thus they became 'one body' with the believing Jews; that so Christ might create, as it were, 'one new man,' consisting of regenerate persons, both Jews and Gentiles, united to Himself the Head, quickened by his Spirit, 'walking in newness of life,' harmonious in worship and obedience, and mutually loving and doing good to one another. Notes, 4:11-13. Is. 11:6-9. Ro. 12:3-5. 1 Co. 12:12-31. Gal. 3:26-29. The ceremonial law implied man's state of condemnation, pollution, and enmity against God; to whom he could not approach, except on an external mercy-seat, and by priests, sacrifices, incense, and purifications; being, after all, kept at a great distance from Him; but the death of Christ upon the cross took away the guilt which was the cause of 'the enmity,' that so a holy God might honorably pardon and be reconciled to his rebellious creatures. And it made way for the communication of the Holy Spirit to regenerate sinners, and so to destroy 'the enmity' of their hearts against the holy character, worship, and service of God. Having finished this great design, He came, by his apostles and ministers, to preach the Gospel, or glad tidings, even peace, with God and with each other, to the Gentiles who 'had been far off,' and to the Jews who were outwardly 'nigh' to God. Notes, Is. 57:19. Ac. 10:33-43. 2 Co. 5:17-21. 2 Th. 2:13, 14. For through the Person, sacrifice, and mediation of Christ, believers of all descriptions were allowed access to God, as a Father, and were introduced with acceptance into his presence, with their worship and services, under the immediate teaching and influence of the Holy Spirit, as one with the Father and the Son, in this great work of salvation, as well as in the unity of the Godhead. Access.] See on Ro. 5:2. God's people, uniting them to Himself as their common Head; they being renewed by the Holy Ghost, and now concurring in a new way of gospel-worship: so making peace between these two parties who were so much at variance before. 2. God and sinners, whether Jews or Gentiles; Christ came to reconcile both to God, v. 16. and this by the cross; or by the sacrifice of Himself on the cross: having slain the enmity thereby. He, being slain or sacrificed, slew the enmity there was between God and sinners. The apostle proceeds to illustrate the great advantages both parties gain by the mediation of our Lord Jesus Christ, v. 17. Christ, who purchased peace on the cross, came, partly in his own Person, as to the Jews, who are here said to have been nigh; and partly in his apostles, whom He commissioned to preach the Gospel to the Gentiles, who are said to have been afar off, in the sense that has been given before. And preached peace, or published the terms of reconciliation with God, and of eternal life. Now the effect of this peace is, the free access which both Jews and Gentiles have unto God, v. 18. the throne of grace is erected for us to come to; and liberty of approach to that throne is allowed us. Our access is by the Holy Spirit; Christ purchased for us leave, and the Spirit gives us a heart and strength to come, even grace to serve God acceptably. The Ephesians, on their conversion, having such an access to God, as well as the Jews, and by the same Spirit, the apostle tells them, Now therefore ye are no more strangers and foreigners, &c. v. 9. This he mentions by way of opposition to what he had observed of them in their heathenism, as being aliens from the commonwealth of Israel. Observe, here, The church is compared to a city, and every converted sinner is free of it; to a house, and every converted sinner is one of the domestics, one of the family; a servant, and a child in God's house; to a building, v. 20.

and the foundation of that building are the apostles and prophets, so called in a secondary sense, Christ Himself being the primary Foundation; but we are rather to understand it of the doctrine delivered by the prophets of the O. T., and the apostles of the New. It follows, Jesus Christ Himself being the chief Corner-stone. In Him both Jews and Gentiles meet, and constitute one church; and Christ supports the building by his strength, v. 21. All believers, of whom it consists, being united to Christ by faith, and among themselves by Christian charity, grow unto a holy temple, become a sacred society, in which there is much communion between God and his people, as in the temple; they worshipping and serving Him, He manifesting Himself unto them; they offering up spiritual sacrifices to God, and He dispensing his blessings and favors to them. Thus the building, for the nature of it, is a temple, a holy temple; and it becomes such a temple, by grace and strength derived from Himself, in the Lord. The universal church being built on Christ as the Foundation-stone, and united in Christ as the Corner-stone, comes at length to be glorified in Him as the Top-stone, v. 22. Observe, Not only the universal church is called the temple of God, but particular churches; and even every true believer is a living temple, is a habitation of God through the Spirit: an earnest of dwelling with Him to eternity.

If this is our experience and privilege, let us take care not to defile the temple of God, nor to grieve our holy Comforter; let us earnestly, and with fervent, constant prayer, desire his gracious presence with us, and his influence on our hearts; let us endeavor to fill up the place assigned us, to the glory of God; and let us study to promote the peace and purity of the holy temple, to which we belong, and to forward that work by which it is continually approaching towards its full perfection. Especially, let us seek, and pray, and improve to the uttermost our influence, be it more or less, for the conversion of Jews and Gentiles, who are still 'without Christ and without hope.'

believing Gentiles, also, though not circumcised; for this cause I am now a prisoner: but a prisoner of Jesus Christ, as I suffer in his cause, and for his sake, and continuing his faithful servant, and the object of his special protection and care, while I am thus suffering for Him.' Christ's servants, if they come to be prisoners, are his prisoners; and He despises not his prisoners. For you Gentiles; the Jews did therefore persecute and imprison him, because he was the apostle of the Gentiles, and preached the Gospel to them. We may learn hence, that the faithful ministers of Christ are to dispense his sacred truths, however disagreeable they may be to some, and whatever they themselves may suffer for doing so. Or, 2. 'For this cause, since ye are no more strangers and foreigners, (as ch. 2: 19.) but united to Christ, and admitted into communion with his church, I, the prisoner of Jesus Christ, pray that you may be enabled to act as becomen persons thus favored by God.' To this purport, v. 14. where, after the digression contained in the several vs. intervening, he proceeds with what he begun in this first verse.

He speaks again of his sufferings, v. 13. He suffered much in prison; and though on their account, yet he would not have them discouraged nor dismayed at this, seeing God had done such great things for them by his ministry. What a tender concern was here for these Ephesians! The apostle seems to have been more solicitous lest they should be discouraged and faint on his tribulations, than about what he himself endured: and to prevent this, he tells them, that his sufferings were their glory; and so far from being a real discouragement, ministered, if duly considered, cause to them for glorying and rejoicing; as this discovered the great esteem and regard God bore to them, in that He not only sent his apostles to preach the Gospel to them, but even to suffer for them, and to confirm the truths they delivered, by the persecutions they underwent.

II. The apostle informs them of God's appointing him to the office; and, by a special revelation, eminently fitting and qualifying him for it.

The original particle for if, here, is sometimes affirmative, and we may read it, Since ye have heard, &c. He styles the Gospel the grace of God, here, (as in other places,) because it is the gift of divine grace to sinful men; and also the great instrument in the hands of the Spirit, by which God works grace in the souls of men. He speaks of the dispensation of this grace given to him; he means, as he was authorized and commissioned by God to dispense the doctrine of the Gospel; which commission and authority were given to him, chiefly for the service of the Gentiles; to you-ward. And again, speaking of the Gospel, he says, Whereof I was made a minister, &c. v. 7. Here he again asserts his authority. He was MADE a minister, he did not make himself such; and he was made such according to the gifts of the grace of God unto him, God supplied and furnished him for his work; and in the discharge of it suitably assisted and helped him, and that by the effectual working of his power; in himself more especially; and also in great numbers of those to whom he preached; by which means his labors among them were successful.

He mentions both the mystery revealed, and its revelation, which qualified him.

The mystery revealed is, that the Gentiles should be joint-heirs, with the believing Jews, of the heavenly inheritance, and be members of the same mystical body, he received into the church of Christ, and interested in the gospel-promises, as well as the Jews; particularly in that great promise of the Spirit. And this in Christ, being united to Christ, in whom all the promises are yea and amen; by the Gospel, i. e. in the times of the Gospel, so some, or by the Gospel preached to them; which is the great instrument and mean by which God works faith in Christ.

Of the revelation of this truth, he speaks, v. 3—5. It is called a mystery, because the several circumstances and peculiarities of it (such as time, manner, means) were concealed and kept secret in God's own breast, till by an immediate revelation He made them known to his servant. See Ac. 26: 16—18. And it is called the mystery of Christ, because it was revealed by Him, Gal. 1: 12. and because it relates so very much to Him. Of this the apostle had given some hints afore, or a little before; i. e. in the preceding ch. Whereby when ye read; or, as those words may be read, Unto which attending, ye may understand my knowledge in the mystery of Christ; so as to perceive how God had fitted and qualified him to be an apostle to the Gentiles, which might be to them an evident token of his divine authority. This mystery, he says, in other ages was not made known unto the sons of men, as it is now revealed unto his holy apostles and prophets by the Spirit, v. 5. i. e. it was not so fully and clearly discovered in the ages before Christ, as it was now revealed unto the prophets of that age, the prophets of the cause, I Paul, am the prisoner of Jesus Christ.' The apostle's zealous preaching to the Gentiles, and openly admitting them into the Christian church, without circumcision, or observance of the ritual law, which implied the abrogation of the Mosaic dispensation, had so irritated the Jews, that they had apprehended him at Jerusalem; in consequence of which he was at this time a prisoner at Rome, in the cause of Christ, and for the sake of the Gentiles. Those who had stately attended on the ministry of the apostle, during his residence at Ephesus, must often have heard from him concerning 'the dispensation of the grace of God which was given to him,' in behalf of the Gentiles (2); but numbers out of the adjacent regions, coming to Ephesus, heard the Gospel from him, many of whom, it is highly probable, returning home, both professed and preached it; and these might need more full information on this subject, which was so peculiarly interesting to the Gentiles.—Peter was sent to Cornelius, the first Gentile convert; but it does not appear, that the whole design of God, respecting the union of uncircumcised and idolatrous Gentiles, when converted to Christianity, in one church with Jewish believers, was so clearly revealed to him, as it was soon after to Paul. At least, the latter, with his coadjutors, proclaimed this doctrine, so encouraging to the Gentiles and offensive to the Jews, far more avowedly, and to immensely greater numbers, than any other of the apostles, of whom we read in Scripture.—Some indeed imagine, that the apostle meant to show, that the value of the Christian revelation was vastly greater, than that of the curious hooks the Ephesians had burned, (Ac. 19:19.) and than the mysteries of the initiated in the worship of Diana. But if the former were indeed 'the oracles' of Satan, and the latter probably no better, we can hardly conceive that the apostle would disgrace 'the oracles of God,' by such a comparison. The same may fairly be said of several other comparisons or allusions, which learned men suppose the apostle to have intended.—The mystery here spoken of, seems very improperly confined, by many expositors, to the calling of the Gentiles; whereas, the mysterious salvation, by Emmanuel's righteousness and atonement, through faith, and by the new creation of his Spirit into holiness, which the Gentiles were called to partake of, in common with the Jews, and on which the apostle had before enlarged, and to which he was about to return (9); was also evidently intended. The former, as exclusive, is at best but a meagre interpretation, the latter perfectly agrees with the apostle's manner, when speaking on a subject, of which his heart was full.

(1.) Chrys., Theod., the Syr., Whit., Doddr., Wolf, Ros., Mackn., Koppe, insert 'am,' to supply the much debated connexion; to which Middleton and Bl. strongly object; the latter thinks it 'involves far less difficulty to suppose v. 1—14. parenthetical, and the thread of the reasoning resumed at v. 14. by épanalepsis.

(5.) 'That the Gentiles should be added to the church, was known long before, but not that they should be admitted on an equal footing, heirs of the same inheritance, and partakers of the promise of the Spirit.' V. 8. The apostle here formed a new word, to express the deep sense he had of his own unworthiness; this is very properly rendered, 'less than the least of all the saints.' He does not seem to have adverted exclusively or principally to his former conduct, as a persecutor and blasphemer. That indeed made him deem himself 'the chief of sinners,' but here he speaks of himself as 'a saint,' though most mean and unworthy of that title. 1 Cor. 15:3—11, vv. 8, 9. 1 Tim. 1:12—16. In general, this must be ascribed to his unaffected humility, his self-knowledge, acquaintance with the holy law, near communion with God, and candor towards his brethren; and perhaps those humiliating infirmities, of which he repeatedly spoke, were in some degree taken into the account. But the consideration of his peculiarly aggravated crimes before conversion, and the unparalleled mercy and favor, which had been shown him, gave him such a sense of his immense obligations, and of the returns of love, gratitude, zeal, and holiness, which became him, that he regarded his disproportioned attainments and experience much more beneath the proper standard, than those of any other true Christian. This did not, however, lead him to doubt of his being a saint, but only to stand more amazed at the love of the Lord toward him; and under this impression, he uttered the feelings of his heart in such energetic language, as very few can use with propriety or sincerity; though many employ the words, rather as expressive of what they ought to mean, than of what they really feel concerning themselves, and some, no doubt, as affecting the praise of humility!—On so great a sinner, and so unworthy a believer, was this astonishing grace conferred, that he should be employed as an apostle, to preach among the idolatrous Gentiles, through many nations, 'the unsearchable riches of Christ!' The immensity of the divine Redeemer's condescension and mercy, the preciousness of his blood and salvation; the fulness laid up in Him, and the freeness with which it was bestowed; the privileges of his people, and their glorious inheritance; those 'riches of Christ,' which were not provided for Himself, or for holy creatures, but purchased for the chief of sinners, for the payment of their debts, the ransom of their souls, and the enriching of them to all eternity, which sufficed for all the multitudes that ever had come, or should come to Him for them, how many soever they were; which never could be exhausted or diminished, by the most liberal and profuse communication of them, or leave the glorious and gracious Pro-

And observe, how much we ourselves are interested in this affair; not only as we live in a time in which the mystery is revealed, but particularly as we are a part of the nations which in times past were foreigners and strangers, and lived in gross idolatry; but are now enlightened with the everlasting Gospel, and partake of its promises!

III. The apostle acquaints them how he was employed in this office. 1. With respect to the Gentiles, v. 8. How humbly he speaks of himself, how highly of Christ! I am less than the least of all saints. He was, in his own esteem, as little as he could be. What can be less than the least? Those whom God advances to honorable employments, He humbles, and makes low in their own eyes; and where God gives grace to be humble, He gives all other grace: observe, also, in what a different manner the apostle speaks of himself, and of his office, magnifying that. How highly he speaks of Jesus Christ; The unsearchable riches of Christ; in whom a mighty treasury, of mercy, grace, and love, is laid up, for Jews and Gentiles both. Or, the riches of the Gospel are here spoken of as the riches of Christ: the riches Christ purchased for, and bestows on, all believers. And they are unsearchable riches, of which we cannot find the bottom; which human sagacity could never have discovered; and men could no otherwise know but by revelation. The apostle's employment was, to preach these unsearchable riches among the Gentiles, a favor he greatly valued, as an unspeakable honor. It is also an unspeakable favor to the Gentile world, though many are not enriched with these riches; which, if we be not, it is our own fault.

2. With respect to all men, v. 9. to make all men see; to publish and make known to the whole world, what is the fellowship of the mystery, that the Gentiles, hitherto strangers to the church, shall be admitted to communion with it,—which from the beginning of the world hath been hid in God; kept secret in his purpose; who created all things by Jesus Christ, as Jn. 1:3. No wonder He saves Gentiles as well as Jews; for He is the common Creator of them both: see, too, how both the first creation, when God made all things out of nothing, and the new creation, whereby sinners are made new creatures by converting grace, are of God, by Jesus Christ. The apostle adds, v. 10. that this was one thing, among others, which God had in his eye in revealing this mystery, that the good angels, who have a pre-eminence in governing the kingdoms and principalities of the world, and who are indued with great power to execute the will of God on this earth, may be informed, from what passes in the church, and is done in and by it, of the manifold wisdom of God, of the great variety with which God wisely dispenses things; or of his wisdom manifested in the many methods He takes, in ordering his church in its several ages, and especially in receiving the Gentiles into it. The holy angels, who look into the mystery of our redemption by Christ, could not but notice this branch of that mystery, that among the Gentiles is preached the unsearchable riches of Christ. And this is according to the eternal purpose which He purposed in Christ Jesus our Lord, v. 11. Some tr., According to the fore-disposing of the ages He made, &c. So Whitby, &c. 'In the first of the ages,' says he, 'his wisdom seeing fit to give the promise of a Savior to a fallen Adam: in the second age, to typify and represent Him to the Jews in sacred persons, rites, and sacrifices: and in the age of the Messiah, or the last age, to reveal Him to the Jews, and preach Him to the Gentiles.' Others understand it, according to our tr., of the eternal purpose God purposed to execute in and through Jesus Christ: the whole of what He has done in the great affair of man's redemption, being in pursuance of his eternal decree about that matter. The apostle, having mentioned our Lord Jesus Christ, subjoins concerning Him, In whom we have boldness and access with confidence by the faith of Him, v. 12. i. e. 'By, or through, whom we have liberty to open our minds freely to God, as to a Father, and a well-grounded persuasion of audience and of acceptance with Him; and this by means of the faith we have in Him, as our great Mediator and Advocate.'

V. 14—21. We have here a devout and affectionate prayer for his beloved Ephesians. For this cause. This may be referred to v. 13. That ye faint not, &c. or rather, he priest less rich than before, to the ages of eternity; these are 'the unsearchable riches of Christ,' and they baffle the powers of computation, nay, even of imagination; they are incomprehensible and infinite. Jn. 1:16. 2 Cor. 8:6—9, v. 9. Col. 2:1—4, v. 3. This was the great subject of the apostle's ministry.—It may be very useful to compare the animated language of this ch., with the cold reasonings of modern theologians, and their extreme caution lest they should speak too highly of Christ and his salvation.—The labors, perils, and sufferings of the apostle, in his preaching to the Gentiles, were so many and great, that nature would have deemed it an intolerably hard and perilous service, and declined it by every possible mean; but grace, inspiring him with love of Christ, zeal for his glory, and a longing desire for the salvation of souls, made him think it an unspeakable privilege. Ac. 20:18—21. 2 Cor. 5:13—15. What an example, for modern missionaries! And what a view does it give us of the desirableness, the importance, and the honor of that service.

(8.) Less, &c. 'Incomparably the least. See Wets.' BLOOMF. V. 9—12. This 'preaching of the Gospel, concerning the unsearchable riches of Christ,' was appointed, that men of all nations and descriptions might perceive the happy 'fellowship,' or partnership, (so to speak,) of Jews and Gentiles in the blessings of salvation, according to the mysterious plan, which had been formed from the beginning in the counsels of God, but had been hidden from his creatures in general, save as He had given some previous intimation of it 'by his prophets,' and had at length more fully discovered it by Jesus Christ, by whom, as the eternal Word, He at first created all things, and was now effecting a glorious new creation. Jn. 1:1—3. Col. 1:15—17. Heb. 1:1—2. To the intent that angels and archangels, even 'the principalities and powers,' who were around the throne of God, 'in heavenly places,' and had, from the beginning, witnessed and adored the displays of his wisdom, in the works of creation and providence, should now discover still more surprising and most gloriously and beautifully varied displays of it, in his church of redeemed sinners; while they beheld rebels changed into spiritual worshippers, all the persons and perfections of the Godhead more abundantly glorified, even by means of man's apostasy; Satan's devices turned against him, and the most discordant characters united in one loving family, or as 'one body in Christ.' All this was effected 'according to the purpose of God,' which from eternity He had conceived in his infinite mind, of saving sinners by Christ. SCOTT.

(9.) Fellowship. 'Koinonia: rather read oikonomia, dispensation, so most critics, MSS., vers., fathers, &c.' Bl.—'Communication. Ibid. An allusion to burying a treasure, as Jos. 7:21. Mat. 13:41. Though something is now known concerning this glorious mystery, yet there is an incomparably greater part, concerning which we only know, in the general, that it is a rich treasure, without particularly knowing either what, how much, or where it is. Created, &c.] Locke pleads, after Didakti, that this refers, not to the creation of the world, but to its renovation; and so may be considered as an intimation, that God always intended Christ should have the honor of forming all things anew, and therefore concealed the mystery in Himself, till after Christ was come. But the words, if taken in the most extensive sense, contain both a certain and a pertinent truth; [for by and in Christ alone, hath the Infinite united with and become at all known to the finite.] DODDR. And Dwight remarks, of a similar mystery, 'On this, and every other question, concerning the nature of the Divine Existence, and of the existence of finite minds, we cannot even begin to form ideas; but must be indebted for whatever facts we either know, or believe, to the testimony of God.'

(10.) Manifold. 'Lit. immensely diversified, and manifold. By.] I. e. by the founding, propagating, and governing of the church. 1 Pet. 1:12. BL. 'Thus the angels understood the divine wisdom, just as we mortals understand it, by considering and surveying the course of events.' Ros.—The O. T. prophecies gave strong intimations, at least, of the intended calling of the Gentiles; and the angels seem expressly to refer to it, Lu. 2:10, 14. I apprehend, therefore, that the apostle here would lead the thoughts of his readers to the series of divine dispensations, as gradually opening this great discovery, and not merely to what he preached concerning it; though to be sure, that greatly illustrated the scheme. It is strangely unnatural to explain this clause, as Locke would do, of the Jewish principalities and powers; by which he is driven to the hard shift (as the first reading of the original will show) of connecting "in the heavenly places" to "wisdom of God." DODDR.

(11.) According to, &c. 'Locke would tr. according to that predisposition of the ages, or several dispensations which He made in Christ Jesus, which, by the preordination of God's purpose, were all regulated and constituted in Him; and Whitby, taking it in the same sense, explains it of his being promised in the first age to Adam, typified in the second to the Jews, and in the last age preached to all the world. But perhaps this interpretation may coincide more with a sense they are so solicitous to avoid, than either of these learned authors was aware.'

V. 15. As so great honors redounded to God, and blessings so rich and abundant were conferred on men, through the preaching of the Gospel to the Gentiles; the apostle was well satisfied with his sufferings on that account; and he entreated his brethren at Ephesus, not to be discouraged, or to turn aside from their profession, on account of them, either for fear of being exposed to similar persecutions from the Jews, or through the insinuations of judaizing teachers, who might attempt to prove, that Paul had done wrong in disregarding the legal ceremonies, and thus had needlessly exposed himself to persecution. Whereas, his constant and patient endurance of sufferings, in defence of the liberty of the Gentile churches, was indeed an honor to them; it manifested the importance of their cause, in his judgment, and it showed the temper of the bigoted Jews; it should therefore animate the Gentile converts to stand fast in the liberty of the Gospel.—The v. may indeed be tr., 'I pray not to faint, at my tribulations for you;' but the sense given in our version, and by most expositors, is far more energetic, and far more in the manner of the apostle. V. 14—19. The apostle could not go from place to place, as formerly, to establish the churches by his personal exhortations, but his affectionate desire of their prosperity was unabated; so that, during his impris-resumes what he began at v. 1. from which he had digressed. Observe, to whom he prays,—to God, as the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, of which, see ch. 1:3. Observe, further, his outward posture, humble and reverent; I bow my knees. When we draw nigh to God, we should reverence Him in our hearts, and express it in the most suitable and becoming behavior and gesture. And here, having mentioned Christ, he cannot pass without an honorable encomium of his love, v. 15. The universal church depends on the Lord; Of whom the whole family in heaven and earth is named. The Jews were wont to boast of Abraham as their father; but now Jews and Gentiles both are denominated from Christ; so some. Others understand it of the saints in heaven, who wear the crown of glory, and of saints on earth, who are going on in the work of grace here. Both make but one family, one household; and from Him they are named

PRACT. OBS. Should we be called to suffer, even unto bonds, in the cause of truth, and 'as the prisoners of Christ,' we may hope to endure the cross with that cheerfulness and satisfaction, which holy Paul expressed; but our feelings would be very different, if we should 'suffer as evil-doers, or busy-bodies in other men's matters.' This should teach Christians in general, and ministers especially, not to leave their proper employment, to which the dispensations of Providence, and of divine grace have called them, and to seek continual instructions from the Lord, both as to 'the mysteries' of the Gospel, and the path of duty: that so their profiting in the knowledge of Christ, and their competency for the office assigned them, may be evident to all men.—We enjoy very great advantages for these studies; as the mysteries of redeeming love were not made known even to ancient prophets, so clearly, as they now are to those believers in general, who are well acquainted with the Word of God: 1 Pet. 1:10—12. and our encouragement is proportionably great. When we consider our own sinfulness by nature and practice, and contrast the poverty of our attainments, the coldness of our affections, and the manifold defilements of our conduct, with our obligations and opportunities, and the glorious theme on which we ought to insist continually; we may well tremble at the thoughts of preaching, in the name of so holy and exalted a Savior, even to the meanest of our fellow-rebels. But those 'unsearchable riches of Christ,' which we would recommend to others, may give ample encouragement to our own CHRISTIANS, as they really are such; acknowledging their dependence on, and their relation to, Christ.

Observe, what he asks of God for these his friends,—spiritual blessings; the best blessings, and the most earnestly to be sought and prayed for by every one of us, both for ourselves and for our friends.

I. Spiritual strength, v. 16. To be strengthened with might, is to be mightily strengthened, much more than at present; to be endued with a high degree of grace, and spiritual abilities for discharging duty, resisting temptations, enduring persecutions, &c. And the apostle prays that this may be according to the riches of his glory, or according to his glorious riches, answerable to that great abundance of grace, mercy, and power, which resides in God, and is his glory: and this by his Spirit, who is the immediate Worker of grace in the souls of God's people. Observe, from these things, that strength, from the Spirit of God, in the inner man, is the best and most desirable strength; strength in the soul; the strength of faith and other graces; strength to serve God and to do our duty, and to persevere in our Christian course with vigor and with cheerfulness. And further, observe, as the work of grace is first begun, so it is continued and carried on, by the blessed Spirit of God.

II. The indwelling of Christ in our hearts, v. 17. Christ is said to dwell in his people, as He is always present with them by his gracious influences and operations. Observe, It is desirable to have Christ dwell in our hearts; and if the law of Christ be written there, and the love of Christ be shed abroad there, then Christ dwells there. Where his Spirit dwells, there He dwells; and He dwells in the heart by faith; by means of the continual exercise of faith on Him. Faith opens the door of the soul, to receive Christ, admits Him, and submits to Him. By faith we are united to Christ, and have an interest in Him.

III. The fixing of pious and devout affections in the soul; That ye, being rooted and grounded in love, steadfastly fixed in your love to God, the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, and to all the saints, the beloved of our Lord Jesus Christ. Some understand it of their being settled and established in the sense of God's love to them; which would inspire them with greater ardors of holy love to Him, and to one another. And how very desirable is it to have a settled, fixed sense of the love of God and Christ to our souls; so as to be able to say with the apostle, at all times, He has loved me! Now the best way to attain this is, to be careful that we maintain a constant love to God in our souls; this will be the evidence of the love of God to us. We love Him, because He first loved us. In order to this, he prays,

IV. For their experimental acquaintance with the love of Jesus Christ, v. 18, 19. Christians should aim more clearly to understand, and firmly to believe, the wonderful love of Christ to his, which the saints do understand and believe in some measure, and shall understand more hereafter: we should desire to comprehend with all saints, not above all saints, to have so much knowledge of the subject as the saints are allowed to have in this world.

It is observable, how magnificently the apostle speaks of the love of Christ. The dimensions of redeeming love are admirable. By enumerating them, the apostle designs to signify the exceeding greatness, the unsearchable riches of the love of Christ, Job 11:8, 9. Some describe the particulars thus: by its breadth, understand its extent, to all ages, nations, and ranks of men; by its length, its continuance from everlasting to everlasting; by its depth, its stooping to the lowest condition, with a design to relieve and save those who are sunk into the depths of sin and misery; by its height, its entitling, and raising us up, to the heavenly happiness and glory. We should desire to comprehend this love: it is the character of all the saints that they do so; for they all have a complacency and a confidence in the love of Christ. We must pray and endeavor to know something, and should still covet and strive to know more and more of it, though, after the best endeavors, none can fully comprehend it: in its full extent it passeth knowledge. The love of Christ may be better perceived and known by Christians than it generally is, yet it cannot be fully understood on this side heaven.

V. He prays that they might be filled with all the fulness of God. It is a high ex-hearts; and our deepest humiliation will not abate our confidence of hope, if we duly advert to the power and love of our Redeemer.—Men of generous minds, often consider more the effects their sufferings may have on others, than their own feelings under them; and they who know human nature will fear, lest others 'should faint,' on account of those trials endured by themselves for their sake, which are indeed their glory.—The instructions and admonitions of ministers, or others, should always be watered, as it were, with fervent prayers; and we may serve our brethren or relatives in this way, when precluded from all other methods. Nor can we do better, than often to enlarge on the petitions before us, whether we are praying for ourselves, or our fellow-Christians. In asking for enlarged blessings, for ourselves and for all our brethren, we should not be straitened in our own minds, as we are not in our gracious God. Let us then enlarge our expectations, (according to the 'exceeding great and precious promises,' made in Christ,) and multiply our supplications; encouraged by what He has already done for his church, and by his regenerating and upholding our souls; being assured that the conversion of sinners, and the increasing light, holiness, and comfort of believers, will redound, in more abundant adorations and thanksgivings, to his 'glory by Christ Jesus,' in his whole church, and to all the ages of eternity. Amen, so be it. Let thy name, O Lord, be thus hallowed on earth, as it is, and ever shall be, in thy holy habitation above! Mat. 6:9, 10, 13. Rev. 5:8—14. 19:1—6. SCOTT.

onment, he 'bowed his knees,' in constant prayer for them, 'unto the Father of our Lord Jesus; of whom the whole family' of believers on earth, and saints and angels in heaven, 'are named,' and considered as the children of God, being gathered together in one, in Christ. 1:9—12. To 'the Father of the Lord Jesus,' and of the whole family, the apostle prayed, that, 'according to the riches of his glory,' his plentiful mercy which was emphatically 'his glory,' He would grant them to be powerfully 'strengthened by his Spirit,' in all the holy dispositions of their renewed souls, in faith, reverential fear, love, gratitude, hatred of sin, hope, patience, that thus they might be steadfast, amidst temptations and persecutions, enjoy comfort, and glorify God in every situation and duty. Ps. 138:5. Is. 40:27—31. 2 Cor. 12:7—10. Phil. 4:10—13, v. 13. Col. 1:9—14, v. 11.—'The whole family in heaven and earth,' (15) may include all holy creatures; but, certainly, none of the obstinate enemies of God. Perhaps the redeemed from among men are exclusively meant; and Christ, as the immediate antecedent, is He from whom this family is named Christians.—'The height, &c.' is here explained, as connected with 'the love of Christ,' mentioned in the following v. But the glo-

pression, like those others, of being partakers of a divine nature, and of being perfect, as our Father in heaven is perfect. We are to understand it, of his fulness as a God in covenant with us; as a God to his people: such a fulness as God is ready to bestow, who is willing to fill every one to the utmost of his capacity, and that with all those gifts and graces which He sees they need. They who receive grace for grace from Christ's fulness, may be said to be filled with the fulness of God, according to their capacity: all which is in order to their arriving at the highest degree of the knowledge and enjoyment of God, and an entire conformity to Him.

The apostle closes the ch. with a doxology, v. 20, 21. It is proper to conclude our prayers with praises. Our blessed Savior has taught us to do so. Notice how he describes God; and how he ascribes glory to Him. There is boundless fulness of grace and mercy in God, which the prayers of all the saints can never exhaust. Whatever we think to ask, [in our stunted faith,] God is able to do more, abundantly more, exceedingly abundantly more. In our applications to God, we should encourage our faith by a consideration of his all-sufficiency, and almighty power. According to the power which worketh in us. As if he had said, we have already had a proof of this power of God, in what He hath wrought in us, and done for us, having quickened us by his grace, and converted us to Himself. The power that still worketh for the saints, is according to that power that hath wrought in them. Wherever God gives of his faithfulness, He gives to experience his power. Having thus described God, he ascribes glory to Him:

(18, 19.) 'To comprehend the length and breadth, and depth and height, of the love of Christ, we must first take the dimensions of our own sins.'

(20.) Ask, &c.] Few texts are so frequently misquoted, as this,—the insertion of the word 'can,' being far from unusual; and even the accurate Doddr. has himself given it, in a parenthesis. But is it not evident, that we 'can' ask any absurdity? The apostle alludes to the deficiency of our faith, and to our almost habitual distrust of God.

NOTES. CHAP. IV. V. 1—6. The privileges and prospects, to which the grace of God had called them, from a state of abject idolatry, ignorance, and vice; the obligations conferred on them; the plain and full instructions, the motives and encouragements afforded them, and everything in the doctrine and love of Christ, as well as the nature of their future inheritance, required of them a peculiar temper and conduct, which he was about to point out to them in various particulars. (1.) 'This epistle, as it sets forth, in the preceding part of it, the gracious design of God in the gospel-dispensation, and represents the benefits and privileges that belong to all the faithful in Christ Jesus, as well to Gentiles as to Jews, is cast into a strain of thanksgiving and prayers, and written (as it were) all in a rapture, in a sublime and elevated style, as flowing from a mind transported with the consideration of the unsearchable wisdom and goodness of God in the work of redemption, and of the amazing love displayed in Christ towards the Gentile world. And in this we ascribe all excellences and perfections to Him, glory being the effulgency and result of them all. Observe, The seat of God's praises is in the church. That little rent of praise which God receives from this world, is from the church: a sacred society, constituted for the glory of God: every particular member of which, both Jew and Gentile, concurs in this work of praising God. The Mediator of these praises is Jesus Christ. All God's gifts come from Him to us through the hand of Christ; and all our praises pass from us to Him through the same hand. And God should and will be praised thus throughout all ages, world without end: for He will ever have a church to praise Him, and He will ever have his tribute of praise from his church. Amen.

CHAP. IV. The former part of this epistle consists of several important doctrinal truths; the latter, on which we now enter, has in it the most weighty and serious exhortations that can be given. Observe, in this, as in most others of Paul's epistles, the former part is doctrinal, fitted to inform the minds of men in the great truths and doctrines of the Gospel; the latter practical, designed for the direction of their lives and manners; all Christians being obliged to endeavor after soundness in the faith, and regularity in life and practice. The best way to understand the mysteries, and partake of the privileges, of which we have read before, is, conscientiously to practise the duties prescribed to us in what follows: as, on the other hand, a serious consideration and belief of the doctrines that have been taught us in the foregoing chs., will be a good foundation for the practice of the duties prescribed in those yet before us. Christian faith and Christian practice mutually befriend each other.

V. 1. This v. 1. is a general exhortation to walk as becomes our Christian profession. Paul was now a prisoner at Rome; the prisoner of the Lord, or in the Lord, which signifies as much as for the Lord. See, of this, ch. 3: 1. He mentions this once and again, to show that he was not ashamed of his bonds, well knowing that he suffered not as an evil-doer: and likewise to recommend what he wrote to them, with the greater tenderness, and with some special advantage. We have here Paul's petition, as if he had said: 'Considering what God has done for you, and to what a state and condition He has called you, as has been discoursed before, I now earnestly request you, (not to send me relief, or to use your interest to obtain my liberty, the first thing poor prisoners are wont to solicit from their friends, but,) that you would approve yourselves good Christians, and live up to your profession and calling. Observe, Being called Christians, we must answer that name, and live like [Christ].'

the remaining part of it is no less admirable, for the engaging manner in which he improves what he had before delivered, urging the duties which became their character with the greatest tenderness, in expressions full of love and endearment, adding the strongest arguments to enforce them, and making mention of his bonds to recommend his exhortations.'

(2.) 'Meekness may be said to be the result of lowliness, since the Gr. signifies such a lowly opinion of one's own merit and claims, as will effectually produce a temper of mildness and indulgence, not requiring too much from our brethren, who are encompassed with the same frailty as ourselves; it is obvious, how requisite this is, in those who should feel how equally unmerited by all is the grace of God.'

in a bundle of rods, they may be of different lengths, and different strength; but when they are tied together by one bond, they are much stronger than any, even than the thickest and strongest were of themselves.

III. Motives proper to promote this Christian unity and concord. He urges,

1. The many unities there are, that are the joy and glory of our Christian profession. There should be one heart; for there is one body, and one Spirit, v. 4. If there be but one body, all that belong to that body should have one heart. The church universal is one mystical body of Christ, and all good Christians make up but one body, incorporated by one charter, that of the Gospel; animated by one Spirit, the same Holy Spirit, who, by his gifts and graces, quickens, enlivens, and governs, that body; even as ye are called in one hope of your calling. Hope is here put for its object, the thing hoped for, the heavenly inheritance; to the hope of which we are called. All Christians are called to the same hope of eternal life. There is one Christ that they all hope in, one heaven that they are all hoping for; therefore they should be of one heart. One Lord, v. 5. i. e. Christ, the Head of the church, to whom, by God's appointment, all Christians are immediately subject. One faith, i. e. the Gospel, containing the doctrine of the Christian faith: or, it is the same grace of faith, faith in Christ, whereby all Christians are saved. One baptism, by which we profess our faith; being baptized in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost; and so the same sacramental covenant, whereby we engage ourselves to the Lord Christ. One God and Father of all, v. 6. One God, who owns all the true members of the church for his children; for He is the Father of all such by special relation; as He is the Father of all men by creation: and He is above all, by his essence, and with respect to the glorious perfections of his nature; and as He has dominion over all creatures, and especially over his church; and through all; by his providence upholding and governing them: and in you all; in all believers, in whom He dwells, as in his holy temple, by his Spirit and special grace.

If then there be so many ones, it is pity, but there should be one more; one heart, or one soul.

2. The variety of gifts Christ has bestowed among Christians, v. 7. Unto every one of us Christians is given grace, some gift of grace, in some kind, or degree, or other, for the mutual help of one another. Unto every one of us ministers is given grace; to some a greater measure of gifts, to others a less measure. The different gifts of Christ's ministers proved a great occasion of contention among the first Christians; One was for Paul, and another for Apollos. The apostle shows that they had no reason to quarrel about them, but all the reason in the world to agree in the joint use of them, for common edification; because all was given according to the measure of the gift of Christ, in such a measure as seemed best to Christ to bestow on every one. Observe, All the ministers, and all the members of Christ, owe all their gifts and graces to Him: and this is a good reason why we should love one another, because to every one of us is given grace. All to whom Christ has given grace, and on whom He has bestowed his gifts, (though they are of different sizes, different names, and different sentiments, yet,) ought to love one another.

The apostle takes this occasion to specify some of the gifts Christ bestowed. And that they were bestowed by Christ, he makes appear, v. 8. by those words of David, wherein he foretold this, Ps. 68: 18. David prophesied of the ascension of Christ; and the apostle descants on it here, and in the three following vs. On high, we may understand both of the place into which Christ ascended in his human nature, i. e. the highest heavens; and particularly of the state to which He was advanced, He being then highly exalted, and eminently glorified, by his Father. Allusion is had to the manner in which conquerors rode, in triumph, attended with the most illustrious of their captives led in chains, when they were wont to scatter their largesses and bounty among the soldiers, and other spectators. Leading captivity captive, is a phrase used in the Old Test., to signify a conquest over enemies, especially over such as formerly had led others captive; see Jud. 5: 12. Captivity here signifies all our spiritual enemies, who brought us into captivity before; such as sin, the devil, and death. And He gave gifts unto men: in the psalm it is, He received gifts for men. He received, that He might give; and particularly, He enriched his disciples with the gift of the Holy Ghost. The apostle, thus speaking of the ascension of Christ, notices, that He descended first, v. 9. As much as if he had said, when David speaks of Christ's ascension, he intimates the knowledge he had of Christ's humiliation on earth. Into the lower parts of the earth, may refer either to his incarnation, Ps. 139: 15. or, to his burial, Ps. 63: 9. He calls his death (say some fathers) his descent into the lower parts of the earth.

The apostle next tells us, what were Christ's gifts at his ascension, v. 11. Indeed, He sent forth some apostles before his ascension, Mat. 10: 1, 2, 5. But one was then added, Ac. 1: 26. and all were more solemnly installed, and publicly confirmed in their office, by his visible pouring forth of the Holy Ghost in an extraordinary manner and measure upon them. Note, The great gift Christ gave to the church at his ascension, was that of the ministry of peace and reconciliation. The gift of the ministry is the fruit of Christ's ascension. And ministers have their various gifts, all from the Lord Jesus.

The officers Christ gave his church were of two sorts; extraordinary, as apostles, prophets, and evangelists; ordinary, as pastors and teachers; two names, so some, to signify one office, implying the duties of ruling and teaching belonging to it; or, as others, two distinct offices, both ordinary, and of standing use in the church; and then pastors are such as are fixed at the head of particular churches, with design to guide, instruct,

V. 7—10. He, whose name is Emmanuel, received at his ascension, from the Father, those gifts which He conferred on men, his brethren. The death and burial of Christ, as well as his incarnation, seem intended.—(8) He led captivity captive.] 'He led a multitude of captives.' S.

(8.) 'The sum of the argument is this. "In the Jewish sacred books some one is said to have ascended up unto heaven, and from thence to have distributed gifts unto men. But since God Himself cannot be said to have ascended into heaven, inasmuch as He always is in heaven, and never descended from it, the prophet must necessarily have had in mind some other person, who, after He had descended from heaven to earth, afterwards ascended from thence unto heaven. And He can be no other than Jesus the Messiah, whom we know to have descended from, and again ascended to heaven." The argument proceeds on these two reasons: 1. that God Himself cannot properly be said to have descended from heaven; 2. that on high, in the Ps. is to be interpreted of heaven; and giving gifts to men, of the gifts of the Holy Spirit. (Kop.) Though the Ps. may not, in its original and primary sense, have reference to the Messiah, yet in a secondary and mystical one it may. And the Jews, it seems, have always interpreted part of this Ps. of the Messiah. Kop. well observes: "we should confide in the wisdom and divine authority of the apostle; that he would not have used this passage unless he well knew that its interpretation of the Messiah, and his ascent to heaven, was received and approved by the Jews of his time." If this be not admitted, it must be considered as an accommodation of this part of the Ps. to the present purpose. So Doddr.: "I cannot undertake to prove, that the passage here referred to is, strictly speaking, a prediction of Christ's ascension, and of his shedding down the gifts and graces of the Spirit. The Psalmist, celebrating a late victory, goes back, in rapturous meditation, to God's victory over the Egyptians, and the spoils with which He enriched the Israelites, ungrateful and rebellious as they had been, and by which He prepared for Himself, in the course of his providence, a dwelling among them; for the tabernacle was built principally with those spoils. And the apostle beautifully accommodates the words to the triumph of an ascending Savior, and to the royal donative of the Spirit; which He shed down on his church, into which many, who had once been rebellious, were admitted, and whereby it was fitted to be his habitation."

BLOOMF.

'Christ might poetically be said, to lead captivity captive, when He triumphed over those that had subdued his people, and acquired such a power over the infernal spirits, as a conqueror has over a captive that he drags at his chariot wheels.' Doddr. 'Captivity is here a collective term for captive enemies; it therefore signifies, simply, that God will reduce enemies to his power: which is more fulfilled in Christ than ever otherwise. Nor, indeed, did He alone prostrate Satan, sin, and death; but daily makes of rebels an obedient people, when by his Word he tames the last of our flesh.'

(9.) Lower, &c.] 'Bp. Pearson (on the Creed) has shown, how very precariously this text is urged in support of the opinion that Christ went down into hell.' DONOR. 'The most judicious adopt one of two opinions: some tr. grave, Hades. Ps. 68:10. Ez. 26:10. 32:18. and are supported by the usus loquendi, and (so Koppe) by the modes of thinking and speaking, prevalent in that age, by which the mansions, both of demons and the dead, were placed under ground. See Philo, 2:20. and 1 Pe. 3:19. But how can heaven and grave be well opposed to each other? I therefore accede to many eminent moderns, that the phrase means the earth itself, i. e. the lower parts, the earth.' BL., whom see. 'Vainly do some twist this to mean limbo, or hell, [lybium . . . inferos]: since Paul is speaking only of the condition of this present life. And their argument from the use of the comparative is too weak; for one part of the earth is not compared with another, but the whole earth with heaven.' ID.

V. 11—13. Christ, having been exalted to his glory in heaven, first plentifully poured out the Holy Spirit on his chosen 'apostles,' as his invaluable 'gifts to men,' that, through their ministry, and by the laying on of their hands, sinful men might be made partakers of his salvation, and of abundant spiritual gifts and miraculous powers; and that, from them, as the grand repository, the church, in all future ages, might receive all divine truth, especially by those sacred oracles which were written by them, and under their inspection, to be the standard of Christianity. He next qualified and raised up 'prophets,' or extraordinary teachers, endued with the gift of prophecy, and acting in subordination to the apostles, in making known his Gospel in the world; others he qualified to be 'evangelists,' to preach from city to city, as assistants to the apostles, and observing their directions. He also qualified and appointed stated 'pastors and teachers,' in the different churches, to carry on the work begun by the apostles and evangelists. Thus the ascended Savior, by sending forth able and faithful ministers, 'gave gifts unto men,' as through their labors He communicated 'the Spirit of life and holiness' to mankind.—(11) Evangelists.] 'Under this name they are to be understood, whom the apostles used as their attendants, in performing their office, because they were not sufficient for everything. . . .

12 For the perfecting of the saints, for the work of the ministry, for the edifying of the body of Christ :

and feed them, in the manner appointed by Christ; therefore frequently called bishops and elders: and the teachers were such, whose work it was also to preach the Gospel, and to instruct the people by way of exhortation. But this brings to the third argument.

3. Christ's great end and design in giving gifts unto men, v. 12. for the perfecting of the saints, that is, according to the import of the original, to bring them into an orderly, spiritual state and frame, who had been, as it were, dislocated and disjointed by sin ; and then to strengthen, confirm, and advance them therein : that so each, in his proper place and function, might contribute to the good of the whole. For the work of the ministry ; or, dispensation ; that they might dispense the doctrines of the Gospel, and successfully discharge the several parts of their ministerial function. For the edifying of the body of Christ, to build up the church, which is Christ's mystical body, by increase of their graces, and an addition of new members. All are designed to prepare us for heaven, v. 13. Some of the gifts and offices are to continue in the church till the saints be perfected, which will not be till they all come, in the unity of the faith, till all true believers meet together, by means of the same precious faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God : not a bare speculative knowledge, or acknowledging of Christ to be the Son of God, and the great Mediator ; but such as is attended with appropriation and affection, with all due honor, trust, and obedience. Unto a perfect man, to our full growth of gifts and graces, free from those childish infirmities, that we are subject to in the present world. Unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ, so as to be Christians of a full maturity and ripeness, in all the graces derived from Christ's fulness : or, according to the measure of that stature which is to make up the fulness of Christ, which is to complete his mystical body. Lightfoot understands the apostle as speaking here of Jews and Gentiles knit in the unity of the faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God ; so making a perfect man, and the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ.

The apostle further shows, in the following vs. God's design in his sacred institutions, and what effect they ought to have on us. As,

(1.) That we henceforth be no more children, &c. v. 14. i. e. in knowledge, faith, and judgment ; easily yielding to every temptation, readily complying with every one's humor, and being at every one's beck.

Of this kind were Timothy, Titus, Silvanus, Apollos, whom Paul joined with himself in the inscription of the epistles, yet so as to call himself alone an apostle. This office, therefore, was only temporary.' Beza. The opinion of this venerable Reformer, in the last clause, seems not well founded. The office of 'Evangelists,' in the primitive times, was in most respects similar to that of missionaries, in subsequent times. They were preachers of the Gospel, without full apostolical authority, and without any stated charge ; going among the heathen to found churches, while the apostles lived, under their personal direction ; and afterwards according to their doctrine and methods of proceeding ; or, visiting the churches already planted, 'to set in order such things as were wanting,' to supply the deficiencies, or aid the labors, of stated pastors ; and to stimulate them to greater earnestness in discharging their duty. When zeal for propagating the Gospel subsided, this office sunk into disuse, and thus, for ages, the heathen have been in a great measure neglected ; and it seems to have been one grand defect at the Reformation, that no part of the funds, which had been appropriated to religious purposes, was reserved for the special object of supporting evangelists to the heathen world ; but, in one form or other, the office of 'evangelist,' or something of the same nature, must revive, along with the spirit of evangelizing the nations.—'These, when they' (the persons above mentioned) 'were employed in preaching the Gospel to those who had not yet received it, the Scripture calls evangelists.' Hammond. Acts 21:7—14. 2 Tim. 4:1—5.—It might have previously been expected, in the present lamentably divided state of the church, that the zealots of each division would find out their own plan of church-government, and their own orders of ministers, exclusively, in this passage ; but it is probable, that none of them would be satisfied with so general a statement, were they called to write their sentiments on the subject.—It appears to me, that 'bishops,' however the word may be understood, are included under the general terms, 'pastors and teachers,' as the principal resident rulers and teachers of the church. Acts 20:17. 1 Tim. 3:1. Rev. 2:1.—Were diocesan bishops more constantly resident, and more 'instant in preaching the Word,' as well as in ruling the flock as 'shepherds,' their authority would be more revered, and their usefulness allowed. Note, Jn. 21:15—17.

(11.) Evangelists. 'The term occurs (only in Acts 21:8. 2 Tim. 4:5. and here) too seldom, and is used in too general a way, to enable us to judge of the exact nature of the office. But we learn from the fathers, and early eccles. historians (see Suicer, Thes. 1, 1234), what is, of itself, highly probable, that the name was, in the apostolic age, given to those Christian teachers, and assistants of the apostles, who were not appointed to the charge of any particular church, but were itinerant, and sent by the apostles to such congregations as might be most in need of their labors ; and it is supposed, that they did not commence the work of conversion, but followed up the rudiments first communicated by the apostles.

'As to poimenes [shepherds, pastors] and didaskaloi [teachers], Doddr. thinks they would have been expressed distinctly [by the repetition of the article], as were the others ; but (as Koppe obs.) in so irregular a writer as Paul, this is a very precarious principle.—The most eminent interpreters, ancient and modern, admit, that by the poimenes are meant, such as are called episcopoi, Acts 20:28. and (it seems) presbuteroi, 1 Pet. 5:1, 2. The word, indeed, carries with it far more of meaning and dignity than didaskalos. For it was originally applied to kings, generals, and, indeed, præfecti in general : a use found in the earliest Gr. authors, probably derived from oriental phraseology, since it often occurs in the O. T. ; as Je. 3:15. And thus, (as Kop. obs. from Grot. and Vitruv.) these poimenes seem to have been similar to the governors of synagogues, who were called præsym. In 1 Pet. 1:25, the two terms are conjoined. Theod. and Schl. think the poimenes had charge of cities ; and the didaskaloi, of villages. Which may have been the case originally ; but, from their more important situations, those would acquire a sort of influence and authority over the country pastors. From the difference of appellation, however, we may presume a difference of situation ; though we are not to suppose, but that the poimenes discharged all the offices of the didaskaloi, as teaching, preaching, &c. ; yet we may imagine some duties, to which the didaskaloi were not appointed.

'No commentator has so well treated on this subject as Whitby ; thus :—'That these pastors and teachers were, in the first ages, men of extraordinary gifts, is evident from this very place ; for the preceding words, He gave gifts unto men, some apostles, some prophets, &c., show, that all the persons mentioned here were partakers of the gifts which Christ, ascending up on high, and sending down the Holy Spirit, gave to men. Hence, among the different charismata, gifts, of the Holy Ghost, are reckoned didaskalia, teaching, Rom. 12:6, 7. and, among the gifts exercised in their assemblies, didachē, doctrine, 1 Cor. 14:6, 26. Among the persons who had received the diversities of gifts, are reckoned, after prophets, didaskaloi, teachers, 1 Cor. 12:28. Rom. 12:6, 7. and here. And so Tertullian makes mention of them, as persons educated with the grace of knowledge. The pastors seem, probably, the same with the kubernēseis, governments, 1 Cor. 12:28. and the proestōtes [over-standers, he that ruleth], Rom. 12:8. And it is evident, from both these places, that they were also men endued with those spiritual gifts there mentioned. Hence, it is observable of those doctors, that, when the extraordinary gifts to the church ceased, their very names grew out of use, they being very rarely mentioned in the succeeding ages of the church.' BL.

Apostles. 'The 12, including Paul. Evangelists. Next to the 12, and with an office nearly similar : only in rank, inferior : such were Timothy, &c., to whom Paul gives the name. Between these 2 kinds Paul interposes — Prophets. These, as doctrine is here the matter in hand, I prefer to interpret, not those who are powerful (as Agabus, for instance) in the gift of vaticination, but excellent interpreters of prophecy, accommodating it to present time by a singular gift of revelation : but so that the gift of prophesying, so far as it was annexed to doctrine, be not excluded. Teachers and pastors, some think one and the same office, because the disjunctive particle is not between, as between the others. So Chrys. and Aug. However, I think the pastors were those to whom the care of a particular flock was committed. They might be called doctors ; only let it be understood, there is another kind of doctors, who preside as well over the formation of pastors as over the teaching of the whole church. Not but that the same may be pastor who is doctor : but because their powers [facultates] are diverse. Only the last two offices are perpetual.' CALVIN.

A distinction between pastors and teachers was early attempted by the New England churches, but was not long maintained. See Cambridge Platform, 1648. Prest. T. Dwight makes no distinction between the two. Theol. Sermon. 150. Doddr. says, 'I shall not take upon me to determine whether two different officers are intended here, of which the former were intrusted with the care and oversight of particular churches, whereas the latter only were employed in instructing the people by the way of exhortation, without being called to the pastoral office ; though, if this were the case [and so Dwight, &c. argue], it seems most probable they would have been expressed distinctly, as the others are, and some, pastors ; and some, teachers. — But if diocesan bishops were the very remedy by which the Holy Ghost designed to prevent or to heal those schisms, of which the Ephesian church was in such apparent danger, (Acts 20:29, 30.) it is very strange, there should be no mention of them amidst all these ecclesiastics, which are here enumerated, though some of them inferior to the supposed bishop in dignity.' DODDR.

'The pastoral office is the first, in the church, both for dignity and usefulness. Rom. 11:13. The person who fills this office, hath, in Scripture, obtained different names, expressive of his various duties. As he has the oversight of the flock of Christ, he is termed bishop. Acts 20:29. As he feeds them with spiritual food, he is termed pastor. Jer. 3:15. 1 Pet. 5:2—4. As he serves Christ, in his church, he is termed minister. 1 Cor. 4:1. 2 Cor. 3:6. As it is his duty to be grave and prudent, and an example of the flock, and to govern well in the house and kingdom of Christ, he is termed presbyter or elder. 1 Pet. 5:1. Ti. 1:3. 1 Tim. 5:1, 17, 19. As he is the messenger of God, he is termed the angel of the church. Mal. 2:7. Rev. 2:1. 1:20. 3:1, 7. As he is sent to declare the will of God to sinners, and to beseech them to be reconciled to God through Christ, he is termed ambassador. 2 Cor. 5:20. Eph. 6:20. And, as he dispenses the manifold grace of God, and the ordinances instituted by Christ, he is termed steward of the mysteries of God. Luke 12:42. 1 Cor. 4:1, 2.' 14 That we henceforth be no more children, tossed to and fro, and carried about with every wind of doctrine, by the sleight of men, and cunning craftiness, whereby they lie in wait to deceive;

15 But, speaking the truth in love, may grow up into him in all things, which is the head, even Christ:

16 From whom the whole body fitly joined together, and compacted by that which every joint supplieth, according to the effectual working in the measure of every part, maketh increase of the body unto the edifying of itself in love.

17 This I say therefore, and testify in the Lord, that ye henceforth walk not as other Gentiles walk, in the vanity of their mind,

18 Having the understanding darkened, being alienated from the life of God through the ignorance that is in them, because of the blindness of their heart:

19 Who being past feeling, have given themselves over unto lasciviousness, to work all uncleanness with greediness.

20 But ye have not so learned Christ;

21 If so be that ye have heard him, and have been taught by him, as the truth is in Jesus:

22 That ye put off, concerning the former conversation, the old man, which is corrupt according to the deceitful lusts;

By the sleight of men, is a metaphor taken from gamblers, and signifies the mischievous subtlety of seducers; as cunning craftiness means their skillfulness in finding out ways to seduce and deceive. How wicked those, who set themselves to seduce and deceive others into false doctrines! The best method to fortify ourselves against such, is, to study the sacred oracles, and to pray for the illumination and grace of the Spirit of Christ, that we may know the truth as it is in Jesus, and be established in it.

(2.) That we should speak the truth in love, v. 15. or follow the truth in love; or be sincere in love to our fellow-Christians. While we adhere to the doctrine of Christ, which is the truth, we should live in love one with another: truth and peace should go together.

(3.) That we should grow up into Christ in all things. Into Christ, so as to be more deeply rooted in Him. In all things; in knowledge, love, faith, all the parts of the new man. We should grow up toward maturity; which is opposed to the being children. Those are improving Christians, who grow up into Christ, into an acquaintance with Him, faith in Him, love to Him, dependence on Him. He is the Head; and we should thus grow, that we may thereby honor our Head. The Christian's growth tends to the glory of Christ.

(4.) We should be assisting and helpful one to another, as members of the same body, v. 16. Here the apostle makes a comparison between the natural body and Christ's mystical body, and observes, that as there must be communion and mutual communications of the members of the body among themselves, in order to their growth and improvement, so there must be mutual love and unity, together with the proper fruits of these, among Christians, in order to their spiritual improvement and growth in grace. From whom, says he, i. e. from Christ their Head, who conveys influence and nourishment to every particular member, the whole body of Christians, fitly joined together and compacted, being orderly and firmly united among themselves, every one in his proper place and station, by that which every joint supplies, by the assistance which every one of the parts, thus united, gives to the whole: or by the Spirit, faith, love, sacraments, &c. which (like the veins and arteries in the body) serve to unite Christians to Christ their Head, and to one another as fellow-members. According to the effectual working in the measure of every part: i. e. say some, according to the power the Holy Ghost exerts to make God's appointed means effectual for this great end; in such a measure as Christ judges to be sufficient and proper for every member, according to its respective place and office in the body. Or, as others, according to the power of Christ, who, as Head, influences and enlivens every member. Or, according to the effectual working of every member, in communicating to others of what it has received, nourishment is conveyed to all in their proportions, and, according to the state and exigence of every part, makes increase of the body, such an increase as is convenient for the body. Observe, Particular Christians receive their gifts and graces from Christ for the sake and benefit of the whole body. Unto the edifying of itself in love. We may understand this two ways. Either, that all the members of the church may attain to a greater measure of love to Christ and to one another. Or, that they are moved to act in the manner mentioned, from love to Christ and to one another. Observe, Mutual love among Christians is a great friend to spiritual growth: it is in love that the body edifies itself: whereas, A kingdom, divided against itself, cannot stand.

V. 17—32. The apostle now exhorts to Christian purity, and holiness of heart and life; and that both more general, v. 17—24. and in several particular instances, v. 25—32. This is solemnly introduced; 'This I say therefore, and testify in the Lord; i. e. seeing ye are members of Christ's body, and partakers of such gifts; this I urge on your consciences, and bear witness to as your duty in the Lord's name, and by virtue of the authority I have derived from Him.' And then, the more general exhortation to purity and holiness of heart and life, begins thus; 'That ye henceforth walk not as other Gentiles walk.' Here he takes occasion to describe the wickedness of the Gentile world, out of which regenerate Christians were snatched.

I. Their understandings were darkened, v. 18. void of all saving knowledge; yea, ignorant of many things concerning God, which the light of nature might have taught them: and by their ignorance they were alienated from the life of God. They were estranged from, and had a dislike and aversion to, a life of holiness; which begins in light and knowledge. And what was the cause? The blindness, or the hardness of their heart; not that God did not make Himself known to them by his works, but they would not admit the instructive rays of the divine light. They were ignorant because they would be so. Their ignorance proceeded from their obstinacy, and the hardness of their hearts; they resisting the light, and rejecting all the means of illumination and knowledge.

II. Their consciences were debauched and seared; Who being past feeling, v. 19. They had no sense of their sin, or of the misery and danger of their case by means of it; whereupon, they gave themselves over unto lasciviousness. They indulged themselves in their filthy lusts; and, yielding themselves up to the dominion of these, they became the slaves and drudges of sin and the devil; working all uncleanness with greediness. They made it their common practice to commit all sorts of uncleanness, and even the most unnatural and monstrous sins, and that with insatiable desires. [See the relics of Pompeii and Herculaneum.] Observe, When men's consciences are once seared, there are no bounds to their sins. When they set their hearts on the gratification of their lusts, what can be expected, but the most abominable sensuality and lewdness, and that their horrid enormities will abound?

This was the character of the Gentiles; but these Christians must distinguish themselves from such Gentiles; Ye have not so learned Christ, v. 20. It may be read, But ye are not so; ye have learned Christ. The meaning is, 'Ye have not so learned Christianity,—the doctrines of Christ, and the rules of life prescribed by Him. Not so, as to do as others do. If so be, or since, that ye have heard Him, v. 21. have heard his doctrine preached by us, and have been taught by Him, inwardly and effectually. As the truth is in Jesus. This may be understood two ways; either, 1. 'Ye have been taught the real truth, as held forth by Christ Himself, both in his doctrine and in his life.' Or, 2. Thus, 'The truth has

V. 14—16. This shows the intent, tendency, and duties of the several stations of Christians in the church; and if these were more attended to the resemblance would be more manifest, and the effects unspeakably beneficial. SCOTT.

So, as dice-players, &c. were usually cheats, it came to denote craft or treachery, such as loading the dice, &c. It also refers perhaps to keeping the minds of the taught in an unsettled state, by either promulgating, or suppressing, or altering doctrines at pleasure, just as dicers change the places and faces of the dice as they please. See Morus and Bl. Ed.

(16.) 'As from the head [the grand repository of nervous matter and vital energy] all the other parts of the body derive life, vigor, and motion, so that each by their mutual ministry assist one another; so the universal body of Christ is so conjoined by that virtue which it derives from Christ as its Head, that each part may in its own way lend its vigor to another, by which the whole may grow and thrive. Ros. According, &c.] By the operation or working of each individual part or member, according to the measure (of its power). For, as Ros. obs., Christ does not carry forward his congregation Himself without the intervention of man, but by ministers, whose cooperation He employs, and whom love should prompt to exert their whole powers, to bring about what He willeth, namely, the building up of Himself (i. e. the body) in love.' Bl.

V. 20—24. (22) The old man.] That sinful nature derived from fallen Adam, and which is corrupt in all its principles and affections, according to those various inordinate desires of worldly things, which mock men's expectations, deceive their souls, and make them deceivers of each other; and which may therefore be called 'deceitful lusts,' or 'lusts of deceit.' The 'corrupt conversation,' including doubtless the bad habits of the heathen, is distinguished from 'the old man,' or the depraved nature, whence all these evils spring. The root would still remain, after the converts had 'put off, concerning the former conversation, the old man;' and this would render watchfulness and diligence needful to the end, till 'the body of sin should be abolished.' made such an impression on your hearts, in your measure, as corresponds to the exemplification of it in Him.' The truth of Christ then appears in its beauty and power, when it appears as in Jesus.

Another branch of the general exhortation follows, v. 22—24. Here the apostle expresses himself in metaphors taken from garments. The principles, habits, and dispositions of the soul must be changed, before there can be a saving change of the life.

(1.) The old man must be put off. The corrupt nature is called a man, because, like the human body, it consists of divers parts, naturally supporting and strengthening one another. It is old, as derived from Adam, and brought into the world with us. It is said to be corrupt, for sin in the soul is the corruption of its faculties, and tends to destruction. The deceitful lusts, are sinful inclinations and desires, which promise happiness, but beget misery, and betray to destruction, if not subdued and mortified. Their former conversation, is their state of unregeneracy and heathenism.

(2.) The new man must be put on. By the new man, is meant the new nature, the new creature, which is actuated by a new principle, even regenerating grace, enabling a man to lead a new life ; that life of righteousness and holiness which Christianity requires. This new man is created, or produced, out of confusion and emptiness, by God's almighty power, whose workmanship it is, truly excellent and beautiful. After God ; in imitation of Him, and in conformity to that grand Exemplar and Pattern. The loss of God's image on the soul, was both the sinfulness and misery of man's fallen state ; and that resemblance which it bears to God, is the beauty, the glory, and the happiness, of the new creature. In righteousness toward men, including all the duties of the second table ; and in holiness toward God, signifying a sincere obedience to the commands of the first table : true holiness, in opposition to the outward and ceremonial holiness of the Jews. We are said to put on this new man, when, in the use of all God's appointed means, we are endeavoring after this divine nature, this new creature.

This is the more general exhortation to purity and holiness of heart and life. The apostle proceeds to some things more particular.

[1.] Take heed of lying, and be ever careful to speak the truth, v. 25. Of this sin the heathens were very guilty, affirming that a profitable lie was better than a hurtful truth ; therefore the apostle exhorts them to cease from lying, from everything that is contrary to truth. It is the character of God's people, that they are children who will not lie, who dare not lie, who hate and abhor lying. All who have grace, make conscience of speaking the truth, and would not tell a deliberate lie for the greatest gain and benefit to themselves. The reason here given for veracity, is, We are members one of another. Truth is a debt we owe one another : and if we love one another, we shall not deceive or lie one to another. We belong to the same society or body, which falsehood and lying tend to dissolve : therefore we should avoid that, and speak truth. Observe, Lying is a very great sin ; a peculiar violation of the obligations Christians are under, and very injurious and hurtful to Christian society.

[2.] 'Take heed of anger and uncontrolled passions. Be ye angry and sin not,' v. 26. This is borrowed from the LXX tr. of Ps. 4:4. where we render it, Stand in awe, and sin not. Here is an easy concession ; for as such we should consider it rather than as a command. Be ye angry. This we are apt enough to be ; but we find it difficult enough to observe the restriction, and sin not. If we would be angry, and not sin, (says one,) we must be angry at nothing but sin : and we should be more jealous for the glory of God, than for any interest or reputation of our own. One great and common sin in anger, is, to suffer it to burn into wrath, and then to let it rest ; therefore we are here cautioned against that : 'let not the sun go down upon your wrath. If it burn into wrath, see that you suppress it speedily.' Observe, Though anger in itself is not sinful, yet there is the utmost danger of its becoming so, if it be not carefully watched, and speedily suppressed. Therefore, though anger may come into the bosom of a wise man, it rests only in the bosom of fools. Neither give place to the devil, v. 27. they who persevere in sinful anger and in wrath, let the devil into their hearts, and suffer him to gain on them, till he bring them to malice, mischievous machinations, &c. 'Neither give place to the calumniator, or the false accuser ;' (so some read the words ;) 'let your ears be deaf to whisperers, tale-bearers, and slanderers.'

[3.] We are here warned against the sin of stealing, and advised to honest industry, and to beneficence, v. 28. It is a caution against all manner of wrong-doing, by force or fraud : and not only must we not steal, but we must labor, working with our hands the thing that is good. Idleness makes thieves ; so Chrysostom. They who will not work, and are ashamed to beg, expose themselves greatly to temptations, to thievery, [over-reaching, &c.] Men should therefore be diligent and industrious, not in any unlawful way, but in some honest calling. Working the thing which is good. But there is another reason why a man ought to be industrious ; That he may have to give to him that needeth. Observe, even those who get their living by their labor, should be charitable out of their little to those who are disabled for labor. Observe, further, Those alms that are likely to be acceptable to God, must not be the produce of unrighteousness, but of honesty and industry.

[4.] We are here warned against corrupt communication ; and directed to that which

19—21. 1 Pet. 1:13—21. 2:1—3. If 'the old man,' means no more than bad habits, as many explain it, how does it come to pass, that these bad habits have always been so general, not to say universal ; while good habits have been exceedingly rare, if any instances can be adduced, which never yet have been, in a satisfactory manner ? We never read of bad habits, in any degree, among holy angels : nor would they have been heard of among men, if they had not apostatized from God, and become 'dead in sin,' and 'by nature children of wrath.' 2:1—3.—The state of the unconverted Gentiles is indeed here particularly adverted to: yet it is most certain, that the nature of the unregenerate (nay, their practice, also, except in respect of gross idolatry, and some of its abominable appendages) is similar, even in those who are called Christians.

(21.) Doddr., Mackn., Ros., and Bl., infer, 'that there was a certain manner of teaching and of learning the Christian doctrine not quite inconsistent with such irregularities ; and that this may glance, like some other passages in the apostle's writings, at those Christian teachers, who took too little care to inculcate the duties of practical morality. Now this we know,' adds Bl., 'was much the case at Corinth ; and it seems to have been so, though in a less degree, at Ephesus. And no wonder, since the two cities were supposed to be the most vicious and depraved of any in the world. Indeed, the morals of the Ionians were almost proverbially depraved. See Mitscherlich, on Horace, Carin. 3, 6, 21.'

(22.) Deceitful. For lusts delude the judgment and conscience ; lulling them, while the consciousness is occupied with present pleasure, ending in disappointment and shame on the review, when consciousness returns to seat itself in the judgment. But this right feeling is less and less clear, till vice and sin comes to be thought harmless, even that which will at length destroy. Comp. He. 3:13.

(23.) 'Mind (nous) may be put for the whole soul, and pneuma (the Spirit) for its intellectual and leading faculty [faculties], on which the Spirit of God might chiefly operate, yet not exclusive of some influence on the inferior powers.' Doddr. (24) After. I. e. after the example of, (Col. 3:9.) or in conformity to the will of God. Righteousness means duties to men ; holiness, those to God. Sec Bl.

V. 25. 'Whitby hath well shown, in his note on this passage, that several of the best of the heathen moralists thought lying might in many cases be justified : and I wish that none but heathens had ever taught so loose and dangerous a doctrine.' Doddr. Scott. See Wayland's Elts. Mor. Science.

V. 26, 27. Great stress seems, in many places, to be laid on this, [the relief of the sick and aged,] which, in a very striking manner, shows to what an extent charitable communications, from the substance or gains of Christians, in every station of life, for the relief of their brethren, and of others, for Christ's sake, ought to be carried. But alas ! those who are not eager to amass wealth, as most in these days are, spend very far too much [time and money] on themselves and their families, to spare a due proportion for beneficent purposes : and a degree of liberality, even far beneath the scriptural and primitive standard, is now regarded rather as a prodigy to be wondered at, than an example to be imitated. Acts 2:44—47. 9:36—43. P. O. 32—43. Notes, 11:27—30. Scott. See 'Mammon,' a Prize Essay. Ed.

(27.) Devil. 'Strange, that almost all the recent interpreters, as Ros. and Schl., should take diabolos to mean the adversary, the calumniator, and the former call it the more natural and easy sense ! Such indeed I grant it would have been to a Pagan, who had accidentally taken up the N. T. ; but not to a Christian, who has learnt from the sacred writings, of the existence of a being who, by himself and his agents, tempts men to the commission of sin, and who is ever ready to assault us when the more violent passions of any kind are in commotion. Besides, the sense which those contrs. here introduce is not only harsh, but very rarely found in Scripture, and scarcely ever with the article, as here. Even Koppe (sufficiently prone to innovation) admits that the common interpretation is supported by the tenor of Scripture, which represents Satan as the author and exciter of all bad passions. And from Schoettzen's note, it appears, the Rabbins thought violent anger was excited by the devil.' Bl. Give not place then to the devil, by over-indulgence of any propensity ; lest, being thus a recipient of hellish influences, and, by habitual indulgence of evil, fitted for hell, you go to his and your own place there ! Id.

(28.) Theft is generally, especially when on a small scale, the vice of the poorer classes, among whom most of the Christians were then gathered. It rises from an over-active propensity to acquire, or from want, occasioned by indulged appetite or idleness ; in either case, the best remedy is that the apostle suggests, habitual industry, a busy head and busy hands ; 'for Satan finds some mischief still for idle hands to do ;' and charity to others, that selfish lusts may be denied, and better impulses become habitual. Ed. 'Among all those, who, within my knowledge, have appeared to become sincerely penitent and reformed, I recollect only a single lazy man : and this man became industrious from the moment of his apparent, and, I doubt not, real conversion.' DWIGHT.

29 Let <sup>f</sup> no corrupt communication proceed out of your mouth, but that which is good <sup>g</sup> to the use of edifying, that it may minister grace unto the hearers.

30 And grieve <sup>h</sup> not the holy Spirit of God, whereby ye are sealed <sup>i</sup> unto the day of redemption.

31 Let all <sup>j</sup> bitterness, and wrath, and anger, and clamor, and <sup>k</sup> evil-speaking, be put away from you, with all malice :

32 And be ye kind one to another, tender-hearted, forgiving <sup>l</sup> one another, even as God for Christ's sake hath forgiven you.

<sup>2</sup> After general exhortations, to love, 3 to flee fornication, 4 and all uncleanness, 7 not to converse with the wicked, 15 to walk warily, and to be 18 filled with the Spirit, 22 he descendeth to the particular duties, how wives ought to obey their husbands, 25 and husbands ought to love their wives, 32 even as Christ doth his church.

BE ye therefore followers of God, as dear children ; is useful and edifying, v. 29. It may be taken in general, for all that, on the one hand, which provokes the lusts and passions of others ; and all that, on the other, which is good to the use of edifying. The great use of speech is, to edify those with whom we converse. Observe, It is the great duty of Christians to take care that they offend not with their lips ; and that they improve discourse and converse, as much as may be, for the good of others.

[5.] Here is another caution against wrath and anger ; and further advice to mutual love, and kindly dispositions towards each other, v. 31, 32. By bitterness, wrath, and anger, are meant violent, inward resentment and displeasure against others : and by

PRACT. OBS. 'The mind that was in Christ' will teach those who suffer for his sake, to be more desirous that Christians, and those especially with whom they are peculiarly connected, should 'walk worthy of their vocation,' than of their own exemption from the cross : and though we can do nothing towards our own justification ; yet, by the grace of God, we may do a great deal for the honor of the Gospel, and the benefit of mankind. If all who profess the Gospel did indeed thus 'endeavor to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace,' what a different face would the church of God assume ! But alas ! how grievously do the remaining ignorance, bigotry, and disproportionate zeal about comparative trifles, even in good men ; the designing ambition and furious passions of bad men ; and the artifices of the devil, defeat the endeavors of those who labor for peace ; and perpetuate, yea, multiply, divisions and dissensions among those who are agreed in the great essentials of Christianity ! Let us, however, persevere in seeking and praying for the peace of the church ; for 'blessed are the peace-makers ;' and, whatever eager zealots may say of us, we shall, in so doing, 'be called the children of God.'—While Christians should be exhorted to value the faithful ministry of the Gospel, as the precious gift of Christ, and the principal means of salvation to their souls ; 'pastors and teachers,' however distinguished, should be reminded of the grand purpose for which they were appointed, even 'for the perfecting of the saints, and for the work of the ministry,' and not for the emolument or reputation or rank in society connected with it ; and for the edification of the body of Christ, not for the indulgence of themselves, or the advancement of their families to wealth or preferment, with the treasures or patronage intrusted to their stewardships, that with them they may promote the cause of true religion, and of which stewardship they must at length give a strict account.—We should indeed 'hold the truth with firmness,' but it should also be 'in love ;' otherwise zeal for orthodoxy may dictate such violent measures, as shall more distract the church, and injure the cause of Christ, than false teachers themselves could do. Let all ministers 'testify in the Lord,' with all solemnity and authority, against unchristian tempers and practices, as well as against false doc-

V 30—32. When a father has done everything proper for the benefit of his son, he 'is grieved' if his son acts in an unbecoming manner ; and, consequently, will not be free and cheerful in his company ; but will either shun him, or frown on him.—As a kind and wise Friend, the Holy Spirit watched over the Ephesian converts for their good, with infinite condescension and love : all their hope, wisdom, strength, and joy were from Him ; and the only return He required, was a ready compliance with his holy suggestions, and a watchfulness against everything of a contrary tendency. None but true believers, persons really partaking of the regenerating, sanctifying Spirit of Christ, could feel the energy of this exhortation.

clamor, big words, loud threatenings, and other intemperate speeches, by which bitterness, wrath, and anger, do vent themselves. Christians should not entertain these vile passions in their hearts, nor be clamorous with their tongues. Evil-speaking signifies, all railing, reviling, and reproachful speeches, against such as we are angry with. And by malice we are to understand, that rooted anger which prompts men to design and to do mischief to others.

The contrary to all this follows ; Be ye kind one to another. This implies the principle of love in the heart, and the outward expression of it, in an affable, humble, courteous behavior and carriage. It becomes the disciples of Jesus to be kind one to another ; as those who have learned, and would teach, the art of obliging. Tender-hearted ; merciful, and having a tender sense of the distresses and sufferings of others, so as to be quickly moved to compassion and pity. Forgiving one another. Occasions of difference will happen among Christ's disciples ; and therefore they must be placable, and ready to forgive ; therein resembling God Himself, who for Christ's sake hath forgiven them, and that more than they can forgive one another. Now,

We may observe, concerning all these particulars the apostle has insisted on, that they belong to the second table ; whence Christians should learn the strict obligations they are under to the duties of the second table ; and that he who does not conscientiously discharge them, can never fear or love God in truth and in sincerity, whatever He may pretend to.

In the midst of these exhortations and cautions the apostle interposes that general one, And grieve not the Holy Spirit of God, v. 30. By looking to what precedes, and to what follows, we may see what it is that grieves the Spirit of God. In the vs. before it is intimated, that all lewdness and filthiness, lying, and corrupt communications that stir up filthy appetites and lusts, grieve the Spirit of God. In what follows it is intimated, that those corrupt passions of bitterness, wrath, anger, clamor, evil-speaking, and malice, grieve this good Spirit. Not that that blessed Being could properly be grieved or vexed, as we are : but it is spoken after the manner of men ; and it is a great good reason why we should not grieve Him, because by Him we are sealed unto the day of redemption, the resurrection-day, when God's people will be delivered from all sin and misery, and their full and complete happiness commence. All true believers are sealed to that day. God has distinguished them from others, having set his mark on them : He gives them the earnest and assurance of a joyful and a glorious resurrection : and the Spirit of God is the Seal. Wherever that blessed Spirit is, as a Sanctifier, He is the Earnest of all the joys and glories of the redemption-day ; and we should be undone, should God take away his Holy Spirit from us.

CHAP. V. V. 1, 2. Here we have the exhortation to mutual love, or Christian charity. 'Because God, for Christ's sake, has forgiven you, (4 : 32.) therefore be ye followers of God, or imitators of Him ;' for so the word signifies. Pious persons should imitate the God whom they worship, as far as He has revealed Himself as imitable by them. This puts a great honor on practical religion, that it is the imitation of God. Especially should they resemble Him in his love, and in his pardoning goodness. As children usually resemble their parents in the lineaments and features of their faces, and in the dispositions and qualities of their minds ; so the character we bear of God's children, obliges us to resemble Him, especially in his love and goodness, in his mercy and readiness to forgive. And they only are God's dear children, who imitate Him in these. It follows, And walk in love, v. 2. This Godlike grace should conduct and influence our whole conversation, which is meant by walking in it ; and we should be more careful to give proof of the sincerity of our love one to another. As Christ also hath loved us. Here the apostle directs us to the example of Christ, in whom we have an instance of the most free and gentrines ; and insist on it, that believers must not 'walk as others do,' who are Gentiles in conduct, though Christians in name : for the difference between heretofore and henceforth, is of immense importance in this grand concern. Indeed, there are many professors of evangelical truth, who have so perversely received the Gospel, as not to be convinced of the necessity of mortifying their corrupt nature and its deceitful lusts, of being 'renewed in the spirit of their minds,' and of 'putting on the new man, which is created after God in righteousness and true holiness !'—Those who most carefully watch over and examine themselves, will most clearly perceive the extreme difficulty of adhering to exact 'truth' and sincerity in all their conversation, and of avoiding every kind and degree of falsehood : they also find it very difficult to feel and express anger, on the most justifiable occasions, and to perform the duties of parents, masters, or ministers, without falling into sin, and dishonoring their profession.—Even exact and scrupulous honesty in all things is far more uncommon, than is generally imagined ; nay, many truly pious persons do things not strictly just, for want of being instructed and admonished after the apostolical manner. But, though thieves and robbers are as welcome, when they come to the Savior by penitent faith, as their more moral neighbors, yet, therefore they must 'steal no more,' whatever hard labor may be necessary for a mean, frugal, and honest livelihood. What then shall we think of those professed Christians, who grow rich and live in luxury, by various frauds and oppressions, by excessive profits, [speculations which hazard other men's property,] smuggling, and other acts of injustice, without restitution or amendment ! And if the poor laborer ought to 'give to him that needeth,' what shall we think of those, whose large revenues, and immense expenses or hoardings, are far out of all proportion to their penurious and scanty alms ?—When we in any degree or respect neglect these rules, we 'grieve the Holy Spirit of God,' lose our comfort and evidence, and even bring our state into doubt and suspicion. Let us then watch against all the evils here stated, and against all anger and malice, and every violent and malignant temper ; and in all things copy diligently the loving example of our God and Savior.

NOTES. CHAP. V. V. 1, 2. Not that the Father could take pleasure in beholding the intense sufferings 'of his beloved Son,' in whom 'his soul delighted,' on their own account ; but his justice and holiness were thus glorified, and a way was opened for the honorable exercise of mercy, towards those who deserved his awful vengeance, and in this display of his glory He was well pleased.—Compassion for the deservedly miserable, condescension to the mean and vile, a readiness to forgive injuries, self-abasement, self-denial, and enlarged beneficence, all in full perfection, were most illustriously manifested in that love, which is here proposed as the pattern for our imitation.

erous love that ever was; that great love wherewith He hath loved us. The apostle designedly enlarges on the subject; for what can yield us more delightful matter for contemplation than this? Christ gave Himself to die for us; and the death of Christ was the great sacrifice of atonement. Some observe, that the sin-offerings were never said to be of a sweet-smelling savor: but this is said of the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world. As He offered Himself with a design to be accepted of God, so God did accept, was pleased with, and appeased by, that sacrifice.

V. 3—20. These vs. contain a caution against all manner of uncleanness, with proper arguments and remedies proposed: some further cautions are added, and other duties recommended. Fornication is folly committed between unmarried persons. All uncleanness includes all other sorts of filthy lusts, which were too common among the Gentiles. Or covetousness; which, being thus connected, and mentioned as a thing which should not be once named, some understand of unnatural lusts; while others take it, in the common sense, for an immoderate desire of gain, or an insatiable love of riches, which, estranging the affections from God, is spiritual adultery. Now these sins must be dreaded and detested, in the highest degree. Let it not be once named among you, never in a way of approbation, and without abhorrence, as becometh saints, holy persons, who are separated from the world, and dedicated unto God. The apostle not only cautions against the gross acts of sin, but against what some may be apt to make light of, and think to be excusable. Neither filthiness, v. 4. By which may be understood all wanton and unseemly gestures and behavior. Nor foolish talking, obscene and lewd discourse; or, more generally, such vain discourse as betrays much folly and indiscretion, and is far from edifying the hearers. Nor jesting. The Greek word is the same that Aristotle, in his Ethics, uses for pleasantness of conversation, making it a virtue. And there is, no doubt, an innocent and inoffensive jesting, which we cannot suppose the apostle here forbids. Some understand it, of such scurrilous and abusive reflections as tend to expose others, and to make them ridiculous. This is bad enough: but the context seems to restrain it to such pleasantry of discourse as is filthy and obscene; which he may also design by that corrupt, or putrid and rotten, communication he speaks of, ch. 4:29. Of these things he says, They are not convenient: the meaning is, they do not become Christians, and are very unsuitable to their profession and character. Christians are allowed to be cheerful and pleasant; but they must be merry and wise. The apostle adds, but rather giving of thanks. Note, 1. We should take all occasions to render thanksgivings and praises to God for his kindness and favors to us. 2. A grateful reflection on the grace and goodness of God to us, with a design to excite our thankfulness to Him, is proper to refresh and delight the Christian's mind, and to make him cheerful. Dr.

Hammond thinks gracious, pious, religious discourse in the general may be meant; by way of opposition to what the apostle condemns. If men abounded more in good and pious expressions, they would not be so apt to utter ill and unbecoming words. To fortify us against the sins of uncleanness, &c. the apostle urges several arguments, and prescribes several remedies, in what follows.

I. He urges several arguments. As,

1. Consider that these are sins which shut persons out of heaven, v. 5. They knew it, being informed of it by the Christian religion. By a covetous man, some understand a lewd, lascivious libertine, who indulges himself in those vile lusts which were accounted the certain marks of a heathen and an idolater. Others understand it in the common acceptance of the word; and such a man is an idolater, because there is spiritual idolatry in the love of this world. A covetous man makes a god of his money; sets those affections upon it, and places that hope, confidence, and delight, in worldly good, which should be reserved for God only. Heaven is here described as a kingdom, (as frequently elsewhere,) with respect to its eminency and glory, its [order,] fulness, sufficiency, &c. In this kingdom, the saints and servants of God have an inheritance; for it is the inheritance of the saints in light. But those who are impenitent, and allow themselves, either in the lusts of the flesh or the love of the world, are not Christians indeed, and so belong not to the kingdom of grace, nor shall they ever come to the kingdom of glory. Let us then be excited to be on our guard against those sins which would exclude from heaven.

2. These sins bring the wrath of God on those who are guilty of them, v. 6. 'Let none flatter you, as though such things were not very provoking and offensive to God; or, as though you might indulge yourselves in them, and yet escape with impunity. These are vain words.' Observe, They who flatter themselves and others with hopes of impunity in sin, do but cheat. By children of disobedience, may be meant the Gentiles, Koppe here remarks on the constant and perpetual opinion of men, that no sure hope of pardon could be conceived without the death of a victim. Also, that prophora [offering], and thusia [sacrifice], are not synonymous; the former, (which answers to the Heb. michh, [note, Lev. 1:2.] being used of any gifts offered to procure the favor of the Deity, unbloody sacrifices; the latter, (which answers to the Heb. zchh), being used solely of victims, as Heb. 10:3. Dr. Bates thinks, that the prophora refers to the peace-offering; and the thusia to the sin-offering. Be that as it may, they seem conjoined (as Doddr. obs.) to signify the completeness of the sacrifice. Sweet-smelling. [Grateful, acceptable: and this was all the phrase came to signify; it was derived (so Koppe) from the opinion, that the Deity was Himself present at the sacrifice, and ate the flesh, or inhaled the fumes and odor. Hence, the most fragrant sacrifice was deemed the most acceptable.] BL.

V. 3, 4. The degree, in which 'fornication,' in particular, and other kinds of licentiousness, were practised and even allowed, nay, excused or vindicated, not only by poets, but even by grave philosophers of the Gentiles, can hardly be conceived by those who are not conversant with their writings. The exhortation, therefore, as it respects these vices, needs little comment; but many learned men maintain, that the word rendered 'covetousness,' means an insatiable craving after more and more of these sensual indulgences. Now, it cannot be denied, that the word sometimes has that sense, yet it can hardly be supposed, that the apostle would, in so general a way, have added to his warning against fornication, the mention of that 'uncleanness with greediness,' which he before had stated, as the excess of Pagan blindness, and hardness of heart, 4:17—19. On the other hand, can it be thought, that 'covetousness,' should here, and in all other exhortations of a similar nature, which the apostle addressed to the churches, be almost if not entirely overlooked? For those who explain the word in this text, of greediness in lewdness, put the same construction on it in many other places where it occurs.—No doubt 'covetousness,' or the eager desire of gain, whether to hoard, or to support extravagance, is as contrary to vital Christianity as the grossest sensualities, though more plausible and not so easily defined. It also supplies the means, in many cases, of silencing or softening the reproofs of those, who would fruitfully protest against 'fornication,' and even prosecute the offenders with the censures of the church.—The clause, 'Let it not once be named, &c.' may only mean, 'Let it not be said, that a Christian is guilty of such crimes.' But, if understood of the discourse, in which the 'naming' licentious practices, in a manner too common, tends to pollute the imaginations, or inflame the passions of the hearers; IT CANNOT BE DOUBTED, THAT THE CONVERSATION OF THOSE, WHO SPEAK AS IF EVERYTHING WAS VALUABLE IN PROPORTION AS MONEY CAN BE GOT OR SAVED BY IT, CORRUPTS THE JUDGMENT AND PRINCIPLES OF MEN, THOUGH IN ANOTHER WAY, YET AS EFFECTUALLY AS OBSCENE DISCOURSE. It seems also to be with peculiar propriety, that the apostle joined this odious vice with these others, more generally scandalous. Col. 3:5, 6. 1 Tim. 6:6—10. See

(3.) Covetousness. Pleonexia: all inordinacy of selfish propensity, whether to animal love, acquisition, alimentation, opposition, destruction, or malice. But Paul had in mind, probably, only the union of the first two; and BL. remarks, that 'as the word is joined with illicit veneration, most recent contrs. agree, that it denotes prostitution, [of all kinds; and few, the Ed. hopes, in this country, are aware how many kinds exist,] for lucre's sake; not, however, to the exclusion of all false methods of money-getting, as that of bawds, procurers, &c., which Grot. thinks, was a necessary admonition, [to the lower classes, especially,] of a disolute trading place, like Ephesus. Thus it would answer to the aischrokerdeia, [gains of shame,] of which Theophrastus gives so masterly a sketch.' Yet BL. inclines to think, with Hilary, Est., Ham., Heins., Whit., Locke, Olearius, Franckius, Doddr. &c., that the term here signifies intemperance, even in lawful indulgence; for if covetousness, or base gains be meant, why should Paul direct them not even to be 'named.' But the Ed. sees little force in this objection; for the phrase seems to inculcate such a horror, as will render them so disgusting, that they will not be made topics of conversation; which alone, as BL. remarks, 'is pernicious to morals,' and so it is better they should not be mentioned at all. Ed.

(4.) Immodesty in speech, or action, smuttiness, indecent talking, coarse jokes, scurrility, double entendre, &c., are forbidden. See BL. 'And that the Gr. should abound in such euphemisms, is a proof, as always, of corruption of manners.' Ed. Convenient. [Suitable, i. e. to our Christian calling, and our engagements as professors of a religion, which was especially promulgated to suppress all such abominations.] BLOOMF.

V. 5—7. The apostle here supposed his readers to know, that 'fornicators, unclean persons, and covetous men,' were out of the way to heaven. 'The covetous,' though often more favored than debauched characters, were, in the strictest sense, 'idolaters;' seeing they loved, trusted, and expected happiness from wealth, rather than from God; and sought to increase or secure their treasures, instead of seeking first his favor, image, and glory. Ex. 20:3. Ps. 10:2—11. 1 Tim. 3:3. 6:6—10, vs. 9, 10. Tit. 1:5—9. 1 Pet. 5:1—4. 2 Pet. 2:1—3, 12—14. They were not therefore truly converted; and, not being subjects of Christ's kingdom on earth, they could not be entitled to 'inherit' his heavenly kingdom. Some might indeed argue against this declaration; and, palliating these evils, or amusing themselves with speculations on the mercy of God and the freeness of salvation, might persuade others, that they were not absolutely inconsistent with a state of acceptance. But let none suffer any man to 'deceive them with vain words,' as these very crimes brought the wrath of God on 'the children of disobedience,' or those who persisted in unbelief, impenitence, and the allowed practice of sin.

7 Be not ye therefore partakers with them.

8 For ye were sometimes darkness, but now are ye light in the Lord: walk as children of light;

9 (For the fruit of the Spirit is in all goodness and righteousness and truth;)

10 Proving what is acceptable unto the Lord.

11 And have no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness, but rather reprove them.

12 For it is a shame even to speak of those things which are done of them in secret.

who disbelieved, and refused to comply with, and to submit themselves to the Gospel: or, more generally, all obstinate sinners, who will not be reclaimed, but are given over to disobedience. The wrath of God comes upon such, because of their sins; sometimes in this world, but more especially in the next. And dare we make light of that which will lay us under the wrath of God? Oh no, v. 7. 'Do not partake with them in their sins, that ye may not share in their punishment.' We partake with other men in their sins, not only when we live in the same sinful manner they do, and comply with their temptations and solicitations to sin, but when we encourage them in their sins, or do not prevent them, as far as in our power.

3. Consider what obligations Christians are under to live at another rate than such sinners do, v. 8. The apostle calls their former condition darkness, in the abstract, to express the great darkness they were in. They lived wicked and profane lives, being destitute of the light of instruction without, and of the illumination and grace of the blessed Spirit within. A state of sin is a state of darkness. But the grace of God had produced a mighty change in their souls; Now are ye light in the Lord, savingly enlightened, by the Word and Spirit of God. Children of light, according to the Hebrew dialect, are those who are in a state of light, endued with knowledge and holiness. 'Now, being such, let your conversation be suitable to your condition and privileges, v. 10. examining and searching diligently what God has revealed to be his will; and making it appear that ye approve it by conforming yourselves to it.' Observe, We must not only dread and avoid what is displeasing to God, but inquire and consider what will be acceptable to Him; searching the Scriptures with this view; thus keeping at the greatest distance from these sins.

II. He prescribes some remedies.

1. We must bring forth the fruit of the Spirit, v. 9. This is expected from the children of light; that, being illuminated, they be also sanctified by the Spirit, and thereupon bring forth his fruit, which is in all goodness, an inclination to do good and to show mercy; and righteousness, which signifies justice in our dealings: or, more generally, all religion is goodness and righteousness. And in, and with, these must be truth, sincerity, and uprightness of heart.

2. We must have no fellowship with sin or sinners, v. 11. Sinful works are works of darkness; they come from the darkness of ignorance, they seek the darkness of concealment, and they lead to the darkness of hell. They are unfruitful; whatever profit is pretended, sin issues in the utter ruin and destruction of the impenitent sinner. We must therefore have no fellowship with these unfruitful works; not practise them ourselves, nor countenance them in others. If we share others' sin, we must expect to share their plagues. But we must rather reprove them; implying, that if we do not, we have fellowship with them. We must prudently, and in our places, witness against the sins of others, and especially by abounding in the contrary duties. One reason given, is, v. 12. they are so filthy and abominable, that it is a shame to mention them, except in a way of reproof; much more must it be a shame to have any fellowship with them. The things which are done of them in secret. The apostle seems to speak here of the Gentile idolaters, and of their horrid mysteries, which abounded with detestable wickedness, and which none were permitted to divulge, on pain of death. Observe, A good man is ashamed to speak that which many wicked people are not ashamed to act: but, as far as their wickedness appears, it should be reprov'd by good men. There follows another reason for such reproof, v. 13. The meaning of which may be; 'All those unfruitful works of darkness which ye are called on to reprove, are laid open, and made to appear in their proper colors to the sinners themselves, by the light of doctrine, or of God's Word in your mouths, as faithful reprovers; or by that instructive light which is diffused by the holiness of your lives, and by your exemplary walk.' Observe, the light of God's Word, and the exemplification of it in a Christian conversation, are proper means to convince sinners of their sin and wickedness. It follows, For whatsoever doth make manifest is light; i. e. it is the light that discovers what was concealed before in darkness; and accordingly it becomes those who are children of light, who are light in the Lord, to discover to others their sins, and to endeavor to convince them of the evil and danger of them, thus shining as lights in the world. The apostle further urges this duty from the example of God or Christ, v. 14. as if he had said, 'In doing this, you will copy after the great God, who has set Himself to awaken sinners from their sleep, and to raise them from the death of sin, that they might receive light from Christ.' He saith. The Lord is constantly saying in his Word what is more particularly expressed, Is. 60: 1.

(Note, 2: 1, 2.)—Indeed, 'vain words,' of various kinds, by which men deceive themselves and each other, might be adduced, did our limits permit. The common principles which prevail, in countries professing Christianity, among those who think themselves far removed from an antinomian perversion of evangelical truth, dictate 'vain words,' which deceive vast multitudes; while they consider Christians as under a remedial law, which does not require that strictness, which the holy moral law of God does, that faith compensates for failures even in this relaxed obedience, and that they may safely indulge in such things, under the Gospel, as they must not venture on, if they were 'under the law.'—A smattering of vain philosophy, also, united with these common notions, leads numbers to conclude, that God will not punish men for indulging their natural inclinations, however irregularly. Many popular writers, of late, have spoken of 'fornication,' and even the seduction of an unmarried woman, as no crime, or, merely as 'indulging the most amiable weakness of human nature!' In these, and in various other ways, ingenious men, and even philosophers, by 'moral essays,' (so called,) in modern times, deceive millions 'with vain words;' and, no doubt, the grand deceiver of mankind had prophets of a similar stamp in ancient days.—5) Whoremonger.] 1 Co. 5:9—11. 6:9. 1 Ti. 1:10. (6.) Deceive, &c.] 'It should appear (as Theoph. obs.), that some had suggested, that God issued heavy threatenings with respect to these comparatively light offences, but never meant to put them in execution. And I am the more ready to believe this, since I have known men, nay, even churchmen, of great ability and extensive learning, avow the same opinion. Where then is the wonder, that persons who, though converted, still retained the leaven of vain philosophy, should have so reasoned?' Bp. And since the human heart is still 'deceitful above all things,' where is the wonder, that hundreds of thousands at this day, in this land, should be brought to forget God's laws, under pretence of reverencing that love, which made those very laws, and maintain, that the soul that sinneth shall not die, and that the children of disobedience will, somehow, one day escape that wrath revealed from heaven against all unrighteousness of men? And that, too, because Christ died to support God's Law! Reader, let no man deceive you, by building for you so slender a parapet of vain words, upon the very edge of that precipice, which overhangs the bottomless abyss of God's and your enemies!

ED.

Vain.] 'I cannot agree with the recent comrs., who maintain, that Paul refers to those philosophers who thought there was nothing wrong in fornication, adultery, incest, sodomy, and egregious cheating. This is, I think, doing an injustice to the philosophers; who, whatever might be their practice, never held such opinions, except, perhaps, as to fornication, in young men. But the truth is, that the apostle has reference to Christians, who wavered between the Gospel and heathenism.' Bp. This, however, seems not to be the whole truth; for, as Dwight remarks, after Lardner, on the heretic subtleties Paul was obliged again and again to combat, 'Heretics were, in the general, men of a curious and inquisitive turn of mind, and greatly indulged this disposition, which led them to speculate on many points of doctrine. . . . When the Scriptures were in some cases inconsistent with their notions, they were for making them yield to their philosophical opinions. Thus the simplicity of truth was banished, and endless divisions arose.' Tertullian, also, says, 'that heresies are derived from philosophy; and that secular wisdom is a rash (or fool hardy) interpreter of the divine nature, and disposition.' These observations (adds Dr. D.) 'are, with equal force and justice, applicable to heresies of modern days, [see note, above,] and those of the ancients; and few of either will be found to have arisen from any other source beside a philosophy, too proud, or too knowing, to submit implicitly to the testimony of God.' *Theol. V. 8. Ye were darkness, &c.] What then is that 'light of nature,' of which some speak as sufficient, without the Gospel, to lead the Gentiles to heaven?—Surely, this one text ought for ever to silence the vain speculations of those, who, arguing from figurative expressions, concerning the state of sinners as asleep, nay, 'dead in sin,' not only object to, but absolutely condemn, as heresy, the most scriptural addresses and calls on them to repent and turn to God, and believe in Christ, and seek salvation!

Or, Christ, by his ministers, who preach the everlasting Gospel, is continually calling on sinners to this effect; Awake, thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead. The same thing in the main is designed by these different expressions; and they serve to remind us of the great stupidity and the wretched security of sinners; how insensible they are of their danger, and how unapt they naturally are to spiritual motions, sensations, and actions. When God calls on them to awake, and to arise, his meaning is, that they would break off their sins by repentance, and enter on a course of holy obedience; and He encourages them to do their utmost that way, by that gracious promise; And Christ shall give thee light; or, Christ shall enlighten thee, or, shall shine upon thee. He shall bring thee into a state of knowledge, holiness, and comfort; assisting thee with <sup>z</sup>is grace, and refreshing thy mind with joy and peace here, and rewarding thee with eternal glory at length.' Observe, When we are endeavoring to convince sinners, and to reform them from their sins, we are imitating God and Christ, in that which is their great design throughout the Gospel. Some, indeed, understand this as a call to sinners and to saints: to sinners, to repent and turn; to saints, to stir up themselves to their duty. The former must arise from their spiritual death; and the other must awake from their spiritual deadness.

3. Another remedy against sin, is, circumspection, care, and caution, v. 15. This may be understood, either with respect to what immediately precedes; or else, we have here another remedy, or rather preservative from the before-mentioned sins; and this I take to be the design of the apostle; it being impossible to maintain purity and holiness of heart and life without great circumspection and care. Walk circumspectly; or, as the word signifies, accurately, exactly, in the right way: in order to which, we must be frequently consulting our rule, and the directions we have in the sacred oracles. Not as fools, who walk at all adventures, and who have no understanding of their duty, or of the worth of their souls; and through neglect, supineness, and want of care, fall into sin, and destroy themselves: but as wise; as persons taught of God, and endued with wisdom from above. Circumspect walking is the effect of true wisdom; but the contrary of folly. It follows, redeeming the time, v. 16. literally, buying the opportunity. It is a metaphor taken from merchants and traders, who diligently observe and improve the seasons for merchandise and trade. It is a great part of Christian wisdom to redeem the time. Our time is a talent given us by God for some good end, and it is misspent and lost when it is not employed according to his design. If we have lost our time heretofore, we must endeavor to redeem it, by doubling our diligence in doing our duty for the future. The reason given, is, because the days are evil: either by reason of the wickedness of those who dwell in them; or, rather, 'as they are troublesome and dangerous times to you who live in them.' Those were times of persecution wherein the apostle wrote this: the Christians were in jeopardy every hour. When the days are evil, we have one superadded argument to redeem time; especially, because we know not how soon they may be worse. People are very apt to complain of bad times; it were well if that would stir them up to redeem time. 'Wherefore,' says the apostle, v. 17. 'because of the badness of the times, be ye not unwise, ignorant of your duty, and negligent about your souls; but understanding what the will of the Lord is. Study, consider, and further acquaint yourselves with, the will of God, as determining your duty.' Observe, Ignorance of our duty, and neglect of our souls, are evidences of the greatest folly; while an acquaintance with the will of God, and a care to comply with it, bespeak the best and truest wisdom.

The three following vs. warn against some other particular sins, and urge some other duties.

(1.) The sin of drunkenness, v. 18. a sin very frequent among the heathens, particularly on occasion of the festivals of their gods, and more especially in their Bacchanalia: when all manner of inordinate lusts were consequent upon it; therefore the apostle adds, wherein, or in which drunkenness, is excess. The word may signify luxury or dissoluteness; and certainly drunkenness is no friend to chastity, and purity of life; but it virtually contains all manner of extravagance, and [by exciting the neighboring propensities] transports men into gross sensuality, [violence,] and other vile enormities. Note, Drunkenness is a sin that seldom goes alone, is very provoking to God, and a great hindrance to the spiritual life. The apostle may design all such intemperance and disorder as are opposite to the sober and prudent demeanor he intends in his advice, to redeem the time.

(2.) Instead of being filled with wine, he exhorts them to be filled with the Spirit. The meaning is, that men should labor for a plentiful measure of the graces of the Spirit,

PRACT. OBS. V. 1-14. Wicked men follow the example of 'their father the devil,' and may be known as his progeny. Jn. 8:41-47. 1 Jn. 3:7-10. Surely, then, the 'beloved children of God' should imitate his holiness, and ought especially to walk in love with their brethren and their neighbors, and even with their enemies, 'as Christ hath loved them.' The perfection and obligations of this example are infinite: so that there is no kind or degree of self-denying, liberal, laborious, patient, or forgiving love, to which it will not direct and animate the grateful believer.—We should always keep in mind our character as Christians, and inquire, whether this or the other part of our conduct 'becometh saints,' the redeemed, sanctified, and devoted worshippers of God. Our social intercourse ought to be conducted entirely in subserviency to mutual improvement; which will best be promoted by declaring the loving-kindness of the Lord, and celebrating his praises.—The holy converse and conduct of a consistent Christian is of the nature of light: it manifests that the contrary conduct of others is inexcusable; and his very silence is often most emphatically eloquent and convincing. After the example therefore of prophets and apostles, we should call on those, who are 'asleep and dead' in sin, to 'awake and arise, that Christ may give them light;' and the Lord will employ such [living] warnings and invitations to 'quicken' with divine life some or many of the ignorant, the careless, the self-satisfied among our hearers, and so guide them into the ways of peace and salvation, even as He uses the further instructions of his ministers, to guide the converted in the paths of holy and joyful obedience. Is. 42:13-17. SCOTT.

V. 13. Bl. suggests, that Paul alluded to Mat. 5:14. as that Gospel was published long before; whether, with Owen, Townson, Tomline, Horne, we date it in 37 or 33; or, with others, in 41, 43, or 43. Ed.

V. 14. 'The ancients and most moderns think P. quotes Is. 60:1-3. (which is clearly alluded to in "Christ shall give thee light;"') or 26: 19. (to which awake, arise from the dead, may allude); or to both passages. Surenhusius fixes on Is. 40:1, 2. See his masterly work on the quotations from the O. in the N. T., upon which subject the two Vitrinas, and Owen, deserve to be consulted. BLOOMF.

V. 16. 'Few passages have more exercised comtrs., on few are opinions more various. Some ancient comtrs., and Grot., Ham., Whit., Locke, Mackn., expl. "using all prudent means to prolong your lives, because the days in which you live are evil, and therefore perilous, and such as will require much wisdom to preserve you from dangers." I. e. of the caution to be observed in avoiding persecution, that so they might draw out their time, as long as possibly they could, and not provoke their enemies to cut them off. Comp. Dan. 2:8. See Whit. "This," Doddr. adds, "was certainly their duty, and it had been well if the zeal of some primitive Christians had regarded the precept in this sense. But it expresses only part of that Christian diligence and prudence Paul directs and exhorts to." I could add to their examples of this sense of the Gr., but, though it seems countenanced by Col. 4:5. I cannot reconcile it with the context, which demands the sense (given by the ancient and many recent comtrs., as Ros., Kop., Slade), "using the opportunity we have, of living holily, righteously, and godly, in this present time, though it be evil and wicked, and this be especially arduous, on account of the peculiar trials under which we labor, from the temptations and persecutions to which we are exposed." I think, too, with Doddr., that there is also allusion to the time lost in heathen life." Id.

V. 18. Drunk.] 'A vice the Greeks, both Asiatic and European, were proverbial for: whence the phrase to Grecise, i. e. to get drunk.' See Bl. Ed.—'Probably there is allusion to those dissolute ceremonies [398] called the Bacchanalia, in honor of the god of wine. While they continued, men and women made it a point of religion to intoxicate themselves, and ran about the streets, fields, and vineyards, singing and shouting, in a wild and tumultuous manner; in opposition to which extravagant vociferations, the use of devout psalmody is with great propriety recommended. Plato somewhere tells us, that there was hardly a sober person to be found in the whole Attican territories, during the continuance of these detestable solemnities.' DODDR.—'A multitude of persons, who are not accounted drunkards, create disease and shorten their days, by what they term "a prudent use of ardent spirit." Let it therefore be engraven upon the heart of every man, that THE DAILY USE OF ARDENT SPIRIT, IN ANY FORM, OR DEGREE, IS INTEMPERANCE. Its effects are certain, and deeply injurious, though its results may be slow, and never ascribed to the real cause. This war upon the human constitution,—like the letting out of waters, by little and little, the breach widens, till life itself is poured out. If all the diseases which terminate in death, could speak out at the grave, or tell their origin on the coffin lid, we should witness the most appalling disclosures. Happy the man who shortens not his days, by what he may call "the prudent use of ardent spirit." DR. BECHER.

V. 19. 'Adverting (according to his custom) to the opposite vice, while he is inculcating any virtue, Paul means to admonish them, when, in society, they feel themselves elevated beyond ordinary conversation to give vent to this cheerfulness, not (as did the heathens) in dissolute scolia, or drinking catches, and such incentives to vice; but in reciting aloud to each other psalms, hymns, and spiritual songs; or, when inclination and opportunity served, singing and playing on musical instruments, to such psalms, &c., in a heartfelt manner, to the honor of God. The verse has been strangely misunderstood.' BLOOMF.

Speaking.] 'Thought, by Koppe, synonymous with singing; I rather think it refers to the words being always recited (which would equally promote mutual edification, Col. 3:16.) by some, previously to being songs, <sup>z</sup> singing and making melody in your <sup>a</sup> heart to the Lord;

20 Giving thanks <sup>b</sup> always for all things unto God and the Father in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ;

21 Submitting yourselves one to another in the fear of God.

22 <sup>c</sup> Wives, submit yourselves unto your own husbands, as unto the Lord.

23 For the husband is the head of the wife, even as Christ is the head of the church: and he is the Savior of the body.

24 Therefore as the church is subject unto Christ, so let the wives be to their own husbands in every thing.

25 Husbands, love your wives, even as Christ also loved the church, and gave himself for it;

26 That he might sanctify and cleanse it with the washing <sup>d</sup> of water by the word:

27 That he might present <sup>e</sup> it to himself a glorious church, not having <sup>f</sup> spot, or wrinkle, or any such thing; but that it should be holy and without blemish.

that would fill their souls with holy joy, strength, and courage; which things sensual men expect their wine should inspire them with. Now, by this mean, being filled with the Spirit, we shall come to understand what the will of the Lord is; for the Spirit of God is given as a Spirit of wisdom and of understanding. And because those who are filled with the Spirit will be carried out in acts of devotion, and all the proper expressions of it, therefore the apostle exhorts,

(3.) To sing unto the Lord, v. 19. The Christian's joy should express itself in songs of praise. In these, Christians should speaking to themselves in their assemblies and sung. Psalms.] Psalmoi: not simply David's, for then the article would have been used. Kop. understands, any carmina. The truth may lie between. It should seem they chiefly consisted of David's, the thym, but certainly comprehended other compositions, also, adapted (as they were) to instruments and voices, i. e. consisting of compositions in parts, accompaniments, &c. (as our verse anthems and instrumental anthems. 1 Cor. 14:26. See Burney's Music. Dict.) Of course, this included the antiphonia, or singing alternatim, as in cathedral services; which Bp. Bull thinks is denoted, by the speaking to or with yourselves. And, but for Col. 3:16. I should agree with him. That the psalmoi were thus performed, is also shown by a passage of Pliny, in his letter to Trajan, "Carmen quod Christo quasi Deo dicere secum invicem," [one to the other.] Hymns.] Hymnoi: probably, plainer compositions, (chiefly in praise of God,) both in words and set to music, and perhaps in one part (called homophonia) without instrumental accompaniments (so Justin says the Christians of his time sung). Some think, these were extemporaneous; but of this there is no proof, nor is it probable. That seems rather to apply to the songs; Odoi: which (and so the ancient and best modern contrs.) must signify, not merely religious, or spiritual and edifying, in opposition to the carnal and impure songs at the heathen festivals, &c. like the scolia, but suggested by the Holy Spirit. So Zanchy and Ham. These, perhaps, were sung by the person alone, like our solo anthems. Probably, too, (from Col. 3:16.) they were sometimes recited; and if so, the spiritual songs would be something like the strains of the Italian Improvisatore, in that sort of composition, half poetry, half prose, so characteristic of the oriental style; such are those of Elizabeth, Mary, and Zecharias, Lu. 1. None, probably, but those who had the spiritual charisma [gift] were allowed to sing: and the subjects were perhaps more diversified than those of the hymns and psalms; containing not only the praises of God, but (as Zanchy) exhortations, doctrines, prophecies, and, indeed, all religious subjects whatsoever. [May poetry and song one day be fully restored to their legitimate use, the beautiful and elevated expression of the best thoughts, and the best affections, in the best manner! En.]—There is no reason why the same routine should not be adopted also in public worship, and 1 Cor. 12:13, 14. renders it highly probable that it was, while this is placed beyond a doubt, by the passage of Tertullian: ut quisque, de Scripturis sanctis, (which must mean the Ps.) vel de proprio ingenio (which must refer to the odoi), potest, provocator in medium Deo canere. V. 20. All.] 'For his sparing mercies, Ps. 103:3, 4. his preventing mercies, Eph. 1:4. Ti. 1:2. his distinguishing and peculiar mercies, He. 2:16. for his common mercies and benefits daily bestowed, as well as his extraordinary favors; for past mercies, to be celebrated by annual festivals, Ex. 12:14, 17, 24. meetings together, for mutual edification. By psalms may be meant David's psalms, or such composes as were fitly sung with musical instruments; by hymns, such others as were confined to matter of praise, as those of Zacharias, Simeon, &c. Spiritual songs may contain a greater variety of matter, doctrinal, prophetic, historical, &c. Observe, here, Singing of psalms and hymns is a gospel-ordinance: an ordinance of God, and appointed for his glory. Though Christianity is an enemy to profane mirth, yet it encourages joy and gladness, and the proper expressions of these in the professors of it.

(4.) Thanksgiving is another duty the apostle exhorts to, v. 20. We are not always singing, but we should be always giving thanks; we should never want a disposition for this duty, as we never want matter for it. We should give thanks for all things; not only for spiritual blessings enjoyed, and eternal ones expected; but for temporal mercies, too: not only for our comforts, but also for our sanctified afflictions; not only for what immediately concerns ourselves, but for the instances of God's kindness and favor to others also. It is our duty in everything to give thanks unto God and the Father; to God as the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, and our Father in Him; in whose name we are to offer up all our prayers and praises, and spiritual services, that they may be acceptable to God.

V. 21—33. Here the apostle begins his exhortation to the discharge of relative duties. As a general foundation for these, he lays down that rule, v. 21. Christians owe a mutual submission one to another, of which Paul was an example, who became all things to all men; and where there is this mutual condescension and submission, the duties of all relations will be the better performed. From v. 22. to the end, he speaks of the duties of husbands and wives; and he speaks of these in a Christian manner, setting the church as an example of the wife's subjection, and Christ as an example of love in husbands.

1. The duty prescribed to wives, is, submission to their husbands in the Lord, v. 22. which submission includes the honoring and the obeying them, and that from a principle of love to them, and in compliance with God's authority, who has commanded it, which is doing it as unto the Lord. Or, it may be understood by way of similitude and likeness; that the sense may be, 'as, being devoted to God, you submit yourselves to Him.' The apostle assigns the reason of this submission, v. 23. The metaphor is taken from the head in the natural body, which, being the seat of reason, and the fountain of sense and motion, is more excellent than the rest of the body. God has given the man the pre-eminence, and a right to direct and govern by creation, and in that original law of the relation, Thy desire shall be to thy husband, and he shall rule over thee. Whatever there is of uneasiness, in that, it is an effect of sin coming into the world. Generally, too, the man has, (what he ought to have,) a superiority in wisdom and knowledge. He is, therefore, the head; even as Christ is the Head of the Church. There is a resemblance of Christ's authority over the church, in that superiority and headship which God has appointed to the husband. The apostle adds, and He is the Savior of the body. Christ's authority is exercised over the church for the saving her from evil, and the supplying her with everything good for her. In like manner should the husband be employed for the protection and comfort of his spouse; and therefore, she should the more cheerfully subject herself to him. So it follows, Therefore as the church is subject unto Christ, v. 24. with cheerfulness, with fidelity, with humility, so let the wives be to their own husbands in everything; everything lawful, and consistent with duty to God.

2. The duty of husbands, on the other hand, is, to love their wives, v. 25. for without this they would abuse their superiority and headship: and wherever this prevails as it ought to do, it will infer the other duties of the relation; it being a special and peculiar affection that is required in her behalf. The love of Christ to the church is proposed as an example of this; which love of his is a sincere, a pure, an ardent, and a constant affection; and that, notwithstanding the imperfections and failures she is guilty of. While such exemplars are offered to both, and so much required of each, neither has for adverse as well as prosperous events, blessing Him who doth thus give us warning, Ps. 16:7. but chiefly for spiritual blessings. WHTBY. God and, &c.] Doddr. better tr. 'God, even the Father.' Ed.

V. 21. Submit.] 22, 24. 1:22. Lu. 2:51. See on Ro. 8:7. The kind and compliant conduct of the superior relations may be enjoined in an indirect way, but it cannot be directly meant by this word. Ex. 20:12. Sc.

(21.) 'Paul inculcates the order and subordination with which even private religious exercises, as well as public, should be conducted.' BL.

V. 22. 'Paul begins with the lower relations, for the duties of inferiors are commonly most apt to be objected to, as what are thought most difficult to be complied with; and where these are well and faithfully performed, the correspondent duties of superiors will be more readily attended to, and more effectually secured.' Doddr. Besides, inferiors are, in all communities, by far the most numerous class; and further, 'not many' great ones of the earth were then 'called.' Ed.

V. 23. 'The terms in the Greek and Latin, anēr and vir, neither very significant, seem to derive their application from the Heb. aysh, a man; though that language to express husband has another term, baī, which signifies master. So the German che-ueiber, a high man. The Germ. weifer, English, wife, probably signifies no more than woman, by way of eminence, like the Greek gunē; or perhaps it comes from weiber, to unite, conjoin, like the Latin maritus and marita. I know no term, in any language, so significant, or so expressive of the duties annexed to that state, as our husband, i. e. the house-band, or bond of the family.' BL.

V. 25. 'This love (as Ros. obs.) comprises every kind of care for the safety and welfare of the wife; and, in the case of Christ, as respects the church. It, however, imports something more, namely, an affectionate demeanor, and a magnanimous indulgence to the frailties of the weaker sex. So Theoph.' BL. Note, Mk. 10:6—9. En.

V. 26. Washing.] 'From original sin, Ac. 2:38. Elsner and Doddr., not improbably, think the terms allude to the custom, Esth. 2:3. 9:12. Ez. 10:7—14.' BL.

V. 27. 'In this description,' says Mackn., 'may not the perfections of the bodies of the saints be included, as well as the perfection of their minds?' Spot, &c.] 'How bright an idea does this give us of the grand plan and design of Christianity, to bring all the millions of which the church consists to such a state of perfect virtue and glory, that, when the penetrating eye of Christ, its great and holy Bridegroom, shall survey it, there shall not be one spot or wrinkle, or anything like it, in the least to impair its beauty or offend his sight! Where is such a scheme or thought to be found in the world, but in the New Testament, and those who have been taught by it?' Doddr. God grant the writer and reader to share this glorious consummation! Ed.

28 So ought men to love their wives as their own bodies; he that loveth his wife loveth himself.

29 For no man ever yet hated his own flesh; but nourisheth and cherisheth it; even as the Lord the church:

30 For we are members of his body, of his flesh, and of his bones.

31 For this cause shall a man leave his father and mother, and shall be joined unto his wife, and they two shall be one flesh.

32 This is a great mystery: but I speak concerning Christ and the church.

33 Nevertheless, let every one of you in particular, so love his wife even as himself; and the wife see that she reverence her husband.

g 1 Co. 12:27. h Ge. 2:24. i 1 Co. 6:16.

reason to complain of the divine injunctions. The love God requires from the husband in behalf of his wife, will make an amends for the subjection He demands from her to her husband: and the prescribed subjection of the wife, will be an abundant return for that love of the husband which God has made her due.

The apostle, having mentioned Christ's love to the church, enlarges upon it; assigning the reason why He gave Himself for it, That He might sanctify it in this world, and glorify it in the next, v. 26, 27. The instrumental means whereby this is effected, PRACT. OBS. V. 15—33. By the light of divine truth we should walk with accuracy and 'circumspection'; 'redeeming our time' from sloth, needless sleep or recreation, and impertinent visits, for useful and important purposes; because life, health, liberty, and the use of our senses and understandings, are at all times uncertain. The world also is full of misery and iniquity; and there is 'no work nor counsel... in the grave, whither we are going.' Let us then acquaint ourselves with the will of our Lord, attend to his work, and wait for his coming.—'filled with the Spirit.' Thus we shall be animated to 'speak to each other in psalms, and hymns, and spiritual songs;' instead of those vain songs, in praise of war, sensual love, hunting, drinking, and such like, which are in use among men called Christians, just as odes to Mars, Venus, Bacchus, or Diana were among the Gentiles. Let us at least, with the melody of a grateful heart, 'give thanks always, for all things, to our God and Father, in the name of his beloved Son: and thus we shall anticipate the joys of heaven, in the communion of the saints on earth.—If we all were 'subject one to another in the fear of God,' and according to our several relations in life, society would appear like a well organized body, and every individual would share the advantages.

V. 28—31. The apostle, having described in the most affecting manner 'the love of Christ to his church,' and the subjection of the church to his authority, here shows, that men ought to love their wives with a wise, holy, constant, and tender affection, in conformity to that perfect pattern: in everything seeking their comfort and advantage, sympathizing in their sorrows, bearing with their infirmities, and endeavoring to promote their salvation and sanctification.—What an affecting view does this give of Christ's love to his people! 'He loves, and nourishes, and cherishes them,' as a man does his own body! SCOTT.

(28.) 'Sunt enim conjuges unum quid per individuum vite societatem. The wife is the other part of the homo [man], who consists of man and woman. So they say, a man without a wife is only a semi-homo, or a man halved.' See Drusius, Cleanse. 'The husband's true love leads him also to cleanse his wife, i. e. to form her mind, and assist her progress in virtue, thus promoting his own happiness too in the best manner.' MACKN.

(30.) 'We are represented as related by blood to Christ, because He assumed our human nature, and was in all respects made like as we are, only without sin. Heb. 2:14.' Ros. See Bp. Horne, Serms. Ep.

V. 32, 33. It is obvious, that there must, in all cases, be manifold defects and failures on both sides, in the present state of human nature; and often grievous offences may be committed: yet this does not materially alter the duty of the injured party, except in some cases elsewhere provided for.—It is observable, that the apostle says, 'let every one love his wife,' not wives; so that polygamy is not even supposed by the exhortation to exist among Christians.—(32) Mystery. The Vulgate, or old Latin version, exclusively used by the church of Rome, renders this, sacrament; which is the only scriptural reason, or shadow of reason, for the absurdity of numbering marriage among the sacraments; even while that church considers the married state inconsistent with high attainments in holiness, forbids its priests to marry, and discourages marriage in various other ways!—Many have enlarged on this mystery, namely, the appointment of marriage in the garden of Eden, as a type or emblem of Christ and his church; for so they understand it. The following quotation gives the substance of ancient and modern expositions of the passage, in this particular.—'Adam, in whom the whole human race began, was a natural image of Christ, in whom the human race was to be restored: and his deep sleep, the opening of his side, and the formation of Eve of a rib taken out of his side, were fit emblems of

are, the instituted sacraments, particularly the washing of baptism, and the preaching and reception of the Gospel. And that He might present it to Himself, &c. v. 27. Dr. Lightfoot thinks, the apostle alludes here to the Jews' extraordinary care in their washings for purification, that there should be no wrinkle to keep the flesh from the water, and no spot or dirt not thoroughly washed. Others understand him as alluding to a garment come new out of the fuller's hand, purged from spots, stretched from wrinkles. That He might present it to Himself, that He might perfectly unite to Himself in the great day, a glorious church, perfect in knowledge and in holiness, not having spot or wrinkle, or any such thing; nothing of deformity or defilement remaining, but entirely amiable and pleasing in his eye; holy, and without blemish, free from the least remains of sin. The church in general, and particular believers, will not be without spot or wrinkle till they come to glory. From this and the former v. together, we may notice, that the glorifying of the church is intended in the sanctifying of it: and that those, and those only, who are sanctified now, shall be glorified hereafter. So ought men to love their wives as their own bodies, &c. v. 28. The wife being civilly, relatively, [and spiritually,] made one with her husband, this is an argument why he should love her as cordially and ardently as he loves himself. For no man ever yet hated his own flesh, v. 29. however deformed, or whatever his imperfections might be: so far from it, that he uses himself with the greatest care and tenderness; and is industrious to supply himself with every convenience, &c. even as the Lord the church: as the Lord nourishes and cherishes the church, which He furnishes with all things He sees needful or good for her, with whatever conduces to her everlasting happiness and welfare. The apostle adds, For we are members of his body, of his flesh, and of his bones, v. 30. He assigns this as a reason why Christ nourishes and cherishes his church,—because all who belong to it, are members of his mystical body. Or, we are members out of his body: all the grace and glory the church has, are from Christ; as Eve was taken out of the man. But (as one observes) it being the manner of the sacred writings to express a complex body of the enumeration of its several parts; as the heaven and earth for the world; evening and morning, for the natural day; so here, by body, flesh, and bones, we are to understand Himself; the meaning of the verse being, that we are members of Christ. For this cause, because they are one, as Christ and his church are one, shall a man leave his father and mother; the apostle refers to the words of Adam, when Eve was given to him for a meet-help, Ge. 2: 24. We are to understand by them, only, that this relation is to be preferred to all others; there being a nearer union between these two, than between any others; that the man must rather leave any of his relatives than his wife. And they two shall be one flesh, i. e. by virtue of the matrimonial bond. This is a great mystery, v. 32. Those words of Adam, just mentioned by the apostle, are spoken literally of marriage; but they have also a hidden, mystical sense in them, relating to the union between Christ and his church, of which the conjugal union between Adam and the

—Every relative duty should be enforced by evangelical motives and examples.—The most entire submission of wives to their own husbands will be no infringement of their liberty, if performed 'for the Lord's sake;' and after the example of the church's obedience to Him: especially if 'husbands also love their wives,' after the pattern of Christ's love to his chosen people. He died for them, 'that He might sanctify and cleanse them,' to be to Him for an honor and praise to all eternity, and that He might be glorious in making them happy. While we adore and rejoice in this condescending love, and press forward to that perfect holiness which is intended for us; and while we reverence both the mystery of this sacred union with the Lord, and his loving authority over us, let husbands hence learn how to love their wives, and wives hence learn to obey and 'reverence their husbands.' If the original appointment of marriage, and the subject before us, were duly attended to, all harshness, tyranny, and unfaithfulness must be excluded. In short, were Christianity general, and Christians more attentive to the precepts of their Lord; harmony and affectionate confidence would sweeten domestic life, without any material interruption or alloy, [and happy families would expand into happy nations, and a happy world.] SCOTT.

Christ's death, of the opening of his side on the cross, and of the regeneration of believers by his death. The love which Adam expressed towards Eve, and his union with her by marriage, were lively emblems of Christ's love to believers, and of his eternal union with them in one society after the resurrection. And Eve herself, who was formed of a rib taken from Adam's side, was a natural image of believers, who are regenerated, both in their body and mind, by the breaking of Christ's side on the cross... These circumstances... we may suppose... to prefigure that great event; and by prefiguring it, to show that it was decreed of God from the beginning.' MACKN.—The mystery, in reality is, that He, 'who is God over all, blessed for evermore,' should, from most free love of Adam's fallen race, become Man, Emmanuel, and thus 'purchase the church with his own blood;' and should love this church of redeemed sinners, with a love immensely exceeding that of the most endeared relations among men. SCOTT.

(32.) Mystery. 'This union of Adam and Eve, as relating to Christ and his church, is a great mystery, containing important truths and illustrations, for ages [and still] imperfectly understood.' SLADE.

'The mystery certainly was, that the eternal Son of God, receiving the degenerate race of men into an union with Himself, should have loved them with an affection exceeding that to be found among the most intimate human relations. This sublime doctrine had long been concealed, and cannot now be perfectly comprehended; and therefore may, with the greatest propriety, be called a mystery, in every sense of the word.' DODDR.

'On the shameful blunder of the Vulg. translator solely, (in tr. musterion here, by sacramentum.) do the Romanists found their doctrine of marriage being a sacrament. Valpy obs., that sacramentum was long used very indefinitely by ecclesiastical writers; it came at length to acquire a meaning more precise and fixed.' BL.

'Dr. Allen, in Whitby, says, it was a Jewish notion, that the union of Adam was a type of that between the Messiah and his church. Thus, the Jews say, (so Voisin.) and the mystery of Adam is the mystery of the Messiah, who is the Bridegroom of the church. These two writers therefore, says Whitby, confirm the remark of Munster, "That the creation of the woman from the rib of the man, was made by the Jews to signify the marriage of the celestial man who is blessed, or of the Messiah, with the church;" whence Paul applies the very words Adam said of Eve, to those Christians who are the Spouse of Christ, v. 30.' ## CHAP. VI.

mother of us all, was a type: though not instituted or appointed by God to signify this, yet it was a kind of natural type, as having a resemblance to it; I speak concerning Christ and the church.

After this, the apostle concludes this part of his discourse with a brief summary of the duty of husbands and wives, v. 33. 'Nevertheless; though there be such a secret, mystical sense, yet the plain, literal sense concerns you. Let every one of you in particular so love his wife even as himself, with such a sincere, peculiar, singular, and prevailing

NOTES. CHAP. VI. V. 1—4. The apostle next exhorts believers, who had parents living, to be obedient to them, 'in the Lord,' for his sake, from gratitude to Him, in obedience to his commands, and for the honor of his Gospel. Col. 3:16, 17, v. 16. The Lord Jesus seems especially intended. This general exhortation must be limited, according to the ages and particular circumstances of children. Some, it is probable, had Gentile parents, and they ought not to obey them, when their commands contradicted those of Christ; yet, it would be peculiarly incumbent on them, to give up their own will in all things lawful, for the credit of Christianity. The obedience of children to their parents, thus limited, is in itself 'right,' equitable, and reasonable, a debt due to the instruments of their existence, and the tender guardians of their infancy, and generally conducive to their good. Indeed, the sentiments of all nations coincide in this, and the law of God expressly commands children 'to honor' the persons and authority of both father and mother, and to requite their kindness as they have opportunity and ability. This was placed in the decalogue, as 'the first commandment' of the second table, being the first of the relative duties, and the source of all the others. Indeed, it has been observed, in every age, that those who have distinguished themselves by filial obedience were remarkably prospered. Gen. 9:20—23. Ex. 20:12. Lev. 19:3. Prov. 1:8. Mat. 15:3—6—The apostle also exhorted parents (for though fathers only are mentioned, doubtless mothers also were intended) to use their authority without rigor, lest their children should be discouraged; prejudiced against Christianity, or provoked to obstinacy and disobedience, which would always prove painful to the parents, and often ruinous to the children. Ex. 21:15—17. P. O. 12—36. De. 21:18—21. Prov. 29:17. 30:17. The restraints, reproofs, and corrections of parents, ought, therefore, always to be used in a meek, affectionate, and forgiving disposition; while they diligently educate their children in such a manner, and with such instructions, as may best initiate them in the knowledge of Christ and true religion, and give them such friendly admonitions, as may guard them against the various snares of the world, and the temptations of Satan. Prov. 13:24. Col. 3:20, 21.—In these exhortations the inferior relation is constantly mentioned first; perhaps because the duty of it is most contrary to corrupt nature; yet it ought to be attended to, even when the superiors neglect theirs.—'Instruct them in the principles of piety towards God, and faith in our Lord Jesus Christ. . . . Make them to read the Scriptures, says Theophylact, which is the duty of all Christians; for is it not a shame to instruct them in heathen authors, whence they may learn bad things, and not to instruct them in the oracles of God?' Whitby. This is an important remark; but immensely more is required, in catechizing and otherwise instructing children, in reproof, mild correction, example, conversation, watchfulness against everything in word or deed unbecoming in their presence, seizing every opportunity of drawing their attention to the great truths and duties of religion, and illustrating the effects of wickedness, the love of God, and the state of the world. Indeed, immensely more than can be even hinted at in a note, is implied in this brief exhortation. SCOTT.

(2, 3.) With promise. See Bloomf. or Dodd. The feelings awakened towards parents are those due in a higher degree to God, and promote such. The experience, too, of parents, if thoroughly educated for God, intellectually, morally, and physically, could give such lessons to obedient children as would preserve them, in obedience to God's natural laws, from excess of any kind, and so secure to them long life; a nation, also, of such parents and children, thus educated to reverence the paternal authority of its lawgivers and laws, would be united and invincible, and so long-lived in their land. Thus the text may be taken in its broadest sense, of all the blessings, temporal and eternal, which flow from the proper use of the family relation: indeed, 'more is implied in the religious obligations involved in the family tie, than is ordinarily recognized.' See the 'Family at Home,' republished by G. D. Abbot, in 1834.

'The principle of devoted obedience to the parent has been a most imperative rule of conduct; one against which no appeal has been dreamed of, from the foundation of its monarchy, probably by a grandson of Noah, in that singular community the Chinese family; comprising by very far the most populous empire and people existing. Its political government turns entirely on the duties of fathers toward their children, and of children towards their fathers; and as the highest functions and authority are concentrated in the emperor, who calls himself the great father, and the son of heaven, [for, says Baines, 'God is the Father of all fatherhoods,'] and whom the Chinese call sometimes the father, affection as that is which he bears to himself. And the wife see that she reverence her husband.' Reverence consists of love and esteem, which produce a care to please; and of fear, which awakens a caution lest just offence be given. That the wife thus reverence her husband, is the will of God, and the law of the relation.

CHAP. VI. V. 1—9. Here we have further directions concerning relative duties, in which the apostle is very particular.

I. The duty of children to their parents, v. 1. Parents being the instruments of the being of their children, God and nature has given them an authority to command them, in subserviency to God; and if children will be obedient to their pious parents, they will be in a fair way to be pious as they are. Some take in the Lord, as a limitation, and understand it thus, 'as far as is consistent with your duty to God.' We must not disobey our heavenly Father in obedience to earthly parents; for our obligation to God is prior and superior to all others. I take it rather as a reason: 'Children, obey your parents; for the Lord has commanded it: obey them therefore for the Lord's sake, and with an eye to Him.' Or and the mother of his people, they affirm, that he is not only the emperor to govern, and the pontiff to sacrifice, but is also the master of instruction. The governors of cities and provinces rule them respectively as their fathers, &c. All punishment, therefore, is inflicted as a fatherly chastisement; ruling as God does, by the affections, Mat. 6:9 which removes the feeling of disgrace, all objection to its being summary, and all questions as to its equality. Every officer of state, from the 9th degree up to the 4th, can punish his inferior with the bamboo, the traditional mode, Dent. 25:2. and the emperor thus corrects, when it seems good to him, his ministers, and the four higher classes. The vitality of this patriarchal principle has been put to the strongest test, by frequent rebellions, internal convulsions, and changes of dynasty, and twice by foreign conquest; but, the Chinese changing the unfatherly for paternal rulers, again and again, its simplicity and efficacy have triumphed to this day. Indeed, the stability, says Sir G. Staunton, "of the Chinese government, the few changes that have been made in its civil institutions, for such a number of ages [see Chron. tables, in Supplement], the vast extent of empire, and immense population, forming one society, guided by the same laws, [and written language,] and governed by the will of a single individual, offer the grandest collective object that can be presented for human contemplation or research;" [especially, now that the Gospel is at last, by the living voice, and translated Word, offering to its hundreds of millions] . . . Descended from a dutiful son of Noah, the ancestor of China migrated, before faith in the promise to filial obedience would have been staggered by the early prosperity of the race of Ham, upon which the malediction did not fully come for some centuries. . . Now, in the question of obedience or disobedience to this primeval law to reverence the parent, under which Ham was probably punished, nothing can be well imagined to do more honor to the perfect rule of God, than that mankind should, during ages and ages, see the blessings and the curses attached to this ordinance, in continued and uninterrupted operation; and we must be entirely assured that the almighty wisdom, in all justice, reason, and policy, will act upon the same principles of reward as well as of punishment, in the aggregate as individually, towards nations as towards men; and that blessings attached to the observance of the 5th commandment, which, being of the moral law, was unquestionably of the highest antiquity, would as certainly be granted to a state, which should make it its rule of conduct, as it would be to any one of its citizens. [Note, * p. 344. Vol. II.] And, indeed, the Almighty, in his wisdom and his mercy, appears to design to attach a very especial importance to the obedience of large bodies of men, and to give a value to acts which bear the character of national reverence of, and submission to Him, very far above any which we could presume them to possess. And if, in the reward of its filial piety, this nation has very long, and in great riches, and extraordinary numbers, enjoyed the land given to it, a beautiful illustration of the heavenly wisdom is afforded to us, because we see, that the conduct approved by God, necessarily carries with it, and works out, the blessing pronounced by Him as attached to it. The strength and simplicity of the principle of filial obedience, is admirably calculated to ensure permanency and stability to each family, and to each aggregation of families built upon it.

'Thus it is, that whilst we see Africa, the first ancestor of whose nations was accursed for irreverence to his father, bearing still the peculiar punishment attached to his crime, and a servant of servants, through that father's curse, ratified by the Almighty; we behold the Chinese nation, the fundamental principle of whose rule, laws, and policy, is, that of reverence to the parent, and was undoubtedly such from the very cradle of the monarchy, in a wonderful degree prolonging its days in the land which the Lord its God hath given it. In these opposite, predestined fortunes of the human race, placed at vast distances from each other, prevailing through thousands of years, we see perhaps one of the most beautiful, permanent, and instructive of God's dispensations existing on a gigantic scale, proportioned to the period of its duration' . . . Sir G. H. Rose, Script. Researches. Americans! may the example not be lost upon us!—'All the schools, and houses of reformation, in Prussia, do not cost the government as much as old England is obliged to expend in prisons and constables, for the regulation of that part of her population for which the government provides no schools but the hulks and the jails; and I leave it to any one to say, which arrangement produces the greatest amount of public happiness.'—Prof. Stowe; see his highly important Report to the government of Ohio, on Prussian public education.

4 And ye fathers, provoke not your children to wrath: but bring them up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord.

5 ° Servants, be obedient to them that are your masters according to the flesh, with fear and trembling, in singleness of your heart, as unto Christ;

6 Not with eye-service, as men-pleasers; but as the servants of Christ, doing the will of God from the heart;

7 With good-will doing service, as to the Lord, and not to men;

8 Knowing that whatsoever good thing any man doeth, the same shall he receive of the Lord, whether he be bond or free.

9 And ye masters, do the same things unto them, <sup>d</sup> forbearing threatening: knowing that <sup>e</sup> your Master also is in heaven; neither is there respect <sup>f</sup> of persons with him.

10 Finally, my brethren, be strong in the Lord, and in the power of his might.

c 1 Pe. 2:13, &c. d or, moderating. e Some read, both your and their. f Ro. 2:11.

no other after it that has, therefore it would be improper to say it is the first: but the meaning may be this, 'This is a prime or chief commandment, and it has a promise; it is the first commandment in the second table. The promise is, That it may be well with thee,' &c. v. 3. Observe, Whereas the promise in the commandment has reference to the land of Canaan, the apostle hereby shows, that that and other promises in the O. T. relating to the land of Canaan, are to be understood more generally. That you may not think that the Jews only were bound by the 5th commandment, he here gives it a further sense, That it may be well with thee, &c. Outward prosperity and long life are blessings promised to those who keep this commandment: ordinarily it is thus rewarded; and where it is not it is made up with something better. Observe, I. The Gospel has its temporal promises, as well as spiritual ones. 2. Although the authority of God be sufficient to engage us in our duty, yet we are allowed to have respect to the promised reward: and, 3. Though it contains some temporal advantage, even that may be considered as a motive and encouragement to our obedience.

II. The duty of parents, v. 4. I. 'Do not provoke your children to wrath.' Though God has given you power, you must not abuse that power; remembering that your children are, in a particular manner, pieces of yourselves, and therefore ought to be governed with great tenderness and love. Be not impatient with them; use no unreasonable severities, and lay no rigid injunctions on them. When you caution them, when you counsel them, when you reprove them, do it in such a manner as not to provoke them to wrath. In all such cases deal prudently and wisely with them, endeavoring to convince their judgments, and to work on their reason.' 2. 'Bring them up well; in the nurture and admonition of the Lord; in the discipline of proper and of compassionate correction; and in the knowledge of that duty which God requires of them, and by which they may become better acquainted with Him. Give them a good education. Let them have a religious education. Instruct them to fear <sup>g</sup> God; and inform them of, and excite them to, the whole of their duty toward God.'

III. The duty of servants; that also is summed up in one word, which is, obedience. He is largest on this article; as knowing there was the greatest need of it. These servants were generally slaves, and they may be the Lord's freemen, who are slaves to men, masters according to the flesh, v. 5. of the bodies, not of the souls and conscience. Now with respect to servants, he exhorts,

1. That they obey with fear and trembling. They are to reverence those who are over them; fearing to displease them, and trembling lest they should justly incur their anger and indignation.

2. That they be sincere in their obedience; in singleness of heart; not pretending obedience when they design disobedience, but serving them with faithfulness.

3. They should have an eye to Jesus Christ, in all their service, v. 5—7. doing service as to the Lord, and not to men; not to men only or principally. To have an eye to Christ, is to remember that He sees them, and is ever present with them; and that his authority obliges them to a faithful and conscientious discharge of the duties of their station.

4. They must not serve their masters with eye-service, v. 6. i. e. only when their masters' eye is on them; but be as conscientious in the discharge of their duty, when they are absent; because then their Master in heaven beholds them; therefore they must not act as men-pleasers; as though they had no regard to the pleasing of God, and approving themselves to Him, if they can impose on their masters. Observe, A steady regard to the Lord Jesus Christ will make men faithful and sincere in every station of life.

5. What they do they must do cheerfully; doing the will of God from the heart; serving their masters, as God wills they should, not grudgingly or by constraint, but from a principle of love to them and their concerns. This is doing it with good-will, v. 7. which will make their service easy to themselves, pleasing to their masters, and acceptable to the Lord Christ. There should be good-will to their masters; good-will to the families they are in; and especially a readiness to do their duty to God. Observe, Service, performed with conscience, and from a regard to God, though it be to unrighteous masters, will be accounted by Christ as service done to Himself.

6. Let faithful servants trust God for their wages, while they do their duty in his fear; Knowing that whatsoever good thing, v. 8. how poor and mean soever it may be, considered in itself, the same shall he receive of the Lord, i. e. (by a metonymy) the reward of the same. Though his master on earth should neglect or abuse him, instead of rewarding him, he shall certainly be rewarded by the Lord Christ; whether he be bond or free, whether he be a poor bond-servant, or a free man or master. Christ regards not these differences of men at present; nor will He in the great and final judgment. And what can be said more proper, both to engage and to encourage servants to their duty?

IV. The duty of masters, v. 9. they must act after the same manner. Observe, Masters are under as strict obligations to discharge their duty to their servants, as servants are to be obedient and dutiful to them. 'Forbearing threatening; moderating threatening, and remitting the evils you threaten them with. Remember that your servants are made of the same mould with yourselves, and therefore be not tyrannical and imperious over them, knowing that your Master also is in heaven:' some copies read, both your and their Master. He will call masters and servants to an impartial account for their conduct one to another; and will neither spare the one, because they are more advanced, nor be severe toward the other, because they are inferior and mean in the world. If masters and servants would consider both their relation and obligation to God, and the account they must shortly give to Him, they would be more careful of their duty to each other.

Thus the apostle concludes his exhortation to relative duties.

V. 10—18. Here is a general exhortation to constancy in our Christian course, and courage in our Christian warfare. Christians are soldiers for Jesus Christ; and if soldiers then they must,

I. Have a good heart for it. This is prescribed here; Be strong in the Lord, strong for service, for suffering, for fighting. Let a soldier be ever so well armed without, if he have not within a good heart, his armor will stand him in little stead. Note, Spiritual strength and courage are very necessary for our spiritual warfare. Be strong in the Lord; either in his cause, and for his sake; or rather, in his strength. We have no sufficient strength of our own; but all our sufficiency is of God. We should stir up ourselves, therefore, to resist temptations, in a reliance on God's all-sufficiency, and the omnipotence of his might.

II. Be well armed, v. 11. Observe, They who would approve themselves to have true grace, must aim at all grace; the whole armor. It is called the armor of God, because He both prepares and bestows it. This armor is prepared for us, but we must put it on; we must pray for grace; we must use the grace given us, and draw it out into act and exercise, as there is occasion. The reason assigned, why the Christian should be (4.) Nurture.] 'Paideia: the whole of the disciplina puerilis, the instruction, whether by example, benefits, admonitions, or punishment; synonymous with nouthesia [admonition], which, like Heb. tusd, signifies training to virtue. 1 S. 3:13. KOPPE.—How few are found to be converted in after life, except of those who had some religious instruction when young!

Ed.

V. 5—9. In general, the servants at that time were slaves, the property of their masters, and were often treated with great severity, though seldom with that systematic cruelty which commonly attends slavery in these days. But the apostles were ministers of religion, not politicians; they had not that influence among rulers and legislators, which would have been requisite for the abolition of slavery. Indeed, in that state of society, as to other things, this would not have been expedient; God did not please miraculously to interpose in the case, and they were not required to exasperate their persecutors, by expressly contending against the lawfulness of slavery. Yet both 'the law of love,' and the gospel of grace, tend to its abolition, as far as they are known and regarded; and the universal prevalence of Christianity must annihilate slavery, with many other evils, which in the present state of things cannot wholly be avoided. Ex. 21:20. 1 Cor. 7:17—24.—'In the wisdom of God,' the apostles were left to take such matters as they found them, and to teach servants and masters their respective duties; in the performance of which the evil would be mitigated, till in due time it should be extirpated by Christian legislators.

SCOTT.

(7.) As to the Lord and not to men.] How very far is this from giving the right to hold slaves as property! See Channing and Wayland; also every precept Christ ever uttered.

Ed.

(9.) To illustrate what slaveholders and other masters are to do, Paul instances, says Bl., 'what they are not to do: adverting to a fault in masters, which is inconsistent with any sense of responsibility towards a common master, namely, a minatory, oburgatory, and passionate demeanor, since it tends to destroy that well-affectedness which is the most powerful of all human motives to fidelity of service.'

Id.

V. 10—13. The apostle here draws his practical instructions to a close, by a figurative exhortation, taken from military affairs. In the fulness of Christ, and in the promised influences and assistance of the Holy Spirit, a 'panoply,' or complete suit of armor, was provided for every believer: this the Lord held out, as it were, to the Christians at Ephesus and all others; that, receiving it from Him, by the prayers of faith, they might put it on daily, in a diligent and watchful use of the 11 Put on the whole armor of God, that ye may be able to stand against the wiles of the devil.

12 For we wrestle not against flesh and blood, but against principalities, against powers, against the rulers of the darkness of this world, against spiritual wickedness in high places.

13 Wherefore take unto you the whole armor of God, that ye may be able to withstand in the evil day, and, having done all, to stand.

completely armed, is, that ye may be able to stand against the wiles of the devil; to hold out, and to overcome, notwithstanding all his assaults, both of force and fraud. This the apostle enlarges on here, and shows,

1. What our danger is, and what need we have to put on this whole armor: considering what sort of enemies we have to deal with,—the devil, and all the powers of darkness, v. 12. The combat for which we are to be prepared, is not against ordinary human enemies; nor against our own corrupt natures, singly considered; but against the several ranks of devils, who have a government they exercise in this world. We have to do,

(1.) With a subtle enemy; an enemy who uses wiles and stratagems, as v. 11. hence called a serpent, for subtlety; an old serpent, experienced in the art and trade of tempting.

(2.) A powerful enemy; principalities, and powers, and rulers. They are numerous, vigorous, ruling in the heathen nations that are yet in darkness: yea, over all men who are yet in a state of sin and ignorance. Satan's is a kingdom of darkness; whereas Christ's is a kingdom of light.

appointed means.—(12) 'Spiritual wickedness in high places,' evil spirits holding their empire in the air, according to the general opinion, (Note, 2:1, 2.) and tempting men to wickedness, especially in their religion, and also as being the authors of all idolatry. Indeed, they became proud rebels, and apostates, even 'in heavenly places.' Having been 'spiritual wickednesses' in that holy world, they were cast out thence; and had from the beginning opposed man's entrance into heaven by every mean, which malice, sagacity, and subtlety could suggest. 2 Pet. 2:4—9. Ju. 5—8. Rev. 12:7—12. They must be prepared every day for the conflict, and would continually be called to resist their foes: but some days would peculiarly encourage or give advantage to Satan's assaults. They could not however know beforehand, when such occasions would be afforded him, and permission granted him: Job 1:9—12. 2:6. Lu. 22:31—34. they must, [therefore,] as vigilant and valiant soldiers, be always ready.

SEOTT.

(11.) Wiles of the Devil. (1.) He cometh and closeth as a friend; insinuating, as if he bare us more good-will than God, Gen. 3. So to Christ, "Master, spare Thyself:" but mark what Christ replieth, Go behind me, Satan. So he cometh to another, what? He hath abused thee; do not let Him do thee that wrong, others will be heartened to do thee the like. So when he persuades covetousness. You must have more than this. You have, and may have a great charge. So to him that would double his diligence, What need you so to discase yourself? God forbid, none but such great painstakers should come to heaven. Thus he would, with a friendly parley, with a Joab's kiss, utterly betray us. (2.) He hath sometimes taken on him the person of an angel of light, in words which he can speak good, Mk. 1:24. 5:7. Thou art the Son of God. The maid with the spirit of divination, (Ac. 16:16.) saith, you are the servants of the most high God; but he profaneth the words, and useth them unto evil ends, to win himself credit in his lying, or weaken the truth of them by his confessing: So in nomine Dei [in the name of God] beginneth much wickedness. (3.) He will set us unseasonably and busy us about good works, and thus he did Martha, Lu. 10:40. making her so busy in the entertainment, that she had no leisure for the better work, that which Mary chose. This is his wickedness, and he always doth it either to juggle out a better work, or to draw in with that good some greater evil. So in the church, many read often and are thinking of good things, but the devil doth draw them to this, that they might not attend the work in hand. (4.) He will persuade to evil under the show of good: thus he will make us, under the pretence of discretion and moderation, be like those who were neither hot nor cold, sit for nothing but to be spued out of God's mouth: he will with a show of zeal fetch us off to murder, Lu. 9:54. He did the disciples, and thus he beguileth such who will reform without authority [and separatists]: so, by persuading providence, he doth fill the heart with covetousness: so, by persuading perfection, he foilth in will-worship; so those doctrines of devils, forbidding meats, marriage, religiously, are broached under pretence of chastity, abstinence; Invocation of angels, and doubting, under pretence of humility, Col. 2. and unwritten truths, with curious questions, under pretence of profound learning: such like doctrine, Rev. 2:24, so styled, is therefore called the depth of Satan. (5.) By dissuading that which is truly good, as if it were a vice: thus repenting, and leading new lives, and taking up the orders of God, this is now-fangledness, and levity: thus doing any duty that is not so generally received, is dissuaded as singu-

(3.) They are spiritual enemies, spiritual wickedness; or wicked spirits, as some tr. They are wicked spirits, and chiefly annoy the saints with, and provoke them to, spiritual wickednesses, pride, envy, malice, &c. They are said to be in high places, or in heavenly places, so the word is; the whole expansum, or spreading out of the air between the earth and the stars. Or the meaning may be, 'We wrestle about heavenly places, or heavenly things;' so some of the ancients. Our enemies strive to prevent our ascent to heaven, to deprive us of heavenly blessings, and to obstruct our communion with heaven. They assault us in the things that belong to our souls, and labor to deface the heavenly image in our hearts; therefore, we need be on our guard against them. We need faith in our Christian warfare, because we have spiritual enemies to grapple with, as well as faith in our Christian work, because we have spiritual strength to fetch in. Thus you see your danger.

2. What our duty is; to take and put on the whole armor of God, and then to stand our ground, and withstand our enemies.

(1.) We must withstand, v. 13. not yield to, but oppose, the devil's allurements and assaults. Satan is said to stand up against us, 1 Chr. 21:1. If he stand up against us, we must stand against him; and to stand against Satan, is to strive against sin. That ye may be able to withstand in the evil day, in temptation, or any sore affliction.

(2.) We must stand our ground; And having done all, to stand; resolve, by God's grace, not to yield to Satan. If we give back, he will get ground. If we distrust, either our cause or our Leader, or our armor, we give him advantage. Our present business is, to withstand the assaults of the devil, and to stand it out; and then, having done all, that is incumbent on the good soldiers of Jesus Christ, our warfare will be accomplished, and we shall be finally victorious.

(3.) We must stand armed; and this is here most enlarged on. Here is a Christian in complete armor: and the armor is divine. Armor of God. Armor of light, Rom. 13:12. Armor of righteousness, 2 Cor. 6:7. The apostle specifies the particulars of this armor, both offensive and defensive. Here is the military girdle or belt; the breast-plate; the greaves, or soldier's shoes; the shield; the helmet, and the sword. It is observable, among them all, there is none for the back; if we turn our back on the enemy, we lie exposed.

[1.] Truth, or sincerity, is our girdle, v. 14. It was prophesied of Christ, Is. 11:5. that righteousness should be the girdle of his loins, and faithfulness the girdle of his reins. What Christ was girt with, all Christians must be girt with. God desires truth, i. e. sincerity, in the inward parts. Some understand it of the doctrine and the truths of the Gospel: they should cleave to us, as the girdle does to the loins. Je. 13:11. This will restrain from all libertinism and licentiousness, as a girdle restrains and keeps in the body. This is the Christian soldier's belt: ungirt with this, he is unblessed.

[2.] Righteousness must be our breast-plate. The breast-plate shelters the vitals. Christ's righteousness, imputed to us, is our breast-plate against the arrows of divine wrath; and his righteousness, implanted in us, our breast-plate to fortify the heart against the attacks of Satan against us. The apostle explains this in 1 Th. 5:8. Putting on the breast-plate of faith and love. Faith and love include all Christian graces: for by faith we are united to Christ, and by love to our brethren. These will infer a diligent observance of our duty to God, and a righteous deportment toward men, in all the offices of justice, truth, and charity.

larity and pride; thus zeal is madness, as in Christ's practice censured, Mk. 3:21. And Paul was thought to be mad through much learning: thus the lawful remedy is calumniated as uncleanness; depending on God's providence is counted tempting Him, as in that example of Ahaz, Is. 7:12. Particular faith is pride, &c. And thus he doth set fine colors on foul clothes, and like an angel of light doth beguile us.' . . .

Second, by dissembled flight, like the stratagem, Josh. 7. Jud. 20. He will seem as fled, but then he playeth the Parthian, he fighteth most dangerously: Thus many that have been prodigal, given to women, are grown better husbands, and become new men; the devil seemeth to be fled: but if they be not new creatures indeed, having new hearts, hungering after righteousness, and the knowledge of God in Christ, the devil hath them far surer than before.'

[3.] Resolution must be as the greaves to our legs, v. 15. Shoes, or greaves of brass, or the like, were formerly part of the military armor, 1 S. 17: 6. to defend the feet against gall-traps, and sharp sticks, wont to be laid privily in the way, to obstruct the march of the enemy; they who fell on them being unfit to march. The preparation of the Gospel of peace, signifies a prepared and resolved frame of heart, to adhere to the Gospel, and abide by it; which will enable us to walk with a steady pace in the way of religion, notwithstanding the difficulties and dangers that may be in it. It is styled the Gospel of peace, because it brings all sorts of peace; peace with God, with ourselves, and with one another. It may also be meant of that which prepares for the entertainment of the Gospel; i. e. repentance. With this our feet must be shod: for by living a life of repentance, we are armed against temptations to sin, and the designs of our great enemy.

Dr. Whitby thinks the sense may be, 'That ye may be ready for the combat, be ye shod with the Gospel of peace; endeavor after that peaceable and quiet mind which the Gospel calls for. Be not easily provoked, (11—18.) 'The armor with which Satan furnishes his followers is directly the reverse of the Christian armor, described by Paul. Instead of the girdle of truth, he girds the sinner with error and deceit. Instead of the breast-plate of Christ's righteousness, he furnishes him with one of his own fancied righteousness. Instead of the shield of faith, the sinner has the shield of unbelief, with which he defends himself against the curses of the law and the arrows of conviction. Instead of the sword of the Spirit, Satan teaches the sinner to wield the sword of a or prone to quarrel; but show all gentleness, and all long-suffering, to all men; and this will as certainly preserve you from many great temptations and persecutions, as did those shoes of brass the soldiers from those gall-traps,' &c.

[4.] Faith must be our shield, v. 16. This is more necessary than any of them. The breast-plate secures the vitals; but with the shield we turn every way. This is the victory over the world, even our faith. We are to be fully persuaded of the truth of all God's promises and threatenings; such a faith being of great use against temptations. Consider faith, as it is the evidence of things not seen, and the substance of things hoped for; and it will appear to be of admirable use for this purpose. Faith, as receiving Christ, and the benefits of redemption, so deriving grace from Him, is like a shield, a sort of universal defence. Our enemy the devil, is here called the wicked one. He is wicked himself, and he endeavors to make us wicked. His temptations are called darts, because of their swift and undiscerned flight, and the deep wounds they give; fiery darts, by way of allusion to the poisonous darts which were wont to inflame the parts wounded with them, and therefore were so called; as the serpents with poisonous stings are called fiery serpents. Violent temptations, by which the soul is set on fire of hell, are the darts Satan shoots at us. Faith is the shield, with which we must quench these fiery darts; wherein we should receive them, and so render them ineffectual, that they may not hit us, or at least, not hurt us. Observe, Faith, acted on the Word of God, and applying that, acted upon the grace of Christ, and improving that, quenches the darts of temptations.

[5.] Salvation must be our helmet, v. 17. that is, Hope, which has salvation for its object; so 1 Th. 5: 8. The helmet secures the head. A good hope of salvation, well founded and well built, will both purify the soul, and keep it from being defiled by Satan; and it will comfort the soul, and keep it from being troubled and tormented by Satan. He would tempt us to despair; but good hope keeps us trusting in God, and rejoicing in Him.

[6.] The Word of God is the sword of the Spirit. It is called the sword of the Spirit, because it is of the Spirit's inditing; and He renders it efficacious and powerful, and sharper than a two-edged sword. Scripture-arguments are the most powerful arguments to repel a temptation with. Christ Himself resisted Satan's temptations with, It is written, Mat. 4: 1, 2, &c. This, being hid in the heart, will preserve from sin, Ps. 119: 11. and mortify and kill the lusts and corruptions latent there.

[7.] Prayer must buckle on all the other parts of our Christian armor, v. 18. We must join prayer with all these graces, and pray always. Not as though we were to do nothing else; but we should keep up constant times of prayer, and be constant to them. We must always keep up a disposition to prayer; and should intermix ejaculatory prayers with our duties, and with common business. Set and solemn prayer may sometimes be unseasonable, yet pious ejaculations can never be so. We must pray with all prayer and supplication; with all kinds of prayer, public, private, and secret; social and solitary; solemn and sudden; with all the parts of prayer; confession of sin, petition for mercy, and thanksgivings for favors received. We must pray in the Spirit; our spirits must be employed in the duty; and we must do it by the grace of God's good Spirit. We must watch thereunto, endeavoring to keep our hearts in a praying frame; and take all occasions, and improve all opportunities, for the duty: we must watch all the motions of our own hearts toward the duty. When God says, Seek ye my face, our hearts must comply, Ps. 27: 8. This we must do with all perseverance. We must abide by the duty of prayer, whatever change there may be in our outward circumstances; and we must continue in it as long as we live in the world. We must persevere in a particular prayer; not cutting it short, when our hearts are disposed to enlarge, and there is time for it, and our occasions call for it. We must likewise persevere in particular requests, notwithstanding some present discouragements and repulses. And we must pray with supplication, not for ourselves only, but for all saints; for we are members one of another: and none are so much saints, and in so good a condition in this world, but they need our prayers.

The apostle passes to the conclusion.

V. 19—24. I. He desires their prayers for him, v. 19. Having mentioned supplication for all saints, he puts himself into the number. We must pray for all saints, and particularly, for God's faithful ministers. Observe, what he would have them pray for tongue set on fire of hell, and furnishes him with a magazine of cavils, excuses, and objections, with which to attack religion and defend himself. He builds, too, for his soldiers many refuges of lies, in which, as in strong castles, they proudly hope to shelter themselves from the wrath of God.

V. 14—17. The minds of Christian soldiers ought to be fortified, and prepared for the assault, by conscious sincerity in their profession, and by an habitual and conscientious obedience to the various commandments of God, which would defend them from fatal wounds in the day of conflict: whereas, conscious negligence and disobedience would render them afraid to face persecution or death, in the cause of Christ. To stand their ground in difficult or slippery situations, or to march forward in rugged paths, 'their feet must be shod with the preparation of the Gospel of peace,' that is, their motives and encouragements to obedience, amidst temptations and persecutions, must be derived from a clear and comprehensive knowledge of the Gospel; through which God is revealed as 'in Christ, reconciling the world unto Himself,' and actually at peace with every believer, notwithstanding past transgressions, and present defects and infirmities. Rom. 5:1, 2. 8:1, 2. This assurance would make obedience delightful, though self-denying; and animate the established believer to resist temptation, to endure tribulation, and to march through difficulties and enemies, in the cause of Christ and in the way to heaven. De. 33:25. Lu. 15:22—24, v. 22. The suggestions of the tempter would indeed often resemble 'fiery darts'; so they would inflame the anger, pride, sensual passions, avarice, or other corrupt propensities of the heart, unless immediately intercepted and quenched by 'the shield of faith,' resting on the promises, and the truth, power, and mercy of God, to perform them. Gen. 39:8—10.—This clause [(16) Quench, &c.] is often interpreted exclusively of those harassing temptations, by which hard thoughts of God, and horrid or desponding conclusions concerning themselves, are excited in men's minds. These lead to immense distress, and eventually to guilt; and faith in the promises of God must extinguish them: yet the apostle evidently meant the words in a more comprehensive sense.

in his behalf; 'that utterance may be given unto me; that I may be enlarged from my present restraints, and so have liberty to propagate the faith of Christ; that I may have ability to express myself in a suitable and becoming manner, and that I may open my mouth boldly; that I may deliver the whole counsel of God, without any base fear, shame, or partiality.' The mystery of the Gospel, some understand of that part of the Gospel which concerns the calling of the Gentiles, which had hitherto, as a mystery, been concealed. But the whole Gospel was a mystery, till made known by divine revelation; and it is the work of Christ's ministers to publish it. Observe, Paul had a great command of language; they called him Mercury, because he was the chief speaker, Acts 14: 12. yet he would have his friends ask of God the gift of utterance for him. He was a man of great courage, and often signalized himself for it; yet he would have them pray that God would give him boldness. He knew as well what to say as any man; yet he desires them to pray for him, that he may speak as he ought to speak. The argument with which he enforces his request, is, that for the sake of the Gospel he was an ambassador in bonds, v. 20. He was persecuted and imprisoned for preaching the Gospel; though, notwithstanding, he continued in the embassy committed to him by Christ; and persisted in preaching it. Observe, 1. It is no new thing for Christ's ministers to be in bonds. 2. It is a hard thing for them to speak boldly, when that is their case. And, lastly, The best, and most eminent ministers have need of, and may receive advantage by, the prayers of good Christians; and therefore should earnestly desire them.

Having thus desired their prayers, H. He recommends Tychicus to them, v. 21, 22. He sent him with this epistle, that he might acquaint them with what other churches were informed of, i. e. how he did, and what he did; how he was used by the Romans in his bonds; and how he behaved himself in his present circumstances. It is desirable to good ministers, both that their Christian friends should know their state, and likewise to be acquainted with the condition of their friends; for by this mean they may the better help each other in their prayers. And that he might comfort their hearts: by giving such an account of his sufferings, of the cause of them, and of the temper of his mind, and his behavior under them, as might prevent their fainting at his tribulations, and even minister matter of joy and thanksgiving unto them. He tells them, that Tychicus was a beloved brother, and faithful minister in the Lord: he was very dear to Paul: which makes his love to these Christian Ephesians the more observable, in that he should now part with so good and dear a friend for their sakes, when his company and conversation must have been peculiarly delightful and serviceable to himself. But the faithful servants of Jesus Christ are wont to prefer the public good to their own private or personal interests.

III. He concludes with his good wishes and prayers for them; and not for them only, but for all the brethren, v. 23, 24. His usual benediction was, grace and peace: here it is, Peace be to the brethren, and love with faith. By peace, we are to understand all manner of peace, and all outward prosperity is included in the word; as if he had said, 'I wish the continuance and increase of all happiness to you.' And love with faith. This in part explains what he means in the following v. by grace: not only grace in the fountain, or the love and favor of God; but grace in the streams, the grace of the Spirit flowing from that divine principle; faith and love including all the rest. It follows, from God the Father, &c. All grace and blessings are derived to the saints from God, through the merit and intercession of Jesus Christ our Lord.

The closing benediction is more extensive than the former; for in this he prays for all true believers at Ephesus, and everywhere else. It is the undoubted character of all the saints, that they sincerely love our Lord Jesus Christ. The words may be read, Grace be with all them who love our Lord Jesus Christ in incorruption, who continue constant in their love to Him, so as not to be corrupted out of it by any baits or seductions whatsoever; and whose love to Him is uncorrupted by any opposite lust, or the love of anything displeasing to Him. Grace, i. e. the favor of God, and all good, spiritual and temporal, i. e. the product of it, is, and shall be, with all them who thus love our Lord Jesus Christ. And it is, or ought to be, the desire and prayer of every lover of Christ, that it may be so with all his fellow-Christians. Amen.

PRACT. OBS. When children 'honor and obey their parents,' they take a proper method to obtain temporal comfort and prosperity; and when they do it 'in the Lord,' from faith and love, it forms an evidence of their interest in his promises, which will be fulfilled in their everlasting felicity. Similar motives should induce parents, to attend diligently to the education of their children, with meekness, firmness, prudence, and affection; that they may 'not provoke them to wrath,' or tempt them to sin, but 'bring them up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord.' But alas! how grievously is this duty neglected, even among those who are zealous for the great doctrines of the Gospel! How many parents 'seem to be religious,' and are strict in some things; yet by their imprudence, violent passions, harshness, or unforgiving temper and conduct, disgust their children, prejudice them against religion, render them uncomfortable in their presence, and consequently induce them to prefer almost any other company! This does not indeed excuse the children's disobedience, but it awfully occasions it. On the other hand, how commonly do we see more regard paid to every kind of instruction, or trifling embellishment, than to the religious principles and conduct of young persons! So that, too often, the education given to children leads them to those habits, notions, or connexions, which make way for their subsequent ungodliness, infidelity, dissipation, licentiousness, or avarice, by which they ruin themselves, and propagate impiety, vice, and misery, in an accumulating progression. Those who fear God, and love their children, should watch and pray, even with trembling, that they may not thus prove the occasion of condemnation to their own offspring; for, though God alone can change the heart, yet He commonly does it, by the good instructions and example of parents, the means which they use for their children's spiritual good, and in answer to their fervent prayers. Gen. 18:18, 19.—The grand maxim to be laid down, as most of all giving a scriptural ground to expect the blessing, is this; 'Decidedly "seek," for your children as well as yourselves,

"first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness;" and steadily subordinate all regard to temporal advantage, and external accomplishment, and even proficiency in learning, to this great concern. Desire and aim "first of all," that your children may be true Christians, and form all your plans in entire subserviency to this main object.' Whereas they, whose chief anxiety seems to be, that their children may be wealthy, polite, learned, [famous,] or accomplished, whatever be the event to their souls, or who suffer these things materially to influence their plan of education, and to interfere with their children being 'brought up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord,' can have no scriptural ground to expect his blessing on them.—Again, it is probable, that but few masters will refuse their approbation to the injunctions here laid on their servants, or servants their approbation to the exhortations given to their masters; but alas! those who ought to obey the precept are exceedingly prone to object to it, or to explain it slightly. The greater advantages, however, servants now enjoy to what slaves of old did, or slaves in many countries now do, the more cheerfully should they yield obedience and perform service 'to their own masters,' and the greater caution should they use not to dishonor the Gospel by a negligent, refractory, contentious, or unfaithful behavior. The same principles will render 'masters' considerate, kind, gentle, and conscientious, in their whole deportment; 'remembering that they also have a Master in heaven,' who 'is no Respector of persons.' And what orderly, and happy families will those be, where relative duties are thus on all sides constantly and circumspcctly attended to!—We should consider all the saints, wherever they live, as fellow-soldiers in our spiritual warfare, though divided into different battalions, distinguishable by a few unimportant externals; and we must help them all with our supplications: for general success against the powers of darkness, the kingdom of Satan, as well as personal victory, should be our noble ambition.

ders pious men too apt to explain every expression in support of them; though it weakens the general proof of them, makes one part of the Scriptures coincide with the other by a needless repetition, and leaves out other matters equally important. Indeed, it may be apprehended, that by adducing everything which can be thought of, in explaining metaphors, many things are supposed to be contained in them which were entirely out of the writer's mind when he wrote them.—(20) Bonds.] Or, 'in a chain.'—The apostle was allowed to live at Rome, with a soldier that kept him.—To this soldier he was tied with a chain, fixed on his right wrist, and fastened to the soldier's left arm; and the chain being of a convenient length, the two could walk together with ease. . . The soldiers, who were thus employed, no doubt, reaped great benefit from the apostle's conversation and preaching.' Mackn. This is probable, and the thought is worthy of attention; but the words, 'no doubt,' imply more than we know on the subject.

These are the genuine effects of true faith, and from these spring religious comfort, and joy. Love first produces inward peace. It extinguishes malice, envy, hatred, wrath, revenge, and every unfriendly passion,—every unsocial feeling. It operates, by meekness under provocations,—by the forgiveness of injuries,—by condescension in cases of controversy,—by compassion to the afflicted,—by beneficence to the needy,—by rightness in dealings,—by tenderness of men's characters,—by joy in the prosperity of neighbors, and by a promptitude in relieving the distressed, and promoting the happiness of mankind.' AN EXPOSITION
PAUL'S EPISTLE TO THE PHILIPPIANS,
WITH
PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS AND NOTES.

(Henry's Exposition, completed by Dr. W. Harris.)

PHILIPPI was a chief city of the western part of Macedonia, Acts 16:12. It took its name from Philip, the famous king of Macedon, who repaired and beautified it; and it was afterward made a Roman colony. Near this place were the Campi Philippii, remarkable for the famous battles between Julius Cesar and Pompey the Great; and that between Augustus and Antony on one side, and Cassius and Brutus on the other. But it is most remarkable among Christians for this epistle, which was written when Paul was prisoner at Rome, A. D. 62.*

Paul seems to have had a very particular kindness for the church at Philippi, which he himself had been instrumental in planting [A. D. 50. says Horne]; and though he had the care of all the churches, he had, on that account, a particular fatherly, tender care of this. Those whom God has employed us to do any good to, we should look upon ourselves both encouraged and engaged to study to do more good to. I. He was called in an extraordinary manner to preach the Gospel at Philippi, Acts 16:9. He saw God going before him, and was encouraged to use all means for carrying on the good work begun among them. II. At Philippi he suffered hard things, Acts 16:33. yet he had not the less kindness for the place. We must never love our friends the less for the ill-treatment our enemies give us. III. The beginnings of that church were very small; yet that did not discourage him. If good be not done at first, it may be done afterward; and the last works may be more abundant. We must not be discouraged by small beginnings. IV. It seems, by many passages in this epistle, † that this church at Philippi grew into a flourishing church; and, particularly, was very kind to Paul. [Sending him money, too, again and again, though, says Horne, but a small community.] He had reaped of their temporal things, and he made a return in spiritual things. He acknowledges the receipt of a present they had sent him, ch. 4:18. and that when no church communicated with him as concerning giving and receiving besides, v. 15. and he gives them a prophet's, and an apostle's reward, in this epistle, which is of more value than thousands of gold and silver.

HENRY.

The apostle had visited Philippi a second time, [A. D. 57, so Horne,] though few particulars are recorded. Acts 20:1—6. As this epistle was manifestly written from Rome, and during the latter part of the apostle's first imprisonment in that city, nearly 12 years had passed since he first preached at Philippi; but the conduct of the Christians there had uniformly been so exemplary, and their grateful affection to him so fully evinced, that he had only to rejoice over them with heartfelt gratitude, while he poured out his prayers for them, and affectionately animated them to persevere and press forward in their heavenly course. Some cautions, indeed, against deceivers of different descriptions, 3:17—19. whose base conduct and awful doom he declares, in most expressive terms, are joined with his exhortations. Not one censure, however, is passed or implied on any of the Philippians, but unqualified commendation and confidence, Rev. 2:8—11.—The subjects treated on, and the instructions to be deduced from them, need not be anticipated. 'The apostle's design in this epistle, (which is quite of the practical kind,) seems to be, to comfort the Philippians under the concern they had expressed at the news of his imprisonment; to check a party spirit, that appears to have broke out among them, and to promote, on the contrary, an entire union and harmony of affection; to guard them against being seduced from the purity of the Christian faith, by judaizing teachers; to support them under the trials with which they struggled; and, above all, to inspire them with a concern to adorn their profession, by the most eminent attainments in the divine life.' Doddr. 'The genuineness of this letter was never questioned.' Horne.

SCOTT.

* It is undeniable, that the epistle was sent not long before the 2 years of the apostle's imprisonment at Rome were ended, which the Oxford Bible supposes to have taken place about the close of A. D. 65.—According to this I have dated the epistle, (though many affix an earlier date,) on a full conviction, that more years were spent in the various labors of this great apostle, than are generally supposed; yet, at the same time, not considering the subject as of great importance. SCOTT. 'From 1:7, 13. 4:22. it appears, Paul was now prisoner at Rome; and from the expectation he discovers, of being soon released and restored to them, as well as from the intimations, 1:12. 2:26. that he had been some time at Rome, he probably wrote, near the close of his first imprisonment, at the end of 62, or beginning of 63.'

HORNE.

† It is evident, that Epaphroditus, who had been sent with a supply of money to the apostle at Rome, and who seems to have been a pastor, and perhaps the principal pastor, of the church, conveyed the epistle to Philippi. He had, either by his journey to Rome, or by his zealous labors in assisting the apostle, when in that city, brought a dangerous sickness on himself, the tidings of which so afflicted the Philippians, and their sorrow, when made known to Epaphroditus, so distressed him, that the apostle was induced to send him back sooner than he had intended, though to his own inconvenience. 2:24—30. SCOTT. 'When the Gospel was first preached in Macedonia, no church but the Philippian contributed anything to Paul's support; while he was preaching at Thessalonica, they sent him money twice, that the success of the Gospel might not be hindered by its preachers becoming burdensome to the Thessalonians, 4:15, 16. The same they did, and for the same reason, while Paul preached at Corinth. 2 Cor. 11:9. And when they heard he was confined at Rome, they showed the same affectionate concern for him; and sent Epaphroditus with a present, lest he should want necessaries during his imprisonment. Phil. 2:25. 4:10, 14—18. The more immediate occasion of this epistle was, Epaphroditus' return, by whom Paul sent it, as a grateful acknowledgment of their kindness, in sending him supplies of money. From the manner in which Paul expressed himself, it appears, he was in great want of necessaries before their contributions arrived; for as he had not converted the Romans, he did not consider himself as entitled to receive supplies from them. Being a prisoner, he could not work as formerly; and it was his rule never to receive anything from the churches where factions had been raised against him. It also appears, that the Philippians were the only church from whom he received any assistance, and that he conferred this honor upon them, because they loved him exceedingly, had preserved the Christian doctrine in purity, and had always conducted themselves as sincere Christians. It is remarkable, that this is the only epistle of Paul, in which not one censure is expressed or implied against any member of the church. Its style is singularly animated, affectionate, and pleasing.'

CHAP. I.

3 He testifieth his thankfulness to God, and his love toward them, for the fruits of their faith, and fellowship in his sufferings, 9 daily praying to Him for their increase in grace. 12 He sheweth what good the faith of Christ had received by his troubles at Rome, 21 and how ready he is to glorify Christ either by his life or death, 27 exhorting them to unity, 28 and to fortitude in persecution.

PAUL and Timotheus, the servants of Jesus Christ, to all the saints in Christ Jesus which are at Philippi, with the bishops and deacons:

a Ac. 16:12, &c.

CHAP. I. V. 1, 2. The inscription and benediction.

I. The persons writing the epistle. Paul joins Timothy with himself, to express his own humility, and to honor Timothy. The aged, strong, and eminent, should support the reputation of those who are younger, and weaker, and of less note. The servants of Jesus Christ; not only common disciples, but an apostle, and an evangelist. The highest honor of the greatest apostles, and most eminent ministers, is, to be, not the masters of the churches, but the servants of Christ.

II. The persons to whom it is directed.

1. All the saints in Christ at Philippi. He mentions the church before the ministers, because ministers are for the church, for their edification and benefit; not the churches for the ministers, their dignity, dominion, or wealth. The Christians here are called saints; set apart for God, or sanctified by his Spirit, either by visible profession or real holiness. And, it is directed to all the saints, one, as well as another, even the meanest, the poorest, and those of the least gifts. Christ makes no difference; the rich and the NOTES. CHAP. I. V. 1. As Paul's apostleship had never been called in question at Philippi; and as he wrote this epistle, not only in his own name, but in that of Timothy, [Paul's companion in each journey to Philippi,] who was then at Rome with him, he styles himself and Timothy 'the servants of Jesus Christ.' Jn. 12:25—26. 13:12—17. Col. 3:22—25. Ja. 1:1. 2 Pet. 1:1, 2. He addressed himself to 'the saints at Philippi, with the bishops and deacons;' hence we learn, that the distinction between bishops and presbyters was not then generally established, but that the pastors of the church were distinguished from the deacons, who managed the secular matters and the charities of the church. Acts 6:1—6. 20:17. 1 Tim. 3:1—7. Much labor and learning have indeed been employed, to set aside this conclusion, but with little success, even by the allowance of decided Episcopians.—'Though it be generally resolved, that the word 'bishop,' and 'elder,' are equivalent in Scripture; yet this is not to be understood so, that either, or both of them, signifies indifferently those whom we now call presbyters, but

2 Grace <sup>b</sup> be unto you, and peace, from God our Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ.

3 I thank my God upon every <sup>c</sup> remembrance of you,

4 Always in every prayer <sup>d</sup> of mine for you all making request with joy,

5 For your fellowship in the gospel, from the first day until now ;

6 Being <sup>e</sup> confident of this very thing, that he <sup>f</sup> which hath begun a good <sup>g</sup> work in you will <sup>h</sup> perform it until the day <sup>i</sup> of Jesus Christ :

7 Even as it is meet for me to think this of you all, because <sup>j</sup> I have you in my heart ; inasmuch as both in my bonds, and in the <sup>k</sup> defence and confirmation of the gospel, ye all are partakers <sup>l</sup> of my grace.

poor meet together in Him : and the ministers must not make a difference in their care and tenderness on these accounts, Ja. 2: 1. Saints in Christ Jesus ; saints are accepted only by being in Christ Jesus, or as they are Christians. Out of Christ, the best saints are sinners, unable to stand before God.

2. The ministers, or church-officers, the bishops and deacons. The bishops or elders, in the first place, whose office it was to teach and rule ; and the deacons, or overseers of the poor, who took care of the outward business of the house of God ; the place, the furniture, the maintenance of the ministers, and provision for the poor. These were all the offices then known in the church, and of divine appointment. The apostle, in the direction of his epistle to a Christian church, acknowledges but two orders, which he calls bishops and deacons. And whosoever shall consider, that the same characters and titles, the same qualifications, the same acts of office, and the same honor and respect, are everywhere ascribed throughout the N. T. to those who are called bishops and presbyters, (as Dr. Hammond and other learned men allow,) will find it difficult to make them a different office, or distinct order of ministry in the scripture-times.

III. The apostolical benediction, v. 2. It is the same, almost, in all the epistles ; we must not be shy of forms, though we are not to be tied to them, especially such as are not scriptural. The only form in the O. T. is that of a benediction, Nu. 6: 23—26. So in the N. T., the good wished, is spiritual good, grace and peace ; the free favor and good-will of God ; and all the blessed fruits and effects of it : and that from God our Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ ; jointly from them both, though in a different way : from God our Father, but in and through our Lord Jesus Christ ; Christ, as Mediator, and the Channel of conveyance.

V. 3—6. The apostle proceeds to thanksgiving ; he tells them he thanked God on their account. Observe,

1. Paul remembered them : he bore them much in thought, though at a distance from them. As he often thought of them, so he often spake of them ; and the very mention of them was grateful to him : it is a pleasure to hear of the welfare of an absent friend.

2. He remembered them with joy. At Philippi he was evil-entreated, scourged, put into the stocks, and for the present saw little fruit of his labor ; yet he remembers Philippi with joy. He looked upon his sufferings for Christ as his credit, comfort, crown ; so far was he from being ashamed, or loth to hear of the scene of his sufferings.

3. He remembered them in prayer, v. 4. the best remembrance of our friends. Paul was much in prayer for all his friends, for these particularly. It should seem, he mentioned at the throne of grace the several churches he was interested in, particularly, and by name. God gives us leave to be thus free with Him ; though, for our comfort, He knows whom we mean, when we do not name them.

4. He thanked God on every joyful remembrance of them. Thanksgiving must have a part in every prayer ; and whatsoever is the matter of our rejoicing, ought to be the matter of our thanksgiving. He thanked God, as well as made requests with joy. It encourages us in prayer, and enlarges the heart in praise, to see every mercy coming from the hand of God, as our God. But,

(1.) He thanks God for the comfort he had in them, v. 5. Gospel-fellowship is a good fellowship ; the meanest Christians have fellowship with the greatest apostles ; for the Gospel salvation is a common salvation, Jude 3. and they obtain like precious faith with them, 2 Pet. 1: 1. The Christian has fellowship in the Gospel, is interested in all the promises and privileges of the Gospel, from the first day of his becoming such. Until now. Observe, It is a great comfort to ministers, when they who begin well, hold on and persevere.

Some, by their fellowship in the Gospel, understand, their liberality toward propagating the Gospel, and tr. koinōnian, not communion but communication. But, comparing it with Paul's thanksgiving on the account of other churches, it rather seems taken more generally, for the fellowship they had, in faith and hope, and holy love, with all good Christians ; a fellowship in gospel-promises, ordinances, privileges, and hopes ; and this from the first day until now.

(2.) For the confidence he had concerning them, v. 6. Paul speaks with much confidence concerning the good estate of others ; hoping well concerning them in the judgment of clarity, and being confident in the judgment of faith, that, if sincere, they should be happy.

Observe here, 1. The work of grace is a good work, a blessed work ; because it makes us good, and is an earnest of good to us.

2. Wherever this good work is begun, it is of God's beginning. We could not begin it ourselves, for we are by nature dead in trespasses and sins : It is God who quickens them who are thus dead, Eph. 2: 1. Col. 2: 13. 3. The work of grace is but begun in this life ; as long as we are in this imperfect state, there is more to be done. 4. If the same God who begins the good work, did not undertake to finish it, it would never be finished. 5. We may be confident God will not forsake, but will finish and crown, the work of his own hands. For, as for God, his work is perfect. 6. The work of grace will never be perfected till the day of Jesus Christ, the day of his appearance, when He shall come to judge the world, and finish his mediation ; then He will complete it. We have the same expression, v. 10.

V. 7, 8. The apostle expresses the ardent affection he had for them, and his concern for their spiritual welfare, v. 7. He loved them as his own soul. Observe,

1. Why ; They had received benefit by his ministry, were partakers of that grace of God, which, through him, was communicated to them. Receiving benefit by their ministry, makes people dear to their ministers. Or, They were partakers of his affliction by sympathy and concern, and readiness to assist him. This he calls being partakers of his grace : for they who suffer with the saints, are, and shall be, comforted with them. He loved them because they that they both signify bishops, one settled in each church by the apostles ; there being no use of the second order in the church, till the numbers of believers increased. Hammond. Beyond doubt, the apostle ordained more than one, either bishops or presbyters, in some of the churches. Acts 14:23. 20:17. Indeed the address fully proves it, as to 'the bishops.' But this learned expositor did not perceive, that one bishop, without any presbyters under him, comes to precisely the same thing, as one presbyter, without any bishop over him. Till the churches were multiplied, the bishops and presbyters were the same ; but afterwards, probably in the times of the apostles, the senior or more eminent presbyter, was called episcopus, or overseer, not of the church only, but also of its pastors. [Comp. 1 Pet. 5:1,2. Gr.]

(1.) Bishops, &c. 'On this, as on most occasions, I see no reason to forsake our venerable guides, the ancient comtrs., who inform us, that these episkopoi were the presbyters of the several congregations of Christians in Philippi, (and, I would add, its vicinity, to some distance.) On this, see Whitby's long and able Diss., who says : "The Gr. and Lat. fathers, with one consent, declare, that the apostle here calls their presbyters their bishops. So Chrys., Theod., Gec., Theoph., among the Greeks ; and among the Latins, Jer., Pseud-Ambrose, Pelagius, and Primasius ; and that, not only because there could be but one bishop, properly so called, in one city ; but for another, alleged by them all, viz., that then the names were common to both orders, the Bishops being called Presbyters, and the Presbyters Bishops." Bl.—'This proves there must have been more than one bishop at Philippi.' Dodd.—'Of consequence, the primitive church, under the apostles, differed from modern episcopacy, where there is but one bishop in a diocese. Still more important : those bishops and deacons are included with the saints in Christ Jesus, the whole forming the body of the church of Christ ; consequently, had experienced the regenerating power of the Holy Ghost ; and surely, to suppose elders, bishops, and deacons, engaged as instruments, under the Holy Ghost, for the conversion of others, while unconverted themselves, would be most preposterous.' Hawker.—'The apostle did not mention the bishops and deacons in the inscription of his other epistles, for they were all concerning points of faith and practice ;

but this was a letter of thanks to the church at Philippi for their present to him ; in collecting which, the deacons and bishops may have showed such forwardness, as to merit this mark of respect and gratitude.' Mackn.—Servants. 'So all ministers employed in preaching the Gospel are called.' Ros. 'The term is also found in the classics, applied to priests of heathen gods.'

V. 5. Fellowship. Some tr. 'communication toward the Gospel,' and understand, the liberality the Philippians had shown the apostle. [Notes, 4:10—20.] But this, in itself, was a far inferior cause of gratitude to God, than the conversion of very many souls, to partake of all the blessings and salvation of Christ ; the sentiment is not at all in the apostle's manner in other epistles, or even in the other parts of the epistle, where he mentions that subject openly and perspicuously ; the word here used, more frequently means participation, than communication, and even when it has the latter meaning, it implies that the giver made the receiver his partner, or a sharer with him in his abundance. Sc.

(5.) Fellowship. Koinōnia : 'participation of Christian doctrine by having embraced the Christian faith,' so Crell., Whit., Grot., Me-noch., Heinr., Ros., our com. vers. and most Eng. trs. Gal. 2:9. 1 Cor. 2:9. Yet there is no occasion to abandon the common interpretation of the Gr. comtrs., also Pierce, Cæder, Mich., Wells, Pyle, Hardy, Storr, and Slade, viz. 'for your liberality in contributing to the furtherance of the interests of the Gospel,' a sense of koinōnia, found Ro. 15:26. 2 Co. 8:4. 9:13. Of this they had given striking proofs, [note, † pref.] So that at 4:15. Paul uses the same word. This interpretation is also required by the words following ; and so Phot. and Theod. tr. Bloomf.

V. 6. He which hath begun, &c. will perform. 'This may be understood either of the church, or of individual believers. The objection, that confidence of success has a tendency to produce carelessness and indifference, is so contrary to general experience, that we cannot but wonder when we see it mentioned. What so much animates and encourages any person in the progress of a great and good work, as the persuasion that he shall be enabled to complete it ?' Williams.

V. 7. Defence. 'Apologia : supposed to have been when he pleaded before Nero, against his Jewish enemies. Ac. 23:17, &c. Grace.'

8 For God is my record, how greatly I long after you all in the bowels of Jesus Christ.

9 And this I pray, that your love may abound <sup>m</sup> yet more and more in knowledge and <sup>n</sup> in all <sup>a</sup> judgment;

10 That <sup>o</sup> ye may <sup>p</sup> approve things that are <sup>q</sup> excellent; that ye may be <sup>r</sup> sincere and without offence till the day of Christ;

12 But I would ye should understand, brethren, that the things which happened unto me have fallen out rather unto the furtherance of the gospel; adhered to him in his bonds, and in the defence and confirmation of the Gospel: they were as ready to appear in their places, and according to their capacity, for the defence of the Gospel, as the apostle was in his; therefore he had them in his heart; or, ('as it may be rendered,' says Scott, 'more obviously, and in equal consistency with the idiom of the language,') you have me at heart. The truest mark of respect towards our ministers, is, receiving and abiding by the doctrine they preach.

2. The evidence of it; It is meet for me, &c. By this it appeared, that he had them in his heart, because he had a good opinion of them, and good hopes concerning them. Observe, It is very proper to think as well as we can of other people, in all cases.

3. An appeal to God concerning the truth of this, v. 8. either he longed to see them, or to hear from them, or he longed for their spiritual welfare, and their increase and improvement in knowledge and grace. He longed after them all, even the meanest and poorest; longed greatly after them, or with strong affection and great good-will; and this in the bowels of Jesus Christ, with that tender concern Christ Himself has, and has shown, Oh, how infinitely! to precious souls. Paul was herein a follower of Christ, and all good ministers should aim to be so. Shall not we pity and love those souls whom Christ had such a love and pity for? For this he appeals to God; God is my record. He expressed an inward disposition of mind, which God only was Witness to the sincerity of, therefore to Him he appeals.

V. 9—11. These vs. contain Paul's prayers for them. It is an encouragement to us, to know that we are prayed for by our friends, who, we have reason to think, have an interest at the throne of grace. It was intended likewise for their direction in their walk, and that they might labor to answer his prayers for them; for by that it would appear God had answered them. It is an inducement to us to do our duty, that we may not disappoint the expectations of praying friends and ministers. He prays,

1. That they might be a loving people, and that good affections might abound among them, v. 9. He means it of their love to God, one another, and all men. Observe, They who abound much in any grace, need abound more and more; because something is still wanting in it, and we are imperfect in our best attainments.

2. That they might be a knowing, judicious people. We must love God, because of his infinite excellence and loveliness; and love our brethren, because of what we see of his image on them. Strong passions, without knowledge and a settled judgment, will not make us complete in the will of God, and sometimes do more hurt than good. Rom. 10: 2. Jn. 16: 2.

3. That they might be a discerning people, v. 10. that we may, on trial, approve the things which are excellent, and discern their difference from other things. The truths and laws of Christ are excellent; and every one should approve, and esteem them such, and will do so, if candid and discerning.

4. That they might be an honest, upright-hearted people; That ye may be sincere. Sincerity is that in which we should have our conversation in the world, and the glory of all our graces.

5. That they might be an inoffensive people; without offence until the day of Christ: not apt to take offence; and very careful not to give offence to God or their brethren; so Paul himself, Acts 23: 1. 24: 16. And we must continue, that we may be presented blameless, at the day of Christ, Eph. 5: 27. Jude 24.

6. That they might be a fruitful, useful people, v. 11. From God is our fruit found, therefore from Him it must be asked. The fruits of righteousness are the evidences and effects of our sanctification; and these fruits should really fill us, and wholly take us up. Fear not being emptied by bringing forth the fruits of righteousness, for you will be filled with them. These fruits are by Jesus Christ, by his strength and grace, for without Him we can do nothing. He is the Root of the good olive, from which it derives its fatness. We are strong in the grace which is in Christ Jesus, 2 Tim. 2: 1. and strengthened with might by his Spirit, Eph. 3: 16. and they are unto the glory and praise of God. We must not aim at our own glory in our fruitfulness, but at the praise and glory of God; that God may be glorified in all things, 1 Pet. 4: 11. and whatsoever we do, we must do all to the glory of God, 1 Cor. 10: 31. It is much for the honor of God, when Christians are not only good, but do good, and abound in good works.

V. 12—20. The apostle being now a prisoner at Rome, takes pains, lest they should be stumbled at it, to show how his sufferings were reconcilable to God's wisdom and goodness in employing him.

1. He suffered by the sworn enemies of the Gospel; but they should not be stumbled at this, for it tended to further the Gospel, v. 12.

1. It alarmed those without, v. 13. 'The emperor, the courtiers, the magistrates, know I do not suffer as an evil-doer, but as an honest man, with a good conscience. They know that I suffer for Christ, and not for any wickedness.' Paul's sufferings made him known at court, where, perhaps, he

PRACT. OBS. V. 1—11. Alas! how often are faithful pastors constrained to make request 'with tears,' instead of 'with joy,' for those in whom they once were confident, but for whom they now tremble! We may, however, be always confident, that God 'will perform his good work' in every soul, in which He has really begun it, by regeneration; though we should warn men not to trust in superficial appearances, sudden emotions, external reformation, change of sect or sentiment, or in anything short of 'a new creation' unto holiness.—We cannot, in general, pray for ourselves, and in behalf of those who possess that 'faith which worketh by love,' in a better manner, than by copying the example before us, and requesting, that 'our love may abound yet more and more,' and be exercised 'in knowledge and in all judgment,' that we and they may 'discern between things that differ,' and know how to choose the good and refuse the evil; that we may be sincere and diligent disciples, preserved from all scandals and offences, and 'filled with the fruits of righteousness, which are, through Christ, to the praise and glory of God.'

Bonds, imprisonment, and persecutions, accounted by Paul, as marks of divine favor. And so the ancient contrs., and Grot., Ham., Noesselt, Storr, Jaspis.

V. 9. Judgment.] Epignōsis: discernment, so Theoph.; that natural sense, says Heinr., by which they discern and feel what is true, right, and excellent in Christian doctrine. "Perception or discrimination of right and wrong." Stale. Whitby says, the word is so used 20 times in Prov. and refers to Heb. 5:14. The prayer, Heinr. thinks, is, that the increase of their love may have added to it a perpetual increase of knowledge. [Or, as Dr. Dwight somewhere, it is believed, uses the phrase; might not only know that they loved God, but know that they knew it. I. e., that feeling, mere blind, impulsive feeling, which so many are apt to mistake for religion, might be united with intellectual appreciation, and conscientious approval, intelligent conviction. Ed.] Ros. remarks, that love is increased by divine knowledge and understanding; since the more we understand of the benefits of God and Christ, and the more we experience the force of heavenly truths [and know of heavenly laws and universal relations], the more [if we begin right] is our love to God and Christ augmented. This may be true; but I think it is not the truth Paul means: and that the ancients were right in supposing he meant to pray, that their knowledge and understanding might keep pace with that increase of love and affection: since, by that mean, Christian love produces better fruits. [Could this prayer take effect on the church now, how soon would the dreadful results of sectarianism cease!] The Philippians had, it seems, been, from the first, docile, well-disposed, and kind-hearted. But, as would appear from the words following, their simplicity had been somewhat abused by crafty false teachers, chiefly Judaizers, &c. Bl. Knowledge and judgment.] 'The former is explained of speculative, and the latter of practical knowledge; but I think the idea better preserved by rendering the original, perception, or inward sensation. He wishes they might not only know the principles which recommend candor and benevolence, but feel their influence on their hearts.'

which differ,' is more exact than the text; but it is evident, that 'to distinguish things which differ,' was especially intended, and to guard against counterfeit revelations, false affections, and all those specious errors and evils, by which Satan and his ministers imposed on the unwary.

(10.) Howe introduces this text to show, that we need the light of the Spirit to help us to apprehend, to consider, to judge, and determine our actions agreeably to that judgment. Doddr.—Things that are excellent.] 'Paul intimates, that a knowledge of men and things, and a delicate sensibility, or "moral feeling," was necessary to guard the Philippians against being imposed upon.'

V. 11. Unto . . . God.] For the heathen, say Chrys. and Theoph., claimed the praise of performing that part of dikaiosunē [tr. righteousness] which regards men; but it was done through vainglory, and to gain human approbation, and not in the way Christ would have it, namely, to the praise and glory of God. Bl. How much of modern Christianity would stand the test of this precept? How uncommon is it, to do everything we do from supreme love and regard to God and his will!

V. 12—14. The apostle had probably been informed, that the Philippians feared lest his imprisonment should check the progress of the Gospel, and intimidate others from preaching or embracing it; and no doubt Satan and his servants desired and expected this effect from it. Scott.

(13.) 'So that it is manifest, that my bonds and imprisonment, suffered on account of Christ's religion only, and not for any fault, are become plain to all the Pretorians, and to all other persons.' Pierce, Mackn., Ros., Heinr. Bl. Indeed, as the government was military, and the intercourse between Rome and the provinces was kept up, over military roads, and by military couriers, and interchange of captains and governors, and as Paul was now at the head-quarters and focus of this Roman intelligence and intercourse, he could not have been placed in circumstances better calculated to have his case and the Gospel known and talked of, in an empire without newspapers.

would never have otherwise been known; hence, some might inquire after the Gospel for which he suffered, who might otherwise have never heard of it. When his bonds were manifest in the palace, they were manifest in all other places. The sentiments of the court have a great influence on the sentiments of all people.

PRACT. OBS. V. 12—20. The consideration, that the Lord 'worketh all things after the counsel of his own will,' should reconcile us even to those afflictive dispensations, which seem to preclude us from usefulness. He often works by apparent contraries; and his most able ministers have been immured in prisons, that their 'bonds in Christ' might bring the knowledge of his truth into the courts of justice, nay, even into the palaces of princes; and the blood of the martyrs has more abundantly made fruitful the good seed of the Word of God. Nay, the extreme sufferings and cruel death of his saints, instead of intimidating, have infused courage into their brethren, while they witnessed the triumphant consolations of the happy sufferers. Indeed, Satan will endeavor to prevent these blessed effects, even by stirring up men 'to preach the Gospel' from unworthy motives; and Christ and his truth have often been preached, in order to grieve, perplex, or expose to enmity and persecution, his faithful, suffering servants! So varied are the effects of human depravity! The painful and vexatious circumstances, which sometimes attend these transactions, will 'turn to our salvation,' if we bear them in a proper manner, through 'the supply of the Spirit of Christ,' granted in answer to the prayers made for us, and by us. Our 'earnest expectation and hope' should be, not to be honored by men, or to escape the cross, but to be so upheld amidst contempt and affliction, that we may not be put to shame, or disgrace the cause of God, and that we may act with such boldness and constancy, amidst dangers and enemies, that 'Christ may be magnified in our bodies,' whether by our laborious services and protracted sufferings, or by the honorable conclusion of our work and warfare. acc, says Bloomf.; who, however, thinks it too harsh to supply places, and read all other places: and so prefers, 'with most recent comrs., to take praetorium for the Praetorians themselves, the whole camp, and (by their means) to all others, i. e. to the public at large. Some [see Mackn.] take praetorium to denote the palace, called by the provincials, Praetorium, since that was the name given to the residence of the provincial, military governors. But it is observed, by Heinr. and Rox., the custody of the emperor's prisons (over which he who was placed in command, bore the title of praefectus praetorii) was called praetorium. Hence, by metonymy, the same name was applied to the praetorian camp, situated at Rome. [Map in pref. to Romans, and cut (d) end of Ezek.] See Acts 23:16. where it is related, that Paul was delivered in charge to the praefectus praetorii, and bound with a chain to a soldier? Bl. From his situation, being frequently present at, or habitually hearing talk about the military exercises, &c. of the camp, (note, end of Eph.,) Paul seems to have borrowed some striking allusions, comp. 2 Tim. 2:3—5. Eph. 6:11—17. Ed. 'In Rome, the public hall, where the praetor determined causes; or more commonly a place without the city, where the praetorian cohorts, [comp. plan of Rome, pref. to Rom.] or regiments of guard, were stationed: in the provinces, the governor's palace, Mk. 15:16. Acts 23:35. both because the governors administered justice there, and there had also their guards stationed. The apostle, though writing from Rome, yet writing to those in the provinces, uses the word here in the provincial sense.' MACKNIGHT.

(14.) Persecution helps what it would hinder, as it always excites our best sympathies in favor of the persecuted. Hence the proverb, 'The blood of the martyrs is the seed of the church.'

V. 15. It is not certain who these preachers [who preached Christ out of envy and strife] were, or whether they meant to excite divisions between the Jewish and Gentile converts, or to stir up the persecuting rage of idolaters against the apostle, for boldly propagating a doctrine heartened. Upright men shall be astonished at this, and the innocent shall stir up himself against the hypocrite. The righteous also shall hold on his way, and he who hath clean hands shall be stronger and stronger, Job 17: 8, 9.

When his friends saw Paul imprisoned for Christ, they were so far from being deterred from preaching Christ, and praising his name, that it made them the more bold; they could gladly suffer in Paul's company. Besides the comfort Paul had in his sufferings, his extraordinary consolations, received from Christ, greatly encouraged them. They were more fully satisfied and persuaded by what they saw. Observe the power of divine grace; what was intended by the enemy to discourage the preachers of the Gospel, was overruled for their encouragement. And are much more bold to speak the Word without fear: they see the worst of it, therefore are not afraid to venture. Their confidence gave them courage, and their courage preserved them from fear.

II. Paul suffered from false friends, as well as from enemies, v. 15, 16. and they thought to grieve his spirit, and make him afraid of losing his interest, uneasy under his confinement, and impatient for release. This might stumble some; and it is sad, that there should be men who should preach the Gospel through party strife.

However, others were animated by Paul's suffering, to preach Christ the more vigorously, and from sincere affection. They knew Paul was appointed to support and propagate the Gospel, and were afraid lest it should suffer by his confinement. This made them the more bold to preach the Word, and supply his lack of service to the church.

It is very affecting to see how easy the apostle was, in the midst of all, v. 18. so far from envying those who had liberty while he was in confinement, he rejoiced in the preaching of the Gospel, even by those who did it in pretence, and not in truth. How much more then should we rejoice in the preaching of the Gospel, by them who do it in truth, yea, though it should be with much weakness, and some mistake!

He rejoices in the preaching of the Gospel:

1. As tending to the salvation of the souls of men, v. 19. What reward can they expect, who preach Christ out of strife, and envy, and contention, and to add affliction to a faithful minister's bonds; who preach in pretence, and not in truth? And yet even this may turn to the salvation of others; and Paul's rejoicing in it turned to his salvation, too. This noble spirit appeared in John the Baptist, at the first public preaching of Christ, Jn. 3:29, 30. 'Let Him shine, though I am obscured; and his glory be exalted, though on my ruins.' Others understand it of the malice of his enemies being defeated, and contributing toward his deliverance from his confinement; through your prayers, and the supply of the Spirit of Christ. Note, Whatever turns to our salvation, is by the supply, or the aids and assistance of, the Spirit of Christ; and prayer is the appointed means of fetching in that supply.

2. It would turn to the glory of Christ, v. 20, where he takes occasion to mention his own entire devotedness to the service and honor of Christ. His great desire was, as it is of every true Christian, that Christ may be magnified and glorified; that his name may be great, and his kingdom come; that Christ may be magnified with every member of his body, Rom. 6:13. as well as faculty of his soul. In nothing would he be ashamed of Christ; but would serve Him boldly, with freedom and liberty of mind, and without discouragement. The boldness of Christians is the honor of Christ; and Paul, if Christ may be magnified in his body, will maintain a holy indifference, whether it be by life or by death. He refers it to Him, which way He will make him serviceable to his glory, whether by labor or suffering; by diligence or patience; by living to his honor in working for Him, or dying to his honor in suffering for Him.

V. 21—26. We have here an account of the life and death of blessed Paul: his life was Christ, and his death gain. It might be thought, if death was his gain, he would be weary of life, and impatient for death. No, says he, v. 22. If I live in the flesh, this subversive of idolatry, or that of the emperor and statesmen against him, for 'preaching another King, one Jesus.' But the whole tenor of his writings and conduct shows, that if the doctrine which they taught had been materially erroneous, he would have opposed them, instead of rejoicing in the success of the preachers. Gal. 1:6—10. 2:1—5. SCOTT.

(15.) Some from envy and strife.] 'Who? Not surely regenerated men? Yet, is it not possible? May not jealousy appear [even] in the ministry? Alas! where, or in what state on earth, is a child of God exempt from corruption, in all that pertains to the flesh? As to those who preached Christ out of good-will, there is something very blessed in it. But what we have most to admire here is, that the great soul of the apostle rejoiced at everything, and in everything, provided Christ was the one glorious subject of all preaching.' HAWKER.

V. 16. To add, &c.] By ruining Paul's reputation, and so strengthening his enemies; also, by exciting the fury of the ignorant multitude, or rulers, against him; and to increase the severity of his bonds, by malignantly preaching Christ with excessive publicity. See Doddr. and Bl. Ed.

(18.) What, then, signifies saying more? Paul thinks, it was better the heathens and Jews should have some, than no knowledge of Christ. See Rosenm. and Bloomf. Let those consider this, who object to missions, and withhold their aid, because they are not in their view perfect, or precisely such as they would have them. Id.

V. 19. Salvation.] The connexion between 'salvation,' and the 'supply of the Spirit of Christ,' fully proves, that eternal salvation and not temporal deliverance was meant. Rom. 3:11—14. SCOTT.

(19.) 'Some refer this to a temporal deliverance; but Doddr. observes, that such an event could not be said to proceed from the supply of the Spirit of Christ.' HENRY, abr.

V. 21—26. With peculiar animation, the apostle here declared the happy frame of his mind, in his perilous situation. He had no other

PRACT. OBS. V. 21—30. We are most of us very far from having made that progress in the divine life which holy Paul had; yet, if true believers, we habitually consider Christ as 'our Life.' Our main interest, work, honor, and comfort in this world, are centered in Him, and his glory is the great end, to which we would direct all our conduct. In proportion to the depth of our experience in this respect, should be our well-grounded assurance, that to 'die will be our gain.' If we have this earnest of our inheritance, death can take us away from nothing but what is vain, vexatious, defiling, ensnaring, and utterly insufficient for our felicity; and it will convey us to the fountain-head of those holy joys, which here we relished, and from time to time had tastes of, but were never able to participate without alloy or interruption; and what a blessedness must that be, which can render death the richest gain, and make us long earnestly for the approach of 'the king of terrors,' as the messenger of our Father, to put us in possession of our eternal inheritance!—How cold and heartless, compared with this, are philosophy's applauded antidotes against the fear of death! We cannot read even business, interest, honor, or pleasure, for which 'to live,' but Christ, and his glory, service, and favor.—'Christ is gain to me living and dying,' (21.) Thus Beza, and many others, tr. and understand the words; but the antithesis between the two parts of the v. is thus destroyed; the meaning is comparatively cold, nay, selfish; and, though I would speak diffidently, after such eminently learned critics, the original seems incapable of this construction.—'The original is the highest superlative which it is possible to form in any language.' Mackn. 'Better, beyond all comparison and expression.' Doddr. 'Could Paul think a state of insensibility much better than a life tending so much, as his did, to the glory of God, to the propagation of the Gospel, and to the furtherance of the joy of Christians?' Whitby.—'The doctrine of the soul's immediate happiness, with Christ in glory, is here declared, beyond almost the possibility of doubt, except as men disbelieve the apostle's testimony. 2 Cor. 5:1—8. SCOTT.

(21, 22.) 'Life has its enjoyments, and is not the contemptible thing we make it, but heaven on earth, when it is conducted on right principles, directed to a right end, and devoted to the will of God. What would we have more, when the way to heaven is through heaven; if quiet passions, regular desires, contented minds, pure wills, well-grounded hopes, holy longings, happy foretastes, communion with God, and reconciliation to death, can make it so.'

(22.) 'But if my life, in the flesh, be of use to the Gospel (be it so, I say no more), verily, what I shall choose, I see and know not.' Bl.

(23.) 'In a strait.' A nautical phraseology, in allusion to a ship at anchor, and yet likely to be forced to sea by the winds; which represents Paul's attachment to his position in the church, and the vehemence of his desire to be unbound, for so the Gr. Doddr.—'This plainly proves, church. Yet Paul was in a strait betwixt two, not two evil things, but two good things, two blessings,—living to Christ, and being with Him. Here we have him reasoning with himself on the matter.

I. His inclination was for death. See the power of faith and of divine grace; it can make us willing to die, though death is the greatest natural evil, v. 23. having a desire to depart, and to be with Christ. Observe, 1. It is being with Christ, which makes a departure desirable to a good man. 2. As soon as ever the soul departs, it is immediately with Christ, Lu. 23: 43. 2 Cor. 5: 8. and this is far better, very much exceeding, or vastly preferable: for if we come to be with Christ, farewell sin and temptation, farewell sorrow and death, for ever!

II. His judgment was, rather to live a while longer in this world, for the service of the church, v. 24. Observe, They who have most reason to desire to depart, should be willing to continue in the world as long as God has any work for them to do. Thus, to advance the interest of Christ and his church, Paul chose rather to tarry here, where he met with oppositions and difficulties, and to deny himself for a while the satisfaction of his reward. Nay, he had confidence, that he should abide and continue with them all for their furtherance and joy of faith, v. 25. He had great confidence that Divine Providence would order all for the best to him; for whatsoever is best for the church, we may be sure God will do. Observe, what ministers are continued for: for our furtherance and joy of faith, our further advancement in holiness and comfort. What promotes our faith, and joy of faith, is very much for our furtherance in the way to heaven. There is need of a settled ministry, not only for the conviction and conversion of sinners, but for the edification of saints, and their furtherance in spiritual attainments.

So the apostle would add to the joy of the Philippians in his hope of coming to them again, v. 26. Observe, The continuance of ministers with the church, ought to be the rejoicing of all who wish well to its interests. All our joys should terminate in Christ. Our joy in good ministers should be our joy in Christ Jesus for them; for they are but the friends of the Bridegroom, and are to be received in his name, and for his sake.

V. 27—30. The ch. concludes with two exhortations:

I. To strictness of conversation, v. 27. Observe, They who profess the Gospel of Christ, should have their conversation as becomes the Gospel, or in a suitableness and agreeableness to it. It is an ornament to our profession, when our conversation is of a piece with it. He had spoken, in v. 26. of his coming to them again, and had spoken it with some assurance, though now a prisoner; but he would not have them build on that. Our religion must not be bound up in the hands of our ministers; 'Whether I come or no, let me hear well of you, and do you stand fast.' Whether ministers come or no, Christ is always at hand, Ja. 5: 8. Let me hear of you, that you stand fast in one spirit, with one mind striving together for the faith of the Gospel. Three things he desired to hear of them; and they are all such as become the Gospel.

1. It becomes those who profess the Gospel, to strive for it, to use a holy violence in taking the kingdom of heaven. A man may sleep and go to hell; but he who will go to heaven, must look about him and be diligent.

2. The unity and unanimity of Christians become the Gospel; Strive together, not one with another: all of you must strive against the common adversary. There may be a oneness of heart and affection among Christians, where there is diversity of judgment and apprehensions about many things.

3. Steadfastness becomes the Gospel; Stand fast, &c. It is a shame to religion when the professors of it are off and on, unstable in their minds; such will never excel.

II. He exhorts them to courage and constancy in suffering, v. 28. Our great care must be to keep close to our profession, whatever oppositions we meet with; consid-

Cicero on this subject, without feeling that his vigorous genius languishes for want of interesting topics, and that he at last advances nothing which can at all satisfy the mind, in the prospect of dissolution, and of an unexplored, eternal state. Yet it can hardly be expected, that all believers should be found thus superior to the love of life, and the fear of death; and thus willing to live and suffer, from love to their brethren, when assured of their own salvation. Nor should we 'despise the day of small things,' either in ourselves or others, though we should press forward to this full assurance of hope, this fervor of longing, grateful love, and this entire submission to the Lord's will. This should be our primary, personal concern; and all the company of believers, however divided and subdivided, should consider themselves as one great army; and endeavor to 'stand fast in one spirit, with one mind, striving together for the faith of the Gospel,' and to recommend the salvation of Christ to all around them, and diffuse the knowledge of it to 'every creature under heaven,' as far as possible; [and, blessed be God, the facilities for extending his kingdom multiply daily.] SCOTT.

that the separate spirits of good men are with Christ, in such a manner that their state is far better than while they continue in this world; which a state of insensibility cannot possibly be. But Fleming very justly observes, that it will not at all disprove that large accession of happiness after the resurrection, which other Scriptures plainly declare. The Gr. is here tr. far better; I know not how more justly to express it, than to render better, beyond all expression. DODDR.

(24.) Needful. As if he said, There is no need of my going to heaven now, but there is need of my doing my duty, now and always. EN.

(25.) Know. 'I. e. have strong confidence of being spared to you till God raise another in my place.' See Stade. The expression, abide and continue with you, is a strong one, indicating, not continuance in life, but occasional enjoyment of their society; a beautiful trait of the overflowing kindness of the apostle's heart. BLOOMER.

V. 27—30. The Gr. tr. 'conversation,' denotes the conduct of citizens, when it accords to their privileges, and tends to the credit, safety, peace, and prosperity of the city. Thus, having been most graciously made citizens of the heavenly Jerusalem, they ought to act suitably to that high character, and to seek the honor of the Gospel, and the welfare of the church, in all their actions.—Many expositors are very exact, in this and other passages, in distinguishing between the persecutions, which the apostle and the churches were exposed to from the Jews, and those which they endured from the Gentiles. But this rather embarrasses than clears the interpretation; and the practical instructor, if not best sight of, is the same in either case. No doubt, the Jews excited most of the persecutions, to which the apostle was exposed: and his zeal for the admission of the Gentiles into the church, without circumcision, or regard to the ritual law, rendered him peculiarly obnoxious

CHAP. II.

<sup>1</sup> He exhorteth them to unity, and to all humbleness of mind, by the example of Christ's humility and exaltation: <sup>12</sup> to a careful proceeding in the way of salvation, that they be as lights to the wicked world, <sup>15</sup> and comforts to him their apostle, who is now ready to be offered up to God. <sup>19</sup> He hopeth to send Timothy to them, whom he greatly commendeth, <sup>25</sup> as Epaphroditus also, whom he presently sendeth to them.

IF there be therefore any consolation in Christ, if any comfort of love, if any fellowship of the Spirit, if any <sup>a</sup> bowels and mercies, <sup>2</sup> Fulfil <sup>b</sup> ye my joy, that ye be <sup>c</sup> like-minded, having the same love, being of one accord, of one mind.

<sup>6</sup> Who, being <sup>h</sup> in the form of God, thought it not robbery to be equal <sup>i</sup> with God:

ering the condition of the persecuted much better and more desirable than that of the persecutors. Opposers of the Gospel are marked out for ruin; but being persecuted, is a token of salvation. Not a certain mark; many hypocrites have suffered for their religion; but it is a good sign we are in good earnest in religion, and designed for salvation, when we are enabled in a right manner to suffer for the cause of Christ.

<sup>V. 29.</sup> For to you it is given on the behalf of Christ, not only to believe, but also to suffer for his name. Here are two precious gifts given, and both on the behalf of Christ; not only the blessedness which is the object of faith, but the grace of faith itself: the ability and disposition to believe is from God. To suffer for the sake of Christ, is a valuable gift, too, a great honor, a great advantage; for we may be very serviceable to the glory of God, which is the end of our creation, and encourage and confirm the faith of others. And there is a great reward attending it, too, Mat. 5: 11, 12. <sup>2</sup> Tim. 2: 12. always provided we behave under our sufferings with the genuine temper of the martyrs and confessors, v. 30. Having the same conflict which ye saw in me, and now hear to be in me; you suffering in the same manner as you saw, and now hear of me that I suffer. It is not simply the suffering, but the cause; and not only the cause but the spirit, which makes the martyr.

CHAP. II. V. 1—11. The apostle here further exhorts to Christian duties.

<sup>1.</sup> The great gospel-precept to love one another. This he represents, v. 2. We are of a like mind when we have the same love. Christians should be one in affection; it is always in their power, always their duty, and the likeliest way to bring them nearer in judgment. Having the same love. Christian love ought to be mutual love. Love, and you shall be loved: Being of one accord, &c. not crossing and thwarting, or driving on separate interests; but unanimously agreeing in the great things of God, and keeping the unity of the Spirit in other differences. Observe,

Consolation in Christ. 'Have you experienced consolation in Christ? Evidence that experience by loving one another.' Or 'Do we expect consolation in Christ? If we would not be disappointed, we must love one another.'

Comfort of love. 'If there is any comfort in God's love to you, in your love to God, or in your brethren's love, be ye like-minded.'

Fellowship of the Spirit. 'If there is such a thing as communion with God and Christ, by the Spirit, such a thing as the communion of saints, by virtue of their being animated and actuated by one and the same Spirit; be ye like-minded: for Christian love and like-mindedness will preserve to us our communion with God, and with one another.'

Any bowels and mercies, in God and Christ toward you. 'If ye expect the benefit of God's compassions to yourselves, be ye compassionate one to another. If there is such a thing as mercy among the followers of Christ; if all who are sanctified have a disposition to holy pity; make it appear this way.'

Another argument he insinuates, is, the comfort it would be to him; Fulfil ye my joy. It is the joy of ministers to see people like-minded, and living in love.

<sup>2.</sup> Some means to promote it. Do nothing through strife and vainglory, v. 3. There is no greater enemy to Christian love, than pride and passion. If we do things in contradiction to our brethren, that is doing them through strife; if we do them through ostentation of ourselves, that is doing them through vainglory; both are destructive of Christian love, and kindle unchristian heats.

We must esteem others, in lowliness of mind, better than ourselves; be severe on our own faults, and charitable in our judgment of others; quick to observe our own defects, but ready to overlook, or make favorable allowances for, those of others. We must esteem the good in others above that in ourselves; FOR WE BEST KNOW OUR OWN UNWORTHINESS AND IMPERFECTIONS.

We must interest ourselves in the concerns of others, not in a way of curiosity and censoriousness, or as busy-bodies in other men's matters, but in Christian love and sympathy, v. 4. A selfish spirit is destructive of Christian love. We must love our neighbor as ourselves, and make his case our own.

<sup>II.</sup> Here is a gospel-pattern proposed to our imitation, and that is the example of our Lord Jesus Christ, v. 5. Christians must be of Christ's mind, Rom. 8: 9. Now what was his mind? Eminently humble, and this we are peculiarly to learn of Him, Mat. 11: 29. If lowly-minded, we should be like-minded; and if like to Christ, lowly-minded. Now here we have the two natures, and the two states, of our Lord Jesus. Observe, The apostle, having occasion to mention the Lord Jesus, and the mind which was in Him, takes the hint to enlarge on his Person, and to give a particular description of Him. It is a pleasing subject, and a gospel-minister needs not think himself out of the way when upon it; any fit occasion should be readily taken.

to them. But it is also evident, that zeal for idolatry and for local customs, and fear of innovations and insurrections, joined with enmity against God and holiness, disposed the Gentiles generally to concur, and often to take the lead in persecution. Acts 19:23—41.—Striving together. Contending like wrestlers, earnestly, but in concert with each other, against their common antagonists. (29) It is given. 'To suffer for Christ's sake, is grace and favor (7.)' Whitby. If so, then 'to believe in Christ,' is grace, the free gift of God, though not unconnected with our exertions, attendance on the means of grace, and prayers. SCOTT.

(27.) Only, &c. 'On this passage, so finely representing his own views and hopes, and their glorious Christian prospects, Paul skillfully engrafs an admonition which, from the frailty of human nature can never be unseasonable, and is here introduced most impressively. — Come. It will be observed, he does not say he shall come, nor indicate any time at which he should be present.' BLOOMF.

(28.) Terrified, &c. 'Hence, and from several other passages in this epistle, it evidently appears, the Philippians were now in a suffering state, a circumstance to be borne in mind, as it illustrates several masterly strokes in the apostle's address to them.' DODDR.

NOTES CHAP. II. V. 1—4. (Notes, 1:27—30. Eph. 4:1—6.) The apostle evidently deemed harmony among Christians essential to 'a conversation becoming the Gospel.'—Consolation. The original word signifies exhortation, as well as consolation, or rather an encouraging and animating exhortation. The authority of Christ, speaking by his apostle, as well as the consolation derived from Him, seems implied. The expressions which follow are varied to include all that can be imagined, in the most cordial amity, unity, and sympathy. Let them live together as members of one body, animated by one soul. 1 Cor. 12:12—26. 13: 4—7. SCOTT.

(1.) 'If ye would give me any consolation in my straits, any love-hegotten comfort; if ye will show that ye have any fellowship with me in spirituals, and as to Christ; if ye pity, and your bowels yearn over me for my sufferings; recompense me all these by loving one another.' THEORN. and so Theod., Chrys., &c., and the Syr. Tr. But Bl. prefers to tr. koinōnía pneumatos, 'unity of mind.' Ed.

V. 5—8. To illustrate and enforce, in the most effectual manner, that conduct which he had recommended, the apostle here called on Christians, to cultivate and manifest the same mind, judgment, and disposition, which had been so conspicuous in Christ Jesus. Rom. 8:5—9. The example can never be done justice to by human language, and all our imitation of such immense condescension, compassion, self-abasement, self-denial, and liberal, laborious, forgiving, patient, suffering love, must necessarily fall infinitely short of it. In this view of the subject, how important and energetic is the apostle's argument! How striking is the illustration!—But Socinians and others have labored to prove, that the apostle only meant, that 'the Man Jesus, though He acted as the Ambassador and Representative of God, did not think of robbing Him of his glory, by claiming equality with God!' Now this would sink the meaning, not only into insipidity, but absurdity: for it would propose as an example of the most perfect love, self-denial, and humility, a bare exemption from the most horrible impiety and ambition imaginable! as certainly it must be such, for a mere creature, in any possible circumstances, to harbor a thought of aspiring to equality in honor and majesty with the infinite God. Indeed, this sense cannot be consistent with our Lord's frequent and most express declarations concerning Himself. (Jn. 5:17, 18, 23. 8:58. 10:30—33. 14:9, 10.) Nay, the whole interpretation of the passage must be forced and unnatural: the reality of our Lord's human nature, 'in the likeness of man,' and 'in fashion as a man,' might as justly be questioned, as the reality of his Deity; who 'was in the form of God,' and his 'taking upon Him the form of a servant,' and 'becoming obedient,' are unmeaning words, on the Socinian interpretation, but exceedingly emphatical on that [see Henry, above] before proposed.—On a portion of Scripture of so great importance, both in respect of its general import, and also in the argument concerning our Lord's Deity; and which, at the same time, has been perplexed by discordant interpretations, more than most other passages; something additional may be properly adduced. 'Who does not perceive, that Paul declares what Christ was, before He assumed "the form of a servant?"... Christ Himself, when He was God, and consequently in that glory and majesty which belong to God alone; and when He did not think that He usurped anything not belonging to Him; yet, as laying aside this glory, abased Himself, even so far as to become such as the servants of God are, i. e. to "become man:" yea, and then also He conducted Himself towards the Father, not as towards his equal, but his Lord; so that He voluntarily submitted to undergo the most ignominious death! And shall not we, mortal and mean slaves, be ashamed of our arrogance, in acting as if we excelled our brethren? This, I say, is Paul's argument, than which nothing can be more weighty and forcible. . . . "He thought it not robbery." Or, as a most learned interpreter renders it, "He did not think it a prey to be seized on." For He refers that which follows to the manifestation made in the flesh; that this should be the meaning; Christ, as God, possessed of eternal glory and majesty, knew indeed that

J Ps. 22:6. k Lu. 22:27. l or, habit. m He. 12:2.

It was just and lawful for Him to appear, not in humble flesh, but with a dignity worthy of God; but He chose rather to abase Himself. . . But I think that this also belongs to the pristine glory of Christ, which He mentions, Jn. 17:5. and that this is the meaning: Christ, when possessed of that eternal glory of Deity, was not ignorant, that in this thing, (i. e. in being coequal with God the Father,) He did no injury to any one, but used his own right: nevertheless He, as it were, receded from his right, when He reduced Himself even to nothing, by "taking on Him the form of a servant." Beza.—The word, rendered robbery, is not found in any other place in the N. T., and but very seldom in other writers; yet the derivation of it fixes it to the meaning given to it in our tr. The word rendered equal, is isa, not ison; and many have argued from this circumstance, that similitude, not equality is meant; but the learned Bp. Pearson has shown, that isa, especially used with einai, may express equality as well as ison.—Socinus inquires, 'How can God be said to be equal to Himself?' To this, it may be answered, that the Son may be equal to the Father, in the unity of the Godhead, which is all that the apostle's language implies, and all that Trinitarians contend for: nor can this be denied, without hegging the question, and denying that there is any distinction of Persons in the unity of the Godhead.—'He emptied Himself, taking the form of a servant; being made in the likeness of men.' Thus Bp. Pearson literally tr. v. 7.—'If any man doubt how Christ 'emptied Himself,' the text will satisfy him; By 'taking on Him the form of a servant;' and if any still question, how 'He took on Him the form of a servant,' he has the apostle's answer; By 'being made in the likeness of men.'—Here it may be observed, that if Christ had originally been a creature of God, He must have been also his servant, before his incarnation: and this is conclusive against the Arians, as well as the Socinians.—So afterwards, 'Being found in fashion as a man, He humbled Himself, becoming obedient unto death, even the death of the cross.' As therefore his humiliation consisted in his obedience unto death; so his emptying Himself, consisted in 'taking on Him the form of a servant,' and that in the nature of man. The clauses are connected in the original, not by way of conjunction, in which there might be some diversity; but by way of opposition, which signifies a clear identity. The grand point, in order to understand the passage, is this, to determine in what sense Christ 'was in the form of God,' and how 'He emptied Himself;' and the above remarks, suggested by Bp. Pearson's learned and able disquisitions on the passage, and sometimes in his words, give, as it appears to me, the most complete satisfaction. (Note, Mat. 17:1, 2).—The passage indeed is full to the point, as to our Lord's Deity; and all, who oppose this construction of it, are evidently baffled in the argument: so that, after all their efforts, it stands unmoved, as the deep-rooted rocks amidst the raging billows. But, had some deeper impression been made on it, the Bible would still afford the humble believer abundant proof of this 'great Mystery of godliness,' on which every well-grounded human hope must be established. 1 Tim. 3:16.

(6.) Being in the form of God. [En morphē Theou huparchōn: Whitl., Wolf, Crnpz., Ellis, Mackn., very ingeniously interpret thus: "As Paul is speaking of what Christ was, before He took the form of a bondman, the form of God, of which He is said in v. 7. to have divested Himself when He became man, cannot be anything which He possessed, during his incarnation, or in his divested state; consequently, neither Erasmus' opinion, that the form of God consisted in those sparks of divinity, by which Christ, during his incarnation, manifested his Godhead, nor the opinion of the Socinians, that it consisted of the power of working miracles, is well founded. For Christ did not divest Himself either of the one or the other, but possessed both during the whole time of his public ministry. In like manner, the opinion of those who, by the form of God, understand the divine nature and the government of the world, cannot be admitted; since Christ, when He became man, could not divest Himself of the nature of God; and, with respect to the government of the world, we are led by Heb. 1:3. to believe He did not part even with that, but, in his divested state, still upheld all things by the word of his power. Wherefore the opinion of Whitley, &c., adds Mackn., seems better founded, who by the form of God, understand, the visible glorious light, in which the Deity is said to dwell, 1 Tim. 6:16. and by which He manifested Himself to the patriarchs of old, De. 5:22, 24. which was commonly accompanied with a numerous retinue of angels, Ps. 69:17. and which is called the similitude of the Lord, Nu. 12:8. the

1. The two natures of Christ.

(1.) His divine nature; in the form of God, v. 6. This agrees with Jn. 1:1. and of the same import are Col. 1:15. and Heb. 1:3. He thought it not robbery to be equal with God; did not think Himself guilty of any invasion of what did not belong to Him, or assuming another's right, Jn. 10:30. It is the highest robbery for any mere man [any creature] to pretend to be equal with God, or profess Himself one with the Father. This is for a man to rob God, not in tithes and offerings, but of the rights of his Godhead, Mal. 3:8.

Some understand being in the form of God, of his appearance, in a divine majestic glory, to the patriarchs, and the Jews, under the O. T.; often called the glory, and the Shechinah. The word is used in such a sense by the LXX, and in the N. T.; Mk. 16:

face, Ps. 31:16. the presence, Ex. 33:15. and the shape, Jn. 5:37. This interpretation is supported by the term morphē, here, which signifies a person's external shape, or appearance, and not his nature or essence. Thus Mk. 16:12. Mat. 17:2. This form He had with the Father before the world was, Jn. 18:5. Heb. 1:3. and He will appear again with it at the last day, Mat. 16:27. Lastly, the sense of morphē Theou is confirmed by the sense morphēn doulou, [form of a servant,] v. 7. which evidently denotes the appearance and behavior of a bondman, not that Christ was really any person's bondman or slave."

'Yet the proofs of this interpretation seem not such as should induce us to abandon that of the ancients and early moderns, which has also been maintained by many eminent comtrs. for the last century and a half; and among the rest, the great Bp. Pearson, Bull, Burnet, Elsner, &c. in Wolf, and recently Schl. and the venerable Bp. Burgess, also Bp. Tomline, and Abp. Magee, who explain morphē, by metonymy, the very nature and essence, the phusis and ousia. So Valpy: "being in the form and nature of God," i. e. being really God. Of this signification several examples are produced by Elsner and Schl., as Plato, de Rep. 2 p. 431. I am not willing, I confess, to desert our ancient and venerable guides, who, in points regarding the Divinity of our blessed Savior, the Trinity, &c., rise far above the moderns. Indeed, from whence have the mighty champions of orthodoxy in modern times derived their most powerful arms, but from this quarter, as the works of Bps. Pearson and Bull prove. See D'Oyley and Mant. Bp. Bull (in Burgess) says, this passage is almost sufficient for the refutation of all heresies respecting the Person of our Lord Jesus Christ; as Chrys., Theoph., and Phot., had before said.

'The interpretation of the Socinians, though supported by the acuteness of Crell., and the learning of Grot., Le Clerc, and Ros., will not bear examination, and has been completely refuted by many moderns; see Wolf. Bp. Burnet (in Doddr.) well observes, that "it is extremely cold and insipid, as if it were a mighty argument of humility, that though Christ wrought miracles, which they strangely think signified by 'being in the form of God,' yet He did not set up for supreme deity!" Huparchōn, some (as Suidas) think, imports pre-existence; but it seems sufficient to suppose the word may import subsisting in the real form of God, one with, and equal to, the Father.'

BLOOMP.

As to thought it not robbery, &c., Bl. prefers (with Greg., Naz., Bp. Middleton, the ancients, and Ros. and Schl., in part) the explanation of Theoph. and Chrys. 'He did not eagerly seize and tenaciously hold; thus says Theoph. "When any one seizes anything, he is afraid to lay it down, lest he should lose it, as being not his own: but when any one has anything by nature, he can very well disregard it, knowing that he has something which he cannot lose; and if he chooses to lay it down, he can take it up again. Paul therefore means to say, 'The Son of God was not afraid to descend from his own dignity, since he had not this by rapine, namely, the being equal with God the Father, but knew it was his natural dignity. Therefore He chose even to humble Himself, as, even in his humiliation, still retaining his exaltedness.'" So Theod.

ED.

'As to the words, to be equal with God (to einai isa Theō), few things ever more surprised me, on seriously applying myself, with the apparatus of very many years of classical study, to the interpretation of the N. T., than to find that so many eminent moderns (after Whitley), maintain isa to signify not equality with, but similarity to; a signification of which there are many examples in the classics, but none, I think, in such a context as the present. It is a frivolous argument (of Whitley), that, if Paul had meant equality with, he would have written ison, as Jn. 5:18. for Paul is not John, and often uses greater liberties than this. Indeed, I see no reason to desert the universal opinion of the ancients and early moderns, that isa is put for ison. And so that learned and accurate scholar Schl. revives this opinion, though scouted by the German comtrs.; and gives, as examples, Job 5:4. 10:10. 15:16. Hippocr. Jureju. col. i. p. 42. Ælian, V. H. 8, 38; referring also to Glass, Phil. Sacr. p. 65. I have also met with several instances in the classics, and I think isa is put for kat' isa merō, at equal shares, on an equal footing, equality. Doddr. and Slade tr. "to be even as God, assuming the highest divine names, titles, and attributes, by which God has made Himself known, and receiving from his servants divine honors and adoration." This is the same sense, but liable to perversion. Finally, Schl. renders, "non rapinam duxit, Dei personam sustinere, seu æqualem naturā et majestatem Deo esse."

BLOOMP.

(6—8.) The word translated "robbery," J. P. Smith would render, with many of the fathers, "an object to be caught at;" considering the sense to be, that our Lord did not ostentatiously show, or glory and boast, of his being equal with God. He adds: "whether this allusion be admitted or not is of little importance; as in any case the idea is plainly indicated, that the object intended would not have been, to Jesus Christ, an act of seizure, a usurpation, a thing to which He had no right, but on the contrary that to which He had a just claim, to waive which is shown by this passage to have been an act of the most gracious condescension and humiliation."—"In the form of God," J. P. Smith considers may be expressed as having the characteristics of God. He observes, that, with respect to this contrast, "if the characteristics of human nature mark the Savior incontrovertibly to be man, so the distinguishing characteristics of God must denote that which is peculiar and distinctive to the Divine Being. "He humbled Himself." The idea is, that of reduction from a previous state of fulness or excellency, referring to a pre-existent state of dignity and glory." J. P. Smith. "He humbled Himself." J. P. Smith considers this is to be understood in the sense of the O. T. phrase, "to afflict the soul," an expression applied to persons who underwent voluntary sufferings from religious motives. He remarks on all the parts of the passage, "that, under every variety of fair interpretation, none appears tenable which does not recognize a nature

12. He appeared to the two disciples, in another form: Mat. 17:2. He was transfigured before them. And, He thought it not robbery to be equal with God; He did not greedily catch at, or covet and affect to appear in that glory; He laid aside the majesty of his former appearances, while here on earth; which is supposed the sense of the peculiar expression. Vid. Bp. Bull's Def. cap. 2. sect. 4. et alibi, and Whitby in locum, [and Macknight.]

(2.) His human nature; He was made in the likeness of men, and found in fashion as a man. He was really and truly man; took part of our flesh and blood; appeared in the nature and habit of man, and voluntarily. Herein He emptied Himself; divested Himself of the honors and glories of the upper world, and of his former appearance.

2. His two estates.

(1.) Of humiliation. He not only took

V. 9—11. When the eternal Word, 'the Son of God,' had fulfilled his engagements as our incarnate Surety; God the Father 'most highly exalted Him,' in our nature, by advancing Him to the mediatorial throne. For the two circumstances, that it is Christ, as Man, who is thus exalted, and that He is exalted as Mediator, renders this perfectly consistent with his eternal glory and dominion, as 'God over all, blessed for evermore.' (Ref.—Notes, Ja. 5:20—23.) The absolute kingdom of the Creator, and the mediatorial kingdom of the Redeemer, established for the benefit and salvation of rebels against the Creator, who are condemned by his law, must be distinguished. (Note, 1 Cor. 15:20—23.) It was in consequence of the engagements of the eternal Son, that the reign of mercy was introduced. (Note, Jn. 1:17.) For this 'joy set before Him, He endured the cross, &c.' (Note, Heb. 12:2, 3.) Nothing could be deducted from his authority as God, nor anything added to it: but it did not consist with the honor of the divine law, and justice, to deal with men, except through a Mediator, who was One with the Father; and One with them, their Surety, Sacrifice, and Intercessor. The mediatorial kingdom alone was 'given' to Christ, and given to Him as Man: but had He not been God also, and possessed of all divine perfections, how could He possibly have administered it? (Note, Mat. 28:18.) Thus God the Father 'gave Him a name,' and a degree of honor and authority, above that of every other name; so that no created being ever was or could be so honored, as He was, who had been 'the Man of sorrows,' and was crucified between two thieves! (Ref.—Notes, Eph. 1:9—12, 15—23.) Inasmuch that, 'at the name of Jesus,' the name given to a poor Babe, born in a stable, and laid in the manger, (because that Babe was Emmanuel, 'God with us,' that Child born, that Son given, was the 'mighty God,') 'every knee should bow,' in submission and adoration. (Notes, Mat. 1:20—23. Lu. 2:8—14. Rev. 5:11—14.) I. e. all rational creatures should either willingly adore Him; or be punished as the enemies of God and his kingdom. This includes angels and saints in heaven, men on earth, the bodies of the dead who are under the earth, the souls of the wicked in a separate state; and indeed all the principalities and powers of darkness. In short, 'every tongue shall confess,' every creature must, one way or another, acknowledge, 'that Jesus Christ is Lord,' the Lord of all, 'the Lord of glory,' yea, JEHOVAH the Savior; and this will be so far from interfering with the honor of God the Father (as Anti-trinitarians object) that it will be to his glory. For 'He and the Father are One;' and the whole Deity is more displayed and glorified, in the Person and Redemption of Christ, before the whole universe, than by all other divine operations and discoveries; so that all the honor and worship which is rendered to the Person of the Son, as 'God manifest in the flesh,' is virtually rendered to the Godhead through the medium of his humanity, by which alone sinners can know, approach, or worship the infinite God. (Ref.—Notes, 1:9—11. v. 11. Ps. 2:10—12. Is. 45:20—25. Ro. 14:10—12.) 'Surely in JEHOVAH have I righteousness and strength.' This is the language, which both here and in the parallel passage in Rom., Paul applies to Jesus; when he says, 'Every tongue shall confess that Jesus Christ is Lord.' Can his meaning be doubted? SCOTT.

the likeness of a man, but the form of a servant, i. e. a man of mean estate. One would think He should have been a Prince, in splendor. But quite the contrary; He took the form of a servant. This was the humiliation of his life. But the lowest step was his dying on the cross; He became obedient to death, even the death of the cross. He not only suffered, but was actually and voluntarily obedient, Jn. 10:18. And He was made under the law, Gal. 4:4. Emphasis is laid on the manner of his dying, which had in it all the humbling circumstances possible; even the death of the cross, a cursed, painful, shameful death; a death accused by the law; full of pain, the body nailed through the nervous parts, and hanging with all its weight on the cross; and the death of a malefactor and a slave, not of a freeman; and exposed as a public spectacle. Such was the condescension of the blessed Jesus!

(2.) His exaltation, v. 9. This was the reward of his humiliation; because He humbled Himself, God exalted Him, his whole Person; as respects the divine nature, it could only be a recognizing his rights, or the display and appearance of the glory He had with the Father before the world was, Jn. 17:5. not any new acquisition of glory; and so the Father Himself is said to be exalted. But the proper exaltation was of his human nature, which alone seems to be capable of it, though in conjunction with the divine. His exaltation here is made to consist in honor and power. In honor; so He had a name above every name; a title of dignity above all the creatures, men or angels. And in power, Every knee must bow to Him. The whole creation must be in subjection to Him; things in heaven, in earth, and under the earth; the inhabitants of heaven and earth, the living and the dead. At the name of Jesus, i. e. the authority of Jesus; all should pay a solemn homage. And that every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord; every nation and language should publicly own the universal empire of the exalted Redeemer; and that all power in heaven and earth is given to Him, Mat. 28:18. Observe, the vast extent of the kingdom of Christ; it reaches to heaven and earth, and to all the creatures in each; to angels as well as men, and to the dead as well as the living. To the glory of God the Father. Observe, it is to the glory of God the Father, to confess that Jesus Christ is Lord; for it is his will, that all men should honor the Son, as they honor the Father, Jn. 5:23. Whatever respect is paid to Christ, redounds to the honor of the Father; He who receiveth Me, receiveth Him who sent Me. Mat. 10:40.

V. 12, 13. He exhorts them to diligence and seriousness in the Christian course; Work out your own salvation. It is the salvation of our souls, 1 Pet. 1:9. our eternal salvation, Heb. 5:9. deliverance from all evil, and the possession of all good. It is our own salvation, the salvation of our own souls; though we must promote the common salvation, Jude 3. as much as we can, yet we must on no account neglect our own. We are required to work out our salvation; the word signifies working thoroughly at a thing, and taking true pains. Salvation is the great thing we should mind, and set our hearts upon; and we cannot attain salvation without the utmost care and diligence. He adds, With fear and trembling, i. e. with great care and circumspection, Heb. 4:1. Fear is a great guard and preservative from evil. He urges this from the consideration of their readiness always to obey the Gospel, v. 12. They were not merely awed by the apostle's presence, but obeyed even much more in his absence. And because it is God who worketh in you, do ye work out your salvation. It should encourage us to (Marg. Ref. k.)—'Though we are freely saved in Christ alone, apprehended by faith; yet we must press forward unto salvation in the way of righteousness, seeing that the sons of God are led by the Spirit of Him by whom they are justified, that they may walk in good works.' Beza.—'Salvation,' here, signifies, not justification, either exclusively or primarily, but deliverance from sin and all its consequences, which must be, and will be, diligently and vigilantly labored for by all the regenerate, as long as any sin remains in them, and this salvation will not be in all things completed, till 'death shall be swallowed up in victory.' (Note, Ro. 13:11—14, v. 11.) The righteousness, atonement, and mediation of Christ, have made 'all things ready' for our salvation; the Gospel calls us to partake of it; the regenerating Spirit of Christ quickens us, when dead in sin, and brings us to repentance and faith. Thus excited and animated, we first diligently seek for an interest in Christ; next, to 'make our calling and election sure;' and then, for 'the full assurance of hope unto the end.' (Notes, Heb. 6:11, 12. 2 Pct. 1:5—11.) In this way of diligence we also receive daily more and more of 'salvation' itself, by liberty from sin, victory over it, peace and communion with God, and the earnestness of heavenly felicity: (Note, 1 Pet. 1:3, 9.) and at the same time we glorify God, adorn the Gospel, are useful to our brethren, and 'shine as lights in the world.'—(13) To will, &c.] 'We are not therefore stocks, but are willing in doing well; not that God helps the implicity of our will, but that from being evil He makes it good, and that wholly of his grace.' Beza.—And to do.] 'He does not say, that we may have the faculty of willing, and doing well if we will; but he says, that the efficacious gift of willing and doing well is bestowed on us.' Beza. This shows the nature of divine influences on the mind, according to the constitution of the rational nature, and not against it, by producing in us 'a willing mind,' to use all means of ob-

do our utmost, because our labor shall not be in vain. God is ready to concur with his grace, and assist our faithful endeavors. Observe, Though we must work out our salvation, yet still we must do it in dependence on the grace of God. His grace works in us in a way suitable to our natures, and in concurrence with our endeavors; and its operations in us are so far from excusing, that they are intended to quicken and engage, our endeavors: for He worketh in you. All our working depends on his working in us. It is the grace of God which inclines the will to that which is good; and then enables us to perform it, and to act according to our principles. Thou hast wrought all our works in us, Is. 26: 12. Of his good pleasure. As there is no strength in us, so there is no merit in us. As we cannot act without God's grace, so we cannot claim it, or pretend to deserve it. God's good-will to us, is the cause of his good work in us; and He is under no engagements to his creatures, but those of his gracious promise.

V. 14—18. The apostle here exhorts them to adorn their Christian profession by a suitable temper and behavior. 1. By cheerful obedience to the commands of God, v. 14. God's commands were given to be obeyed, not to be disputed. This greatly adorns our profession, and shows we serve a good Master, whose service is freedom, and whose work is its own reward. 2. By peaceableness, and love one to another. Do all things without disputings, wrangling, or debating one with another; the light of truth and the life of religion are often lost in the heats and mists of disputation. 3. By a blameless conversation towards all men, v. 15. not injurious to any in word or deed; Blameless and sincere; so some. Blameless before men, sincere toward God. The sons of God. The children of God should differ from the sons of men. Without rebuke,—amōmēta. Momus was a carping deity among the Greeks, mentioned by Hesiod and Lucian, who did nothing himself, and found fault with every body and every thing. From him all carpers at other men, and rigid censurers of their works, were called Momi. The sense of the expression is, 'Walk so circumspectly, that Momus himself may have no occasion to cavil at you, that the severest censurer may find no fault with you.' In the midst of a crooked and perverse generation; i. e. among the heathens, and those who are without. Where there is no true religion, we should be careful to keep ourselves blameless and harmless, Gen. 13: 7. Among whom ye shine as lights in the world. Or it may be read imperatively, Among whom shine ye as lights; Comp. Mat. 5: 16. Christians should not only approve themselves to God, but recommend themselves to others, that they may also glorify God. They must shine as well as be sincere.

Holding forth the Word of life, v. 16. The Gospel is called the Word of life, because it reveals and proposes to us eternal life through Jesus Christ, 2 Tim. 1: 10. It is our duty, not only to hold it fast for our own benefit, but to hold it forth for the benefit of others. This Paul tells them would be his joy, not only their steadfastness, but their usefulness. He would have them think his pains well taining help and deliverance, and not by driving or constraining us against our will. By the regenerating work of the Holy Spirit, the mind and heart are prepared to discern and love truth and holiness; the Gospel sets objects before us, and proposes them to us, suited to this new state of mind and heart, and we accordingly 'choose' them, without the least infringement of our liberty. We feel no force, we are perfectly voluntary; we act according to our present feelings and desires, as if the whole were from ourselves; and perhaps it is not till long after, that we learn from what Author and Source the revolution in our judgment and affections, which led to 'newness of life,' originated; nay, numbers cannot clearly discern this, during their subsequent earthly course. In short, 'the carnal mind is enmity against God'; all are by nature 'carnally minded,' none are of themselves 'willing' to repeat and believe the Gospel, according to the Word of God; none can be compelled to do these things against their will; but 'God works in us to will and to do of his good pleasure.' 'The grace of God by Christ preventing us, that we may have a good will, and working with us, when we have that good will.' (Art. x.) If the opposers of the doctrine, improperly called Calvinistic, in former and later times, had been willing and able to understand those against whom they have contended and still contend, it would have saved them immense labor, in combating sentiments, which few comparatively maintain, in the sense which they seem to suppose. One of these opposers, however, has repeatedly quoted, operator in vobis velle, as one of Calvia's dreadful dogmas, when it is the Vulgate translation, and an exact version of Paul's words, which we render, 'worketh in us to will!' In fact, our zealous opponents are not unfrequently betrayed into similar mistakes. 'He worketh in us effectually; . . . that we may effectually work.'—The man, in whom God has wrought effectually to will, and who yet cannot fully accomplish what He wills, but earnestly cries to God to help and deliver him, is evidently described by the apostle. Notes, Rom. 7:12—25. SCOTT.

(12.) Fear.] Not of hell only, but of sin chiefly. Note, 1 Pet. 3:15. Ed.

(12, 13) 'Sophists sweat much in their schools, to reconcile free will with God's grace; pretending it is flexible by its own motion, and has a proper and separate faculty, with which God's grace co-operates: (I dispute not about names, but the reality:) that as God indeed re-begets in us free choice, by which we can will well, so, they say, the faculty of well willing is received from God, but assign good will to man. But this Paul pronounces without exception to be the work of God. He does not say, that our hearts are only turned or incited, or that the infirmity of good will is helped; but that good will is entirely effected by God. Their calumny, that we make men to be like stones, in teaching that they have no good but from mere grace, is impudent. We confess we have will by nature, but that since it is evil by the corruption of sin, it then begins to be good when reformed by God. Nor, say we, can man do any thing good unless willing; but then when his will is ruled by the Spirit of God. Unless God act efficaciously in us, He would not be said to effect a good will.' CALVIN. But, not being God, we cannot explain (as heretofore remarked), how God acts in us while we are left with free will, even in the most ordinary action of life, and yet we perform all our natural functions without settling the metaphysical subtleties involved in every act. Henry, above, has sufficiently explained the text, by repeating it; and the attempt to go further has roused the sectarian and selfish corruptions of the heart, to the disgrace of the name of Christian: one party sinking, with materialists, &c. into Turkish fatalism, the other souring, with atheists, &c. into unknown regions of bewilderment, according as they found their system on external observation or self-revolving consciousness: both lead away from practical godliness. It seems as if this controversy should close. Ed.—Work out, &c. for it is God, &c.] 'If I be asked in what sense I accept this scripture; I humbly answer . . . The work I am working out, is not the work of labor, or of merit, or of justification, or of recommendation to God, but simply an employment, in a constant attendance upon it, and that of such earnestness and anxiety, as men of the world, when engaged in an arduous concern, are fearful and trembling in, lest they should fail of success. Not a bondage fear, but an holy, childlike fear. Not a fear of the loss of divine love, for the adoption of children prevents such apprehensions, and the faithful covenant promises of God in Christ, render it impossible. But the fear of an unholy weariness in the path of grace, as those who rejoice in the full assurance of faith, but rejoice with trembling. Beholding the wreck of our fallen nature, in the instance of the floating carcasses all around, we bless the God of our salvation, that He has brought us by his grace safe on shore, while we tremble to look back and see the tremendous storm from whence we have escaped. If this be the meaning of the passage, it is truly blessed, and in exact conformity to the whole tenor of Scripture. I find, through grace, the Lord working in me. He worketh in me, to show me my total helplessness in myself, and my complete all-sufficiency in Christ. Conscious of the infinite importance of salvation, I feel the Lord's grace prompting me to an unceasing desire after the Lord, so that I am working from life, not for life; from grace, not for grace. And thus I am going humbly and softly all my days, as one, who hath an object of such infinite moment before him, that, while rejoicing, I am trembling in myself.' HAWKER.—Claude deduces from the words the following theological propositions: 1. God, by his Holy Spirit, illuminates the understandings of men; for working in us to will, must necessarily be by illuminating the understanding. 2. That operation of grace which illuminates the understanding is practical, and not barely speculative, but descends even to the heart. Paul says, God works in us to do. 3. The first dispositions to conversion are effects of grace, as well as conversion itself: for Paul not only says God works in us to do; but adds that He worketh in us to will; now this will consists in dispositions to conversion. 4. This operation of grace, does not consist in putting us in a state capable of converting ourselves, but actually converts; for the apostle says, "God worketh in us to will and to do." 5. The operation of this grace which converts us, is of victorious efficacy, and obtains its end in spite of all the resistances of nature; for Paul says, "God effectually worketh in us to will and to do;" which means, that when He displays this grace, nothing can [effectually] resist Him. 6. When God converts us, whatever irresistible there is in his grace, He displays it, nevertheless, in a way which neither destroys our nature, nor offers any violence to our will; for Paul says, "God worketh in us to will:" that is, He converts us by inspiring us with love for his Gospel, in gentle ways, suited to the faculties of our souls.' WILLIAMS.

V. 14—18. Nothing can exceed the genuine magnanimity and disinterested love, expressed in this most beautiful passage. The Athenian who came mortally wounded from the battle of Marathon, with news of a glorious victory, and having said to the rulers, 'Rejoice ye, we rejoice,' (chairete, chairomen,) then dropped down dead before them, has been greatly admired, and justly, as a patriot and a hero; but in the view of a future and eternal world, it does not appear that his joy was rational. 'He did it for a corruptible crown,' the apostle, for 'an incorruptible,' to himself and multitudes. SCOTT.

(15.) Shine as lights.] 'As elevated lights, [alluding after Saurin to] light-houses, the most illustrious of which [in those days], was built by Ptolemy Philadelphus, on the island of Pharos, where a light was always kept burning, to light mariners in entering the port of Alexandria.' DONDR. BL., however, thinks this injudicious, and that the allusion is to the heavenly luminaries, as the Gr. has this meaning, Gen. 1: 14, 16, &c. An ancient custom is still kept up in China, of telegraphing, as it were, by signals of 3 fires, at intervals, on lofty hills. Comp. Jer. 6: 1. Ed.

[Practical Observations.]

19<sup>d</sup> But I trust in the Lord Jesus to send Timotheus<sup>e</sup> shortly unto you, that I also may be of good comfort, when I know your state.

20 For I have no man<sup>f</sup> like-minded, who will naturally care for your state.

21 For all seek their<sup>g</sup> own, not the things which are Jesus Christ's.

22 But ye know the proof of him, that, as a son with the father, he hath served with me in the gospel.

23 Him therefore I hope to send presently, so soon as I shall see how it will go with me.

24 But<sup>h</sup> I trust in the Lord that I also myself shall come shortly.

25 Yet I supposed it necessary to send to you<sup>i</sup> Epaphroditus, my brother, and companion in labor, and<sup>j</sup> fellow-soldier, but your messenger, and he that ministered to my wants.

26 For he longed after you all, and was full of heaviness, because that ye had heard that he had been sick.

27 For indeed he was sick nigh unto death: but God had mercy on him; and not on him only, but on me also, lest I should have sorrow upon sorrow.

28 I sent him therefore the more carefully, that, when ye see him again, ye may rejoice, and that I may be the less sorrowful.

bestowed, and that he had not run in vain, nor labored in vain.

Observe, the work of the ministry requires the putting forth of the whole man. Running denotes vehemence, vigor, and continual pressing forward; laboring denotes constancy and close application.

It is a great joy to ministers, when they perceive that they have not run in vain, nor labored in vain; and it will be their rejoicing in the day of Christ, when their converts will be their crown. 1 Th. 2: 19.

The apostle not only ran and labored for them with satisfaction, but shows that he was ready to suffer for their good, v. 17. He could reckon himself happy, if he could promote the honor of Christ, the edification of the church, and the welfare of the souls of men; and is not that worth our labor, which he thought worth his life? He was ready to be offered, poured out as the wine of the drink-offerings, 2 Tim. 4: 6. And if the minister loves the people, and is willing to spend and be spent for their welfare, the people have reason to love the minister, and to joy and rejoice with him, v. 18.

V. 19—30. Paul, though himself a great apostle, took all occasions to respect his inferiors. He speaks,

I. Of Timothy, whom he intended to send to the Philippians, that he might have an account of their state. Many good ministers were in care for the souls of those for whom they preached; but none comparable to Timothy; a man of an excellent spirit and tender heart, a genuine son of blessed Paul. None were like him; he, as Paul, cared for the churches, and did so naturally, i. e. sincerely, not in pretence only: with a willing heart and upright view, so agreeably to the make of his mind. Note, 1. It is the duty of ministers to care for the state of their people, and be concerned for their welfare, not yours, but you, 2 Cor. 12: 14. 2. It is a rare thing to find one who does it naturally: such a one is remarkable, and distinguished among his brethren.

All seek their own, not the things which are Jesus Christ's, v. 21. All; he means the generality; all, either the most, or all in comparison of Timothy. Note, Seeking our own interest, with the neglect of Jesus Christ's, is a very great and common sin among Christians and ministers. We are apt to prefer our own credit, ease, and safety, before truth, holiness, and duty; the things of our own pleasure, [power,] and reputation, before the things of Christ's kingdom, and his honor and interest in the world: but Timothy was none of those.

Ye know the proof of him, v. 22. Timothy was a man who had been tried, and had made full proof of his ministry, 2 Tim. 4: 5. and was faithful in all which befell him. He was Paul's assistant in many places where he preached, and served with him in the Gospel with all the dutiful respect, and with all the love and cheerfulness, of a child to his father. Their ministrations together were with great respect on the one side, and great tenderness and kindness on the other, —an admirable example to elder and younger ministers, joined in the same service.

Paul designed to send him shortly, v. 23. He was now a prisoner, and did not know what would be the issue; but, according as it turned, he would dispose of Timothy. Nay, he hoped to come himself, v. 24. and soon. I trust in the Lord. He expresses his hope and confidence of seeing them, with a humble dependence and submission to the divine will, 1 Cor. 4: 19. Ja. 4: 15. so Acts 18: 21. and Heb. 6: 3.

II. Of Epaphroditus, whom he calls his brother, and companion in labor, and fellow-soldier, and their messenger, one sent by them to him; probably, to consult him about some affairs relating to their church, or to bring a present from them for his relief; for he adds, and him who ministered to my wants. He seems to be the same who is elsewhere called Epaphras, Col. 4: 12. He had an earnest desire to come to them, and Paul was willing he should. But it seems, he had been sick, v. 26, 27. which the Philippians were exceedingly sorry to hear of; though it pleased God to recover and spare him, v. 27. The apostle owns it is a great mercy

PRAC. OBS. V. 1—18. All our consolations, hopes, and experience of 'the fellowship of the Spirit, and the bowels and mercies' of God our Savior, as well as all our regard to our own peace, should engage us to be 'of one mind' with our brethren, and so 'to fulfil the joy' of all wise and faithful ministers and Christians. [Note, end of 1 Cor.] Nothing so honors Christ, defeats the machinations of his enemies, or fills the soul with consolation, as this holy love; but envy, contention, and ambition, not only disturb the peace of the church, but torture the soul which entertains them. Neither inward nor outward peace can be enjoyed, except in proportion as 'in lowliness of mind we esteem others better than ourselves, and look at the things of others as well as at our own.' These are hard sayings to the proud and carnal heart of man. Many have learned the doctrines of the Gospel very accurately, who have not 'thus learned Christ.' Note, Eph. 4:20—24.—Let us examine whether we do indeed reverence, love, obey, and worship the incarnate Son of God, or whether we are yet among those enemies, who must be bruised under his feet shortly. 1 Cor. 15:20—28.—Even those professed Christians, of whom we have the most favorable opinion, should be exhorted, not only to 'be obedient,' as in the presence of their pastors; but to increase in circumspection, when removed from under their faithful care.—Surely some zealous advocates for evangelical truths have never read this ch., for they can do nothing 'without murmurings and disputings!' These are their element; these are the unhallowed 'weapons of their warfare.' How can they be 'blameless and harmless,' on this plan, when 'envy and strife' are inseparable from 'confusion and every evil work!' And how can they think themselves the 'children of God,' who, in so many features, bear the express image of Satan? But let us pray [for them and ourselves] to be made peaceable, humble, unambitious, and inoffensive, both in the church and in the community, that 'by well doing we may put to silence' the calumnies of ungodly men; and that we may be 'without rebuke,' in the midst of this our nation; which, alas! is proved to be 'crooked and perverse,' by the prevalence of infidelity, impiety, and every kind of immorality, under a Christian profession, and abundant means of religious instruction! Sc.

V. 19—23. Probably, this [seeking their own] was wholly the case with several, who had offered their assistance to Paul, but had declined difficult and perilous services; others, perhaps, had rendered themselves suspected, by the same selfish conduct, and most concerned had given the apostle cause for dissatisfaction, by preferring easier and more secure services, to those of far greater importance, but connected with more self-denial, labor, and peril. It may be supposed, that several of his most approved helpers were absent on other services, and others might be fully employed at Rome; but, after all deductions and limitations, the apostle's complaint must stand, as a lamentable testimony to the selfishness of human nature.—The words, 'trust in the Lord Jesus,' as introduced with reference to a providential concern, and not anything immediately relating to his salvation and grace, should not pass unnoticed. Perhaps the most satisfactory assurance of our Lord's Deity, may be obtained by carefully noting such words, as seem to drop without design from the pen of the sacred writers, and which are seldom noticed in the controversy; but which can in no other way be reconciled to the other Scriptures. (Notes. Ps. 146:3, 4. Jer. 17:5—8. Eph. 1:9—14.) This shows, that Timothy had been at Philippi with the apostle; yet the history does not expressly mention it. (Notes, Acts 16:8—40.) but, by carefully comparing one part of the narrative with another, this appears evidently to have been the case. (Acts 16:1—3. 17:14, 15.) Undesigned coincidences of this kind, between the history and the epistles, [see Supplement to Comp. Com. and Paley's Horæ Paulinæ,] prove that both are genuine, and if genuine, then inspired. V. 24—30. Probably, Epaphroditus was a pastor of the church at Philippi, and, being absent from his stated charge, 'he longed after' the people, and his labors of love among them; especially he 'was in heaviness, because they had heard' of his sickness, and the thought of their sorrow, on his account, was more painful to him than his own sickness! What a beautiful and admirable instance of genuine sensibility and affection is here most simply exhibited! In what book, except the Scriptures, do we meet with such?—It does not appear, that any miracle was wrought in this case; and we may thence infer, that the gift of miracles could only be exercised on particular occasions, of which those endued with them had some previous intimation. This is clearly indicated; and it shows, that the apostle was not ready to own his want of power, when truth required it, as to speak of his miracles when needed.—As Philippi lay at a great distance from Rome, Epaphroditus must have continued with the apostle a considerable time, or the report of his sickness at Rome could not have reached Philippi, and that of their sorrow have reached Rome before Epaphroditus left that city; and consequently the epistle must have been written towards the close of the apostle's two years' imprisonment.

tion in hazarding his life, but reckons they ought to love him the more on that account. They were to receive him with joy, as newly recovered from sickness. It is an endearing consideration, to have our mercies restored to us after danger of removal; and should make them the more valued and improved. What is given us in answer to prayer, should be received with great thankfulness and joy.

CHAP. III. V. 1-3. It seems, the church at Philippi, though faithful and flourishing, was disturbed by judaizing teachers, who endeavored to keep up the law of Moses, and mix its observances with the doctrine of Christ and his institutions. He here warns against these seducers.

1. He exhorts them to rejoice in the Lord, v. 1. to rest satisfied in the interest they had in Him, and the benefit they hoped for by Him. The joy of the Lord is our strength, Neh. 8: 10.

2. He reiterates a caution to take heed of those false teachers, v. 2. It is good often to revive the remembrance and strengthen the impression of things of importance. It is a wanton curiosity to desire always to hear some new thing.

The prophet calls the false prophets dumb dogs, Is. 56: 10. to which the apostle here seems to refer. Dogs, for their malice against the faithful professors of the Gospel of Christ, barking at them and biting them. They cried up good works in opposition to the faith of Christ; but Paul calls them evil workers: they boasted themselves to be of the circumcision; but he calls them the concision:* they rent the church of Christ, and contended for an abolished rite.

3. He describes true Christians, who are indeed the spiritual circumcision, the peculiar people of God, in covenant with Him, as the O. T. Israelites were, v. 3. They worshipped in the spirit, in opposition to the carnal ordinances of the O. T. which consisted in meats and drinks, and divers washings, &c. The work of religion is to no purpose, any further than the heart is employed in it, Jn. 4: 24. 2 Cor. 3: 8. They rejoice in Christ Jesus, not in the peculiar privileges of the Jewish church, or what answers to them in the Christian church,—mere outward enjoyments and performances. They rejoice in their [spiritual progress, their] relation to Christ, and interest in Him. They have no confidence in the flesh, those carnal ordinances and outward performances. We must be taken off from trusting in ourselves, that we may build only on Christ; our confidence, as well as our joy must be in Him.

* Concisors, or sectarians, whether for an external rite, or an inexplicable dogma, would do well conscientiously to reconsider their disunion, and to recollect that the spirit of splitting has no end, while human hate and pride last. See Rom. ch. 14. and note, end of 1 Cor. Ed.

V. 4-8. The apostle here proposes himself for an example of trusting in Christ only, and not in his privileges as an Israelite.

I. He shows what he had to boast of as a Jew and Pharisee; and that he had as much cause to boast as any man, v. 4. He was not a proselyte, but a native Israelite; A Hebrew of the Hebrews, by father and mother, and from one generation to another; none of his ancestors had matched with Gentiles. He had the token of God's covenant in the flesh, was circumcised the very day God had appointed. For learning, he was a Pharisee, a scholar learned in all the learning of the Jews; taught according to the perfect manner of the law of the fathers, Acts 22: 3. He had a blameless conversation; as far as the Pharisees' exposition of the law went, and as to the mere letter and outward observance, he could acquit himself from all breach of it. He had been an active man for his religion, so as even to persecute those whom he looked upon as enemies to it. He showed he was in good earnest, though he had a zeal without knowledge, Acts 22: 3, 4. All this was enough to have made a proud Jew confident, and stock sufficient to set up with for his justification. But,

II. The apostle tells us, here, how little account he made of these, in comparison of his interest in Christ, and his expectations from Him, v. 7. He counted them loss; not only insufficient to enrich him, but what would certainly impoverish and ruin him, if he trusted to them, in opposition to Christ. Observe, The apostle did not persuade them to do anything but what he himself did; to quit anything but what he had quitted himself; or venture on anything but what he himself had ventured his immortal soul upon.

Yea, doubtless, and I count all things but loss, for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus my Lord, v. 8. Here the apostle explains himself.

1. He tells us what it was he reached after; the knowledge of Christ Jesus his Lord, a believing, experimental acquaintance with Christ as Lord, not a mere notional and speculative, but a practical and efficacious knowledge of Him. So knowledge is sometimes put for faith, Is. 53: 11. And it is the excellency of knowledge. There is a transcendent excellency in the Christian religion, above all the knowledge of nature, and improvements of human wisdom; it is suited to the case of fallen sinners, and furnishes them with all they need, all they can desire and hope for, with all saving wisdom and saving grace.

2. He shows how he had quitted his privly 'trust the Lord Jesus' for everything, will yet frankly acknowledge their obligations for temporal assistance to those, who owe their salvation to their labors of love. The affectionate pastor will be more full of heaviness for the grief of his people on his account, than for his own pain and sickness; and he will 'long after them,' and to renew his labors among them, as a tender mother does after her beloved infant.—The Lord often afflicts such zealous and affectionate Christians, to manifest the excellency of their disposition; but He 'will have mercy upon them,' and not let them 'have sorrow upon sorrow;' and they will readily put themselves to inconveniences to remove the grief or increase the comfort of their brethren, rejoicing, though at a distance, in the thoughts of their joy, as an alleviation of their own sorrow. Those ministers who thus spend their strength, and disregard even life and health in his cause, and to 'supply the lack of service' of those who are incapable of performing it, should be peculiarly honored by the church, and by every Christian; yet none should, without necessity, be kept very long from the people of their own peculiar charge. Theoph.* well observes, that as the Jews applied this term to the Gentiles (as the Mohammedans do now to the Christians), so there was a peculiar propriety in the term. Concision.] As if he had said, Beware of this cutting and hacking the flesh; for it is no more. ileges as a Jew and a Pharisee; his expression rises with a holy triumph. There are five particles in the original; But indeed even also do I count all things but loss. He had spoken before of those things; his Jewish privileges; here he speaks of all things, all worldly enjoyments and outward privileges whatsoever, which could stand in competition with Christ for the throne in his heart, or pretend to merit and desert. He had said he did count them but loss; but it might be asked, what he would do when he came to the trial. And he tells us, he had himself practised according to this estimate of the case; For whom I have suffered the loss of all things. Nay, he not only counted them loss, but affals, thrown to dogs; they are not only less valuable than Christ, but in the highest degree contemptible, when they come in competition with Him.

Note, The New Testament never speaks of saving grace in any terms of diminution,

V. 7. What was my gain.] 'I. e. these were such as to bring me into great credit with our ecclesiastical rulers (see Acts); these made my reputation considerable (Acts 9:1); and would have led to [further] dignities and emoluments, an introduction into the Sanhedrim, &c.; but all these opportunities of gain I (on my change of views and conversion to Christ) no more regarded than if they had been sources of loss. . . . And not these things only, but all other things thought honorable and profitable, did I despise. Nay, to the present time, I continue to think all things but loss, &c., and such they appear, because of the excellency of, &c.'

V. 8—11. 'The present time is to be noted; . . . so that the apostle, as to what relates to justification before God, excludes all works; those which follow, as well as those which precede faith.' Beza.—The apostle not only had judged at his first conversion, that his legal righteousness, and his worldly prospects, were 'loss to him,' compared with Christ; but, after many years spent in successfully preaching the Gospel, with apostolical authority, abundant miraculous gifts, immense labors, extraordinary success, multiplied sufferings, and most exemplary holiness, he decidedly 'counted all these things to be loss,' in comparison of 'the most excellent knowledge of Christ,' from revelation, by faith, and subsequent experience in the glory of his Person and redemption. — It is evident, that the apostle speaks, not of the resurrection in general, for this will be both 'of the just and of the unjust;' but of 'the resurrection to eternal life,' in that glorious view of it, which is afterwards given. Note, 20:21.—When the sinner believes in Christ, he is immediately 'justified by faith, and has peace with God;' yet he, 'through the Spirit, waits for the hope of righteousness by faith;' for at the day of judgment, when living faith will be distinguished by its fruits from dead faith, the sentence but, on the contrary, represents it as the fruits of the divine Spirit, and the image of God in the soul of man; as a divine nature, and the seed of God: and faith is called precious faith; and meekness is in the sight of God of great price, 1 Pet. 3: 4. 2 Pet. 1: 1, &c.

V. 9—14. We have heard what the apostle renounced; let us now see what he laid hold on, and resolved to cleave to, and that was, Christ and heaven.

I. He had his heart on Christ, as his Righteousness.

1. He desired to win Christ; and an unspeakable gainer he would reckon himself, if he had but an interest in Christ and his righteousness, and if Christ became his Lord and his Savior. The expression intimates, that we need to strive for Him, and reach after Him.

2. That he might be found in Him, v. 9. as the manslayer in the city of refuge, safe from the avenger of blood, Num. 35: 25. [as Noah in the ark. SCOTT.] Or, it alludes to a judicial appearance; so we are to be found of our Judge in peace, 2 Pet. 3: 14. We are undone, without a righteousness wherein to appear before God, for we are guilty. Righteousness is provided for us in Jesus Christ, complete and perfect; but to have interest or benefit by it, we must come off from confidence in ourselves, and believe heartily in Him. 'Not having my own righteousness, which is of the law; not thinking my outward observances and good deeds able to atone for my bad ones; or that, by setting the one over against the other, I can balance accounts with God. No, the righteousness I depend on, is that which is through the faith of Christ: not legal, but evangelical. The righteousness of God by faith, ordained and appointed of God.' The Lord Jesus Christ is the Lord our Righteousness, Is. 45: 24. Had He not been God, He could not have been our Righteousness; the transcendent excellence of the divine nature put such a value on, and such a virtue into, his sufferings, that they became sufficient to satisfy for the sins of the world, and to bring in a righteousness which will be effectual to all who believe. Faith is the ordained means of actual interest and saving benefit in all the purchase of his blood. It is by faith in his blood, Rom. 3: 25.

3. That he might know Christ, v. 10. Faith is called knowledge, Is. 53: 11. Knowing Him, here, is believing Him: it is an experimental knowledge of the power of his resurrection and fellowship of his suffering, or feeling the transforming efficacy and virtue of them.

4. That he might be conformable unto Him, is also meant of his sanctification. We are then made conformable to his death, when we die to sin, as Christ died for sin; when we are crucified with Christ, the flesh and affections of it mortified, and the world is crucified to us, and we to the world, by virtue of the cross of Christ.

II. The apostle had his heart on heaven, as his happiness, v. 11. here called the resurrection of the dead, because, though the souls of the faithful, when they depart, are immediately with Christ, yet their happiness will not be complete till the general resurrection of the dead, at the last day, when soul and body shall be glorified together. Anastasis sometimes signifies the future state. This the apostle had his eye on; this he would attain. The joyful and glorious resurrection of saints, a return to life, and bliss, and glory, is called the resurrection, by eminence, because it is in virtue of Christ's resurrection, as their Head and First-fruits; whereas the wicked shall rise from the grave, by the power of Christ, as their Judge, only to return to a second death. It is called the resurrection of the just, and the resurrection of life, Jn. 5: 29. and they are counted worthy to obtain that world, and the resurrection from the dead, Ln. 20: 35.

This joyful resurrection the apostle pressed toward. He was willing to do, or suffer anything, that he might attain that resurrection. The hope and prospect of it carried him with courage and constancy through all the difficulties he met with in his work. Observe, 1. He speaks as if they were in danger of missing it, and coming short of it. A holy fear of coming short, is an excellent mean of perseverance. Observe, 2. His care to be found in Christ, was in order to his attaining it. He did not hope to attain it through his own merit and righteousness, but through the merit and righteousness of Jesus Christ.

He looks upon himself to be in a state of imperfection and trial, v. 12. Observe, The best men will readily own their imperfection in the present state. If Paul had not attained to perfection, much less have we. Again, Brethren, I count not myself to have apprehended, v. 13. 'I thus reason with myself.' They who think they have grace enough, give proof that they have little enough, or rather, none at all; because, wherever there is true grace, there is a desire of more grace, and a pressing toward the perfection of grace. Observe, here, of justification will not only be confirmed, but proclaimed to the whole assembled world. Mat. 15:34—46. Gal. 5:1—6, v. 6. Ja. 2:19—24. Sc.

(3.) All. 'Lost all opportunity of gaining. Dung.] Skubala: it sometimes means the wreck thrown out by the sea (as in Achilles Tat.), and stubble, such as in farm-yards is trampled under foot by the cattle, and thus converted into dung. The expression may be Englished by "a mere drug." BLOOMER. Suffered the loss, &c.] 'Doddr. thinks it not improbable (we think it almost certain) that Paul had been laid, by his unbelieving brethren, under the great excommunication, which forfeited all his property.' WILLIAMS.

(11.) If, &c.] 'Eipōs: it often, in the Hellenistic style, at least, implies no doubt. See Glass and Wolf. So Ro. 1:10. 11:14, 21. 2 S. 16: 12. Paul seems to say this, less with a reference to himself than as a delicate admonition to them.' BLOOMER.

V. 12—14. When we consider what the apostle had actually attained; (Notes, 8—11. 1:19—25. 4:3—13.) even so much genuine holiness, that very few can endure a comparison of their own attainments with his; and yet consider him as acknowledging that he had not attained, and as 'pressing forward' at something far higher; we may form our judgment of every modern pretence to sinless perfection, as well as of our own exceedingly inferior proficiency. Rom. 7:13—25. SCOTT.

When Christ laid hold of us, it was to bring us to heaven; and to apprehend that for which He apprehended us, is to attain the perfection of our bliss.

He adds, further, v. 13. This one thing I do; this [only] was his great care and concern. There is a sinful forgetting of past sins and past mercies, which ought to be remembered for the exercise of constant repentance and thankfulness to God. But he forgot the things behind, so as not to be content with present measures of grace: he was still for having more and more. So he reached forth, stretched himself forward, [as a racer earnestly stretches forward the neck,] bearing toward his point: expressions of a vehement concern.

(2.) The apostle's aim, in these actings, v. 14. He pressed toward the mark. The fitter we grow for heaven, the faster we must press towards it. Heaven is called here the mark, because every good Christian has it in his eye, as the archer the mark he designs to hit. A Christian's calling is a high calling; from heaven, as its original; to heaven, in its tendency. Heaven is the prize of the high calling, the prize we fight for, run for, wrestle for; what we aim [to be fit for] in all we do, what will reward all our pains. It is of great use in the Christian course, to keep our eye on heaven. This is proper to give us measures in all our service, and to quicken us every step we take; and it is of God, from Him we are to expect it, Rom. 6:23.; but in Christ Jesus, through his hand it must come to us, as it is procured for us by Him. There is no getting to heaven as our home, but by Christ as our Way.

V. 15—16. The apostle, having proposed himself as an example, urges the Philippians to follow it.

1. He shows, that this was the thing wherein all good Christians were agreed; to make Christ all in all, and set their hearts on another world. To win Christ, and to be found in Him, is our happiness both here and hereafter. Therefore, let us walk by the same rule, and mind the same thing. Let us agree to press toward the mark, and make heaven our end.

2. That this is a good reason why Christians who differ in less matters, should yet bear with one another, because they are agreed in the main matter; 'If in anything ye be otherwise minded; if ye differ from one another, as to meats and days, and other matters of the Jewish law; yet judge not one another, while ye all meet now in Christ, as your Centre, and hope to meet shortly in heaven, as your home. As for other matters of difference, lay no great stress on them, God shall reveal even this unto you. Whatever it is wherein ye differ, ye must wait till God give you a better understanding, which He will do in his due time. In the mean time, as far as ye have attained, ye must go together in the ways of God, join together in all the great things in which ye are agreed, and wait for further light in the less things wherein ye differ.

V. 17—21. He closes the ch. with warnings and exhortations.

1. He warns them against following the examples of seducers and evil teachers, v. 18, 19. Observe, Many called by Christ's name, are yet enemies to Christ's cross. Their walk is a surer evidence what they are, than their profession, Mat. 7:20. The apostle warns people against such: I have told you often. We so little heed warnings, that we need to have them repeated. To write the same things is safe, v. 1. He warns them feelingly and affectionately; I now tell you weeping. Paul was, on proper occasions a weeping preacher, as Jeremiah a weeping prophet. Observe, What we say often, we may say again, if affectionately, and under the power of it. He gives the characters of those who were the enemies of the cross of Christ. They mind nothing but their sensual appetites; the same observance good people give to God, epicures give to their appetites, Rom. 16:18. They not only sinned, but boasted of it, and gloried in what they ought to be ashamed of. Christ came by his cross to crucify the world to us, and us to the world; but they mind earthly things, directly contrary to the cross of Christ, and this great design of it. He gives them this character, to show how absurd it would be for Christians to follow the example of such, or be led away by them. To deter all from it, he reads their doom: Their way seems pleasant, but death and hell are at the end of it, Rom. 6:21. Perhaps he alludes to the total destruction of the Jewish nation.

II. He proposes himself and his brethren for an example, in opposition to these evil examples, v. 17. Mark them for your pattern. He explains himself, v. 20. by their regard to Christ and heaven: for our conversation is in heaven. Observe, Good Christians, even while here on earth, have their conversation in heaven, their citizenship there, so the word is; because our citizenship is there, our conversation is there; being related to that world, we keep up a correspondence with it.

The apostle had pressed them to follow him, and other ministers of Christ; it is good having fellowship with those who have fellowship with Christ, and conversation with those whose conversation is in heaven.

1. Because we look for the Savior from thence, v. 20. He is not here, He is ascended, He is entered within the veil for us; and we expect his second coming from thence, to gather in all the citizens of that New Jerusalem to himself.

2. Because at the second coming of Christ we expect to be happy and glorified there. There is a glory reserved for the bodies of the saints, in which they will be instated at the resurrection, v. 21. The body is now at the best a vile body,—the body of our humiliation, often the occasion and instrument of much sin, which is called the body of this death, Rom. 7:24. Or it may be understood of its vileness when it lies in the grave; at the resurrection it will be found a vile body, Eccl. 12:7. But it will be made a glorious body; and not only raised again to life, but raised to great advantage. Observe, (1.) The sample of this change, the glorious body of Christ; when He was transfigured on the mount, his face did shine as the sun, and his raiment was white as the light, Mat. 17:2. He went to heaven, clothed with a body, that He might take possession of the inheritance in our nature, and be not only the First-born from the dead, but the First-born of the children of the resurrection. We shall be conformed to the image of his Son, pressing, into the public service, as Thucyd. 6:22. uses the word. Reaching forth, epkteinomenos; pressing toward; mark, skopon; prize, brabeion; high-calling, and klēseōs, calling up, are all agonistic metaphors, [note, 1 Cor. 9: end.] The last two are supposed to have allusion to the brabeion, or ἀγωνοθηται, who sat on an elevated seat, and called forward the candidates for the brabeion, or prize. Bl.

V. 15, 16. This exhortation (Note, 12—14.) implies, that the temper and conduct, before described, form the Christian's highest perfection in this world.—The word here rendered 'perfect,' may signify the sound character of the established believer, the man who is matured in judgment and experience, and has made great progress in Christianity. It is used in the Greek authors, especially Xenophon, for men of full age, (about 30,) as distinguished from boys and young men, and the apostle conveys a similar idea by it in other passages. Rom. 16:1. 1 Cor. 2:6. Ja. 1:4. Ju. 2:5, &c. (Note, Heb. 5:11—14.)—In this way Christians would best wait for further instruction; and if any were otherwise minded than their brethren, or than the apostle, being under some mistake or misapprehension, by thus avoiding disputation, and diligently practising what they knew, from evangelical principles, they might hope that God would make known to them those things, of which they still remained ignorant; and their stronger brethren ought to bear with their prejudices, till they were in this manner obviated. Rom. 14:1—15:1—3. Scott.

V. 17—19. Some expositors explain this, almost exclusively, of the Judaizing teachers and their followers, but others suppose the Gnostics to be especially meant, and doubtless many among each of these were of this stamp. Yet there were others also who perverted the Gospel; and the apostle's words at least equally point out licentious Antinomian professors, whether Jews or Gentiles, of which we cannot doubt that many sprang up in every part of the church. Nor is it prudent to represent all the danger to lie on one side when the opposite extreme is equally fatal. (17) Be followers together.] Here only. 'Imitate me among others who imitate me.' (19.) Mind.] 'Rather, whose minds are given up to, as Col. 3:2.' Bl. V. 20, 21. The contrast between 'the body of our humiliation,' and the 'body of his glory,' into the likeness of which Jesus will change our bodies, is remarkable. There seems to be a reference to the transfiguration. Mat. 17:1—8.—If omnipotence is an incommunicable divine

CHAP. IV.

1 From particular admonitions 4 he proceedeth to general exhortations, 10 shewing how he rejoiced at their liberality towards him lying in prison, not so much for the supply of his own wants, as for the grace of God in them. 19 And so he concludeth with prayer and salutations.

THEREFORE, my brethren dearly beloved and longed for, my joy and crown, so stand fast in the Lord, my dearly beloved.

2 I beseech Euodias, and beseech Syntyche, that they be of the same mind in the Lord.

3 And I entreat thee also, true yoke-fellow, help those women which labored with me in the gospel, with Clement also, and with other my fellow-laborers, whose names are in the book of life.

4 Rejoice <sup>a</sup> in the Lord always: and again I say, Rejoice.

that He might be the First-born among many brethren, Rom. 8: 29. Observe, (2.) The power by which this change will be wrought: according to the working, &c. There is an efficacy of power, an exceeding greatness of power, and the working of mighty power, Eph. 1: 19. Let this confirm our faith of the resurrection, that we not only have the Scriptures, which assure us it shall be, but we know the power of God, which can effect it, Mat. 22: 29. As Christ's resurrection was a glorious instance of the divine power, and therefore He is declared to be the Son of God with power, by the resurrection from the dead, Rom. 1: 4. so will our PRACT. OBS. We ought to be 'zealous of good works,' but to rejoice in the Lord' alone.—We cannot too earnestly guard men against those, who either oppose or pervert the doctrine of salvation by mercy and grace alone; we should also protest against 'evil workers,' of every description, with decision and impartiality. The true Christian will be aware of them, he 'worships God in the Spirit, glories in Christ Jesus,' has 'the circumcision of the heart,' and confides in nothing of which unregenerate men are capable. Jer. 9:23, 24. Col. 2:10—12. 1 Pet. 1:23—25.—But how far short do many, who 'have confidence in the flesh,' come of the attainments of Saul the persecutor! Their birth of Christian parents, early baptism, and 'form of godliness,' can scarcely be imagined superior to his distinctions of a similar nature; but where is their strictness, their zeal, their morality, and their blameless conduct? Yet they trust in their poor, scanty, worthless forms and duties, and count them too valuable to be exchanged for Christ and his salvation! But if they ever 'come to themselves,' and become acquainted with God, his law, and their own characters; they will 'count all their gain,' to be 'lost for Christ;' and deprecate, as sure destruction, having their eternal state in any measure decided according to their own righteousness; they will desire above all things to have 'that righteousness which is through the faith of Christ, even the righteousness which is of God by faith.' They will see, that no additions need be made to his 'unsearchable riches,' no scenery added to his sure refuge, no appendages to his robe of righteousness. Thus they will account themselves rich, safe, and happy, in proportion to their assurance of being 'found in Christ,' and 'made the righteousness of God in Him;' but, in seeking for this assurance, as well as in order to glorify so bounteous and beloved a Friend, they will also earnestly desire, and aim at, perfection, the apostle's language doubtless attests his Deity, in the most emphatical language. 1 Cor. 15:50—54. SCOTT.

(21.) 'Christ is here said to subdue all things to Himself by his own strong working, notwithstanding the same subjection of all things is ascribed to the Father, 1 Co. 15:25. He. 2:8. As Ro. 4:17. Ac. 26:6. Eph. 1:19. So Christ is said to raise Himself from the dead, Jn. 2:19. and to be raised by the Father, Ro. 4:24. &c. The inference is plain, [that, in his own words, He and the Father, "are One." Slade, Mackn.] BL.—Vile body. 'Literally the body of our humiliation, &c., i. e. this body in the form of sinful flesh, humbled and degraded as at present it is, and so different from what the body of Adam originally was.' NOTES. CHAP. IV. V. 1. This v. is principally remarkable for the variety of expressions, in which the apostle poured out the affection of his heart towards his brethren, or rather children, at Philippi. SCOTT.

(1.) 'Joy, i. e. object of joy; crown, i. e. cause of reward, Pr. 12:4.' BL.—So stand fast, &c. 'There is no more reason for making this the beginning of a new ch. than there would be for disjoining the last v. of 1 Cor. 15. in sense exactly parallel to this, from the preceding discourse on the resurrection, with which it is so beautifully and properly connected.' DODDR.

V. 2, 3. It is probable, Euodias and Syntyche were women of note at resurrection be: and his resurrection is a standing evidence, as well as pattern, of ours. And then all the enemies of the Redeemer's kingdom will be completely conquered. Not only he who had the power of death, i. e. the devil, Heb. 2:14. but the last enemy shall be destroyed, i. e. death, 1 Cor. 15:26. Death will be swallowed up in victory, v. 54.

CHAP. IV. V. 1—9. The apostle begins with exhortations to divers Christian duties.

I. To steadfastness in our Christian profession, v. 1. It is inferred from the close of the foregoing ch. Seeing our conversation is in heaven, and we look for the Savior from thence to fetch us thither: therefore, let us stand fast. Note, The believing hope and prospect of eternal life should engage us to be steady, [consistent,] even, and constant, in our Christian course. Observe, here,

1. The appellations are very endearing; My brethren, dearly beloved, and longed for, my joy and crown; and again, My dearly beloved. Thus he expresses the pleasure he took in them, the kindness he had for them, to convey his exhortations to them with so much the greater advantage. Warm affections become ministers and Christians toward one another. Brotherly love must always go along with the brotherly relation. Never was proud ambitious man more pleased with the ensigns of honor, than Paul was with the evidences of the sincerity of the faith and obedience of the Philippians. All this is to prepare his way to greater regard.

2. The exhortation itself; So stand fast in the Lord. Being in Christ, they must stand fast in Him, even and steady in their walk with Him, and close and constant unto the end. Or, To stand fast in the Lord, is to stand fast in his strength, and by his grace; not trusting in ourselves, and disclaiming any sufficiency of our own; we must be strong in the Lord, and in the power of his might, Eph. 6:10.

II. He exhorts them to unanimity and mutual assistance, v. 2, 3. This is directed to some particular persons. Euodias and Syntyche, it seems, were at variance, either one with the other, or with the church; either on a civil or on a religious account; it may be they were of different opinions and sentiments.

His exhortation to mutual assistance, v. 3. is also to particular persons. Who this true yoke-fellow was, is uncertain. Some think Epaphroditus, supposed to be one of the pastors of the Philippian church. Others think some eminent good woman, perhaps Paul's wife, because he exhorts his yoke-fellow to help the women which labored with him. It seems, there were women who labored with Paul in the Gospel; not in the public ministry; for the apostle expressly forbids that, 1 Tim. 2:12. but by entertaining the ministers, visiting the sick, instructing the ignorant, and convincing the erroneous.

With Clement, also, and other my fellow-laborers. Paul had a kindness for all his fellow-laborers; he says of them, Whose names are in the book of life; either they were chosen of God from all eternity, or registered and enrolled in the corporation and society to which the privilege of eternal life belongs, alluding to the custom among the Jews and Gentiles, of registering the inhabitants or the freemen of a city. So we read of their names being written in heaven, Luke 10:20. not blotting his name out of the book of life, Rev. 3:5. and of them who are written in the Lamb's book of life, Rev. 21:27. Observe, There is a book of life; there are names in that book, and not characters and conditions only. Whose names are written there we cannot know; but we may conclude, they who labor in the Gospel, and are faithful to the interests of Christ and souls, have their names in the book of life.

III. He exhorts to holy joy and delight in God, v. 4. All our joy must terminate in God, and our thoughts of God must be delightful. Observe, It is our duty and a more transforming 'knowledge of Christ,' a deeper experience of the power of his resurrection, and a nearer conformity to Him in his sufferings and death, by dying to sin, and crucifying the flesh with its affections and lusts. And, at the same time, the love of Christ will constrain them, if called to it, to suffer, yea, to die with Him, that they may be also glorified together; if so be they may, by any means, be partakers of the resurrection to eternal felicity in heaven. Thousands, and ten thousands, yea, millions, have testified, that the above is the judgment and experience of true Christians; nor can any measure of personal holiness or self-denying labors satisfy the man, who 'counts all but loss that he may win Christ,' and be justified by faith in Him alone.—Those who are most 'perfected and matured' in the life of faith and grace, still needs exhortations to be thus minded; they who are newly set out, should be called on to emulate such honorable examples; and while they judge and act in this manner, as to these grand concerns, the Lord will guide them into the further knowledge of his truth and will. For satisfactory views of divine things are far better acquired by peaceable meditation and diligent obedience, than by eager and angry disputations. (Notes, John 7:14—17. 8:30—36.) We should, however, be very careful not to grow remiss and languid, in those things 'to which we have already attained;' but still continue to 'walk by the same rule, and mind the same things,' that we may make a perpetual progress in the divine life, and secure, as it were, every post of which we have got possession. Let us then assiduously endeavor to walk after the example of apostles and evangelists, that our conduct may be meet for others to copy with advantage; (Note, 1 Th. 1:5—8.) for alas! in every age, there are professors of the Gospel, of whom the humble, zealous Christian can scarcely think or speak, without sorrow and weeping. SCOTT.

Philippi. The 'true yoke-fellow,' or genuine associate in the work of Christ, whom the apostle addressed without naming, was doubtless well known at Philippi, though our conjectures respecting him must be precarious. Some think, he was husband to one of the women above mentioned, others that he was some eminent minister at Philippi.—Clement. It is not certain that this was Clement Romanus, an epistle of whose writing is yet extant; but it is generally supposed that the apostle meant him.—(3) True yoke-fellow. The words may be used in the feminine; but they far more naturally lead the mind to think of a male associate. Labored. See on 1:27. (Note, 1:27—30.) It signifies to wrestle together, to make painful, earnest, and perilous exertions, with union and concert, in order to accomplish an important object.

(3.) 'Unworthy members might be erased from the list. Rev. 3:5.' BL.—Whose names. 'As I have reason in charity to hope; and we have no reason to conclude Paul had any particular revelation as to these friends, as certainly destined to salvation.' DODDR. And Fuller (in Williams) understands it of God's servants, not as elect, or as redeemed, or as called, but as his professed followers.

V. 4. The Lord. The Lord Jesus, or 'God in Christ,' 'God become our Salvation,' is especially meant, in all these animating calls to rejoice. Sc.

privilege to rejoice in God, and to rejoice in Him always; at all times, in all conditions; even when we suffer for Him, or are afflicted by Him. There is enough in God to furnish us with matter of joy in the worst circumstances on earth. He had said it before, ch. 3:1. Here he says it again. Joy

PRACT OBS. V. 1—9. Affectionate ministers, like tender parents, can scarcely find words emphatical enough to express their love, and their fervent desires after the felicity of those, whom they regard as their present 'joy,' and their future 'crown.' They so love the blessed office of peace-makers, that they will even supplicate, by name, their own children, to 'be of one mind in the Lord;' and they so much desire the success of every good work, that they use all their influence to excite every one 'to help all those, who labor' in any way to promote the Gospel, and thus give assurance that 'their names are written in the book of life.' This affectionate spirit should be cultivated, and sought in constant prayer, by all ministers, as peculiarly conducive to usefulness.—Believers have always ground of 'rejoicing in the Lord,' though they are not always able to rejoice; the perfection of their duty, and the full enjoyment of their privilege, are precisely the same; their disconsolations arise from weakness of faith and grace, and they should be called upon to 'rejoice in the Lord always,' though they be not able to come up to the standard that they may aim high; for the nearer they come to it, the more will God be glorified in and by them. Living upon these holy, satisfying, and substantial joys, we should make it appear,

V. 5—7. Peace of God.] This peace is 'my peace,' says Jesus; it is the 'fruit of the Spirit;' it is 'the peace of God.'—(5) Moderation.] It means, meekness under provocation, readiness to forgive injuries, equity in the management of business, candor in judging characters and actions, . . . sweetness of disposition, and the entire government of the passions.' Mackn. 'Equity, a mind moderate as to the things of this life, and by no means strictly exacting what is justly due.' Beza.—'The Lord is at hand,' (5) or near. Some understand the clause of his being a present help in trouble. Others suppose the apostle meant, that the Lord would speedily come to destroy Jerusalem, and deprive the Jews of that power and influence, by which they became the general instigators of persecution. Probably this interpretation was adopted, lest it should be inferred, that the apostle erroneously supposed the day of judgment to be near at hand; but it is by no means satisfactory. It is, however, the manner of the sacred writers, to consider all temporal things as short, and the end of them as 'at hand,' and 'the Judge as at the door;' and, seeing death is the same, in a great measure, to individuals, as judgment will be to the world at large, their language is in this respect highly suitable and proper.—(6) With thanksgiving.] 'Thus David, very often beginning with lamentations and tears, concludes with thanksgiving.' Beza.—The mind and heart are distinguished. 'The peace of God,' and the happy experience of it, fortifies and garrisons the intellectual faculties, against the cavils, objections, and vain reasonings of Infidels, skeptics, philosophers, and heretics, and the affections against the allurements and terrors of worldly objects, and both mind and heart against all the temptations of the devil. SCOTT.

V. 8, 9. The substance of the practical exhortations, which the apostle had further to give, might be comprised in few words. Whatsoever in God is a duty of great consequence in the Christian life; and Christians need to be again and again called to it. If good men have not a continual feast, it is their own fault.

IV. We are here exhorted to candor, gentleness, and good temper towards our brethren, v. 5. 'In things indifferent, do not run into extremes; avoid bigotry and animosity; judge charitably concerning one another.' The word signifies a good disposition towards other men; and this moderation is explained, Rom. 14. Some understand it of patiently bearing afflictions, or sober enjoyment of worldly good; and so it well agrees with the following v. The reason is, The Lord is at hand. The consideration of our Master's approach, and our final account, should keep us from smiting our fellow-servants, support us under present sufferings, and moderate our affections to outward good.

V. Here is a caution against disquieting, perplexing care, v. 6. the same expression with that, Mat. 6:25. Take no thought for your life, i. e. anxious care and distracting thoughts in the wants and difficulties of life. Observe, The duty and interest of Christians, is, to live without care. A care of diligence is our duty, and consists in a wise forecast and due concern; but a care of diffidence and distrust is our sin and folly, and only perplexes and distracts the mind.

VI. As a sovereign antidote against perplexing care, he recommends constant prayer; In everything by prayer and supplication, with thanksgiving, let your requests be made known to God. Observe, 1. We must pray not only at stated times, but on every particular emergence. 2. We must join thanksgiving with our prayers; grateful acknowledgments of what we have, argue a right disposition of mind, and are prevailing motives for further blessings. 3. Prayer is offering up our desires to God, or making them known to Him; not that God needs to be told either our wants or desires; but He will know them from us, have us [be constantly in this spiritual state] show our regards, and express our value of the mercy, and sense of our dependence on Him. 4. The effect of this will be the peace of God keeping our hearts, v. 7. the comfortable sense of our reconciliation to God, and interest in his favor, and the hope of blessedness, and enjoyment of God hereafter, which passeth all understanding, a greater good than can be sufficiently valued or duly expressed.

VII. We are exhorted to get and keep a good name; a name for good things with God and good men, v. 8. a regard to truth in our words and engagements, and to decency and becomingness in our behavior, suitable to our circumstances and condition of life; justice and righteousness in our dealings with men; without the impurity or mixture of sin; things that will render us beloved, and make us well spoken, as well as well thought of, by others. If there is any virtue, any praise, anything really virtuous and worthy of commendation, think on these things, imitate them. Virtue has its praise, and will have. We should walk in all her ways, and abide therein; then, whether our praise be of men or no, it will be of God, Rom. 2:29.

In these things he proposes himself for an example, v. 9. Paul's doctrine and life were of a piece. What they saw in him, was the same thing with what they heard from him. He could propose himself as well as his doctrine to their imitation. It gives great force to what we say to others, when we can appeal to what they have seen in us. And this is the way to have the God of peace with us,—to keep close to our duty to Him. The Lord is with us while we are with Him.

V. 10—19. In these vs. the apostle, I. Acknowledges their former kindnesses to him, v. 15, 16. Paul had a grateful spirit: his friends did nothing for him in comparison of what he deserved from them; yet he speaks of their kindness as if it had been a generous charity, when it was really far short of a just debt. Surely never was a present so well repaid.

that we are not of this world. The transient joys and sorrows of the present scene are not worth our solicitude; all our temporal and eternal interests are in the Lord's hands; we should therefore be 'careful for nothing,' except to know the state of our souls, and the path of duty. In all our sorrows, fears, wants, or trials, we should 'make our requests known unto God;' for, though He knows them beforehand, He loves to hear them from us.—All our privileges, and salvation, originate wholly from the free mercy of God, yet the actual enjoyment of them is intimately connected with our holy conversation. Therefore, 'whatsoever things are true,' venerable, just, pure, loving, 'lovely, or of good report,' whatsoever is virtuous and commendable; whatsoever prophets, apostles, or martyrs have exemplified; whatsoever excellency we have heard and read of, or witnessed, in the conduct of the saints; nay, whatever things the world, on good grounds, regards and approves as virtuous and commendable; these things we should continually think of, and diligently practice, and in this way we may confidently expect, and shall doubtless experience, the presence and blessing of the God of peace and love, in every circumstance of life and death. SCOTT.

temper, words, or actions, in any way expressed truth, candor, sincerity, or fidelity; whatsoever appeared grave, 'venerable,' or respectable; whatsoever was just and upright, stamped with probity and integrity; whatsoever evinced purity, chastity, and temperance; whatsoever was amiable, or friendly; whatsoever was justly of good report, and approved as virtuous or commendable, among men; let the Philippians continually 'think of these things,' form a due estimate of the value of each, adopt such as were really good, and manifest them in every part of their conduct. (M. R. b—k.) In short, let them practice what he had taught them, and what they had received as teachable scholars; what they had heard from him, and witnessed in his example; then he could confidently assure them of the comforting and protecting presence of their reconciled God, (as the Author of inward and outward peace,) with their souls and in their assemblies. SCOTT.

V. 8. Honest.] 'Grave and venerable. Lardner well expresses the apostle's design; "they should avoid unbecoming levity in word, action, habit, and outward behavior, which tends to render men despicable."—Lovely, friendly, and kind; this seems more exact than lovely, though there is certainly a lovely charm in such friendly things.' DONDR.

V. 10—13. (11) Learned, &c.] He seems to have learned these things, by a deep sense of his own unworthiness, and his obligations to the Lord, by continually contemplating the poverty, abasement, and sufferings of Christ, by a believing confidence in the wisdom, faithfulness, and love of God, who ordered all this concern in the best manner possible, by a lively hope of immortal felicity, and an ardent desire, by any labors or sufferings, to promote the cause of Christ in the world.—It appears to us wonderful, that the apostle, in so affluent a city as Rome, where a flourishing church of Christ had been for a considerable time

11 Not that I speak in respect of want: for I have learned, in whatsoever state I am, therewith to be content.

12 I know both how to be abased, and I know how to abound: every where, and in all things, I am instructed, both to be full and to be hungry, both to abound and to suffer need.

13 I can do all things through Christ which strengtheneth me.

14 Notwithstanding, ye have well done that ye did communicate with my affliction.

15 Now, ye Philippians, know also, that in the beginning of the gospel, when I departed from Macedonia, no church communicated with me as concerning giving and receiving, but ye only.

16 For even in Thessalonica ye sent once and again unto my necessity.

17 Not because I desire a gift; but I desire fruit that may abound to your account.

18 But I have all, and abound: I am full, having received of Epaphroditus the things which were sent from you, an odor of a sweet smell, a sacrifice acceptable, well-pleasing to God.

19 But my God shall supply all your need, according to his riches in glory by Christ Jesus.

20 Now unto God and our Father be glory for ever and ever. Amen.

He reminds them, how they not only maintained him comfortably while with them, but sent tokens of their kindness after him, when he departed from Macedonia; and this, when no other church did so besides, v. 15. It redounded so much the more to their honor, that they were the only church who were thus just and generous. Even in Thessalonica (after he was departed from Macedonia) ye sent once and again to my necessity, v. 16. It is an excellent thing to see those to whom God has abounded in the established, and even after his imprisonment for the Gospel had excited very great attention, among large multitudes, should want the necessities or comforts of life. But the Gentiles, in general, were little in the habit of giving to the poor, or contributing to the support of the ministers of religion; and the apostle, like Elisha in respect of Naaman, would be extremely careful not to excite their prejudices, or interrupt the success of the Gospel, by his own concerns; so that, probably, it was not generally known that he was in want. The Christians at Rome, as in other places, were, it may be supposed, chiefly of the lower orders, and they had already to provide for their own pastors, the poor, and the expenses of their religious worship. Yet, after all these considerations have been allowed their full weight, not only the disinterestedness of the apostle, but the inattention, to say no more, of the Christians, cannot but excite our astonishment!—I am instructed.] A reference is made to the initiation of select persons into certain concealed mysteries, among the heathen. There is reason to believe, that these celebrated mysteries contained much evil, and little or no good; but the mystery of the life of faith, submission to God, and reliance on Him, was of a higher and nobler nature.—(11) To be content.] The seat of his satisfaction is in himself, independent of creatures, but derived from God, and sustained by Him.

(10.) Bl. remarks here the dignified delicacy of the apostle; also at v. 11. such a mixture of dignity and delicacy as is rarely to be met with in the most finished compositions. ED.—'The apostle likened the Philippians' care of him to a plant, which withers and dies in winter, but groweth in the following year; or to trees, which, after their leaves drop in the autumn, put them forth again in spring. Lest, however, the Philippians might think this expression insinuated a complaint, that they had been negligent latterly, the apostle immediately added, that they gifts of his grace, abounding in grateful returns to his people and ministers, according to their own ability, and their necessity; Ye sent once and again. Many people excuse their charity, that they have given once; but the Philippians often relieved and refreshed Paul in his necessities. He makes this mention of their former kindness, not only in his own gratitude, but for their encouragement.

11. He excuses their neglect of late. It seems, for some time, they had not sent to inquire after him, or sent him any present; but now, at the last, their care of him flourished again, v. 10. like a tree in the spring, which seemed all the winter to be quite dead. They might have sent a messenger on purpose. But the apostle is willing to suppose, in favor of them, that they would have done it if a fair opportunity had offered. How contrary is this to the conduct of many to their friends, by whom neglects, which really are excusable, are resented very heinously.

111. He commends their present liberality, v. 14. It is good to help a good minister in trouble. Here see the nature of true Christian sympathy; not only to be concerned for our friends in their troubles, but to do what we can to help them, Ja. 2:16. He rejoiced greatly in it, v. 10. because it was an evidence of their affection to him, and the success of his ministry among them.

IV. He obviates the ill use some might make of his taking so much notice of what was sent him. It did not proceed either from discontent and distrust, v. 11. or from covetousness, and love of the world, v. 12.

1. Not from discontent, or distrust of Providence, v. 11. not in respect of any want he felt, or of any he feared. As to the former, he was content with the little he had; as to the latter, he depended on the providence of God to provide for him from day to day. We have here an account of Paul's learning, not what he got at the feet of Gamaliel, but of Christ. He was in bonds, and imprisonments, and necessities, often; but in all he had learnt to be content, to bring his mind to his condition, and to make the best of it, v. 12. This is a special act of grace, to accommodate ourselves to every condition of life, and carry an equal temper of mind through all the varieties of our state. In prosperity, not to be proud and secure, is as hard, as, in adversity, not to lose comfort in God, and distrust his providence. And how must we learn it? v. 13. We need strength from Christ, to enable us to perform not only those duties which are purely Christian, but even those which are the fruit of moral virtue. We need his strength to teach us to be content in every condition. The apostle had seemed to boast of himself, and of his own strength, v. 12. but here transfers all praise to Christ. The word in the original is a participle of the present tense, and denotes a present and continued act; 'Through Christ, strengthening me continually, by his constant, renewed strength, I am enabled to act in everything; I wholly depend on Him for all my spiritual power.'

2. Not from covetousness, or an affection to worldly wealth; Not because I desire a gift, v. 17. i. e. 'I welcome your kindness, not because it adds to my enjoyments, but because it adds to your account.' He desired it not so much for his own sake, but theirs; fruit that may abound to your account; it is not with any design to draw more from you, but to encourage you to such an [habitual] exercise of beneficence, as will [be its own] glorious reward hereafter. 'For my part,' says he, 'I have all, and abound,' v. 18. They sent him a small token, and he desired no more; he was not solicitous for a present superfluity, or a future supply; I am full, having received from Epaphroditus the things which were sent from you. Note, A good man will soon have enough of this world; not only of living in it, but of receiving from it. A covetous worldling, if he has ever so much, would still have more; but a heavenly Christian, though he has little, has enough.

V. The apostle assures them, that God did accept, and would recompense, their kindness to him.

1. He did accept it; It is an odor of a sweet smell; a sacrifice, acceptable, well-pleasing to God. Not a sacrifice of atonement, for none makes atonement for sin but Christ; but a sacrifice of acknowledgment, and well-pleasing to God. It was more acceptable to God as the fruit of their grace, than to Paul as the supply of his want. With such sacrifices God is well pleased, Heb. 13:16.

2. He would recompense it, v. 19. 'He shall do it, not only as your God, but as my God, who takes what is done to me as done to Himself. You supplied my needs, according to your poverty; and He shall supply yours, according to his riches.' But still it is by Christ Jesus: through Him we have grace to do that which is good, and through Him we must expect the reward of it. Not of debt, but of grace; for the more we do for God, the more we are indebted to Him, because we receive the more from Him.

V. 20—23. The apostle concludes:

1. With praises to God, v. 20. as our Father, a relation of great condescension in God, and of great encouragement to us; we should look upon God, under all our weakness and fears, not as a tyrant or an enemy, but as a Father, who is disposed to pity and help us. 2. With salutations to his friends at Philippi, v. 21. He had always been careful to supply his wants, but had not had an opportunity till now.

V. 14—20. Nothing could more fully show the peculiar confidence the apostle had, concerning the Christians at Philippi, (as well as the fervor of his prayer for them,) than this conduct in receiving support from them, and so long after thus acknowledging it. Thessalonica was indeed a larger city than Philippi, but probably the converts to Christianity were poorer, and perhaps they had not been so fully proved, when he was driven from them, as the Philippians had been 2 Cor. 8: 1—5.—As Thessalonica was the chief city of Macedonia, at which Paul continued some time, it has been supposed that the clause, 'when I departed from Macedonia,' relates to a supply sent to him, after he was gone into Achaia, distinct from what had been sent him in Thessalonica.—The language used, concerning the conduct of the Philippians, being in the most emphatical terms the same which is used concerning the atonement of Christ, (Eph. 5:2,) is wonderful; and it shows how pleasing real good works, 'the fruits of the Spirit,' are to God, through Jesus Christ. Heb. 6:9, 10. 13:15, 16.

(15.) Giving and receiving.] Doseōs, lēpseōs: mercantile terms of credit and receipt. If anything was given, it was not worth noting or putting down, i. e. in the account book, denoted by logon, as at v. 11? See Bl.

V. 21, 22. 'The brethren,' may here either mean the ministers at Rome, or such of the apostle's friends, as were come from other parts to be with him.—There were true 'saints in Nero's household,' who kept their places, and served Christ in that most perilous and ensnaring situation, as Daniel did in the court of Nebuchadnezzar and Darius. Dan. 4—6.—It is probable, that they were generally in inferior stations.

22 All the saints salute you, chiefly they that are of Cesar's household.

23 The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all. Amen.

¶ It was written to the Philippians from Rome, by Epaphroditus.

PRACT. OBS. V. 10—23. Even those who on the whole prosper in religion, have their winters, as well as their spring seasons; sometimes their zeal and love seem to languish, and then again at last they 'flourish' more abundantly. Yet they often 'lack opportunity,' when they perhaps are judged inattentive; and faithful ministers may sometimes suspect or mourn over them, when, if they knew all, they might be rejoicing greatly in the Lord for them. We should, however, confide in God alone, for human friendships are precarious.—It is a great and exceedingly rare and difficult attainment, to 'learn, in whatever state we are, therewith to be content.' Pride, unbelief, a vain hankering after something unpossessed, a fickle, sickly disrelish of present comforts, and the tedious repetition of the same actions and scenes which no longer give pleasure, render men naturally discontented in the most favorable circumstances; and their continual shiftings, from one thing to another, resemble the tossing to and fro of a man in a fever, who imputes his restlessness to his posture, rather than to his disease. The discontented spirit, then, is the effect of inward disease, not of outward circumstances; and content must spring from inward health of soul, even from holiness. It requires much humility, spirituality, faith, and resignation, to render us contented in our appointed situations. Probably, few Christians, who even enjoy liberty and plenty, can sincerely and unreservedly adopt the language of Paul, the indigent prisoner of Jesus Christ. We ought, however, to study this important lesson; we can indeed of ourselves 'do nothing;' but we may do all things through

(21, 22.) The brethren . . . all the saints.] 'From this distinction, I conclude that it is highly probable, the ministers at Rome were called brethren.'

III. 'The importance and duty of unity is further demonstrated, by the baneful effects of sectarian divisions.'

'They tend to destroy that community of interest, and sympathy of feeling which the Savior and his apostles so urgently inculcate. How fervently does our blessed Lord supplicate (Jn. 17:20, 21.) for the unity of all his followers! "Neither pray I for these (the apostles) alone, but for them also who believe on Me through their word; that they may all be one, as Thou Father art in Me and I in Thee,"—that there may be among them that unity of counsel, of feeling, of purpose, of action, which exists between the Father and the Son. What can be more reasonable? If all his disciples, all who "believe in Him through the Word," are hereafter to inhabit the same heaven, to surround the same throne of God and the Lamb! No! sectarianism is an acknowledged and,—alas that it should be so,—a cherished trait of the church on earth, which will never, never be admitted into heaven. And who can doubt, that the nearer we can bring the church on earth to the character of the church in heaven, the more pleasing will she be to Him that purchased her with his blood, 1 Cor. 12:25. But, gracious Lord! . . . does not the great mass of the several religious denominations of our land exhibit anything else than "the same ear" for the other members of Christ's body? If one denomination suffers, fails of success, or meets with disgrace in some of its unworthy members, do not surrounding denominations rather at least tacitly and cheerfully acquiesce, if not rejoice, hoping that thus more room will be made and facility offered for their own enlargement? We do not find that members of the same family thus cordially acquiesce or triumph in each other's misfortune or disgrace. If one brother is visited by any calamity, if he falls a victim to intemperance, and bears about in his bloated face the ensign of his disgrace, do we not rather sympathize, feel hurt ourselves, and mourn over his downfall? Thus ought it to be among all who deserve the name of Christ. Thus would it be, if the community of interest, in the Savior's family, had not been impaired by sectarian divisions, which place several distinct religious families on the same ground, with separate pecuniary interests, with conflicting prejudices, with rival, sectarian aims! In the apostolic age, and for centuries after it, only one Christian church occupied the same field, and thus three fourths of the causes which originate contention among modern Christians, were avoided. Again, sectarian divisions impede the impartial study of the sacred volume, by ministers and laymen. [See Guide to Study of Bible, (Supplement to Comp. Com.) p. 23.] The doctrines believed by what are termed the orthodox churches, as well as their forms of government and worship, may be divided into two classes, those which are undisputed, and held by all in common, and those which are disputed by some of them, and which distinguish the sects from each other. The sectarian principle builds a wall of defence around the peculiar opinions of each sect. It enlists all Christians in defence of the peculiarities of their denominations, and creates powerful motives of a self-interested and unholy character in vindication of these peculiarities, rather than of the grand truths of Christianity, which are essential to the salvation of all; motives which appeal to the pride of some, [the love of power in others,] the avarice of others, and the ambition [and vanity] of a fourth class. Each member is taught by the very principles of his [selfish and] sinful nature, to feel identified with the peculiar interests of his sect. His vanity is flattered by the supposed respectability of his sect, his ambition is at least tempted by the prospect of extended influence, [admiration,] or distinction in the ministry, or as a layman in the ecclesiastical councils of his extensive and respectable church; and his avarice is concerned in diminishing his own expenses, by the increasing numbers of his fellow-members; or, if a minister, by the ample support he may obtain. We would not insinuate, that all Christians are influenced by these namable motives; nor that any true disciple of the Savior is mainly actuated by them. But we fear, that the majority of professors in the church are more influenced by these secular considerations, than they themselves are aware. Accordingly, the peculiarities of sect acquire a factitious importance, are often inculcated with as much assiduity, as the great and cardinal doctrines of the Gospel. Endlippi, v. 21. He desires remembrances, not only to the bishops and deacons, and the church in general, but to every particular saint. Paul had a kind affection to all good Christians. 3. He sends salutations from those who were at Rome; all the saints, chiefly the Christian converts who belonged to the emperor's court. The Gospel early obtained among some of the rich and great. Chiefly they, &c. Observe, They, being bred at court, were more complaisant than the rest. See what an ornament to religion sanctified civility is. 4. The apostolical benediction, as usual: 'the free favor and good-will of Christ be your portion and happiness!'

Christ, who inwardly strengthens his people, in proportion as they simply depend on Him. He can teach and enable his ministers to live in poverty among the affluent, without grudging, envying, coveting, or repining, even when they have an equitable claim on them for a portion of their abundance. Indeed, we should peculiarly aim at this, if we would be examples to the flock, and convince the wealthy that we 'seek not theirs but them.'—Notwithstanding this, the people should be taught, that 'they do well in communicating to the wants' of their faithful pastors, who are justly entitled to liberal assistance, in proportion as they are willing to 'endure all things, rather than hinder the Gospel of Christ.' (Note, 1 Cor. 9:7—23.) And those who distinguish themselves in such services, from pure motives, shall he 'had in everlasting remembrance.'—Pride, rather than disinterestedness; sometimes induces men, when in actual straits, to refuse or decline such help, as is offered them in the most unexceptionable manner; but still more evidently, it is this evil principle, which makes them unwilling to acknowledge the favors they have received.—Whether saints reside in palaces, cottages, or dungeons, communion should be maintained among them, by mutual prayers, salutations, and kindnesses. The Lord will have some to honor Him in every situation, and He can preserve them unhurt in their proper places, however perilous, by the power which protected the three young men in the fiery furnace, Dan. 3: for 'the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ' will be with all his true people, wherever dispersed, or however distinguished, and prove eventually 'sufficient for them.' Sc.

Raphel, so some; others, with more probability, explain, Cesar's [i. e. the Roman emperor's] domestics and ministers, especially freed-men. See Jos. and Philo. The domus Cesaris often occurs in the inscriptions, and the oikia Kaisaros in the Greek historians, as Dio Cass. Bl.

less and useless controversies about these points agitate the church, and disturb her peace. These peculiarities are instilled into the tender minds of children, and are often represented as involving the marrow of salvation. Prejudices are raised in their behalf. The tenets of other denominations are often kept out of view, [unknown, misrepresented,] or stated in a manner but ill calculated for an impartial investigation of God's truth. The antipathies of the social circle are sometimes arrayed in opposition, and, may I say, sometimes, in ridicule of other denominations; and even the gentler sex, sisters of her of Bethany, who, sitting at her Master's feet, imbibed the [effluences] of his love; sisters of them, who, true to their affection, were "Last at the cross, and earliest at the grave," have hated [for hatred of something is but too natural to every human heart] even that Savior, in the person of his followers, because they wore not the badge of their sect! have forgotten that their religion is love,—that charity, divine charity, is the brightest ornament of their nature! Under such circumstances, doubts of the sectarian peculiarities inculcated, would expose the ingenuous youth, who should avow them, to social inconveniences, to parental disapprobation; and rarely does he enjoy ample opportunity for impartial investigation, before adult age. The fact, that, almost invariably, young persons adopt and prefer the peculiar sectarian views of their parents, is a demonstrative proof that their preference is not built on argument, but that the mode of religious education, in the different churches, is unfavorable to impartial investigation. The simple circumstance of parental belief, is assuredly no satisfactory proof of the creed which we adopt on account of it. For the same reason, we would have been Mahommedans, if born in Turkey; Papists, in Italy, and worshippers of the Grand Lama, in Thibet. And ministers of the Gospel have still greater obstacles to surmount, as their disbelief of the peculiarities of their sect tarnishes their reputation [and injures their proper influence] with their associates; yea, not unfrequently excludes them from their pastoral charge, and their families from daily bread!

'Lastly, the principle of sectarian divisions powerfully retards the spiritual conquests of Christianity over the world. Who that knows aught of the divine life, can doubt, that in proportion as he permits pride, envy, jealousy, hatred, to arise in his heart, the spirit of piety languishes, his graces decline, and his sense of the divine presence is impaired? But sectarianism, by which, in this discussion, we [mean generally] the principle of divisions on the ground of difference in non-essentials, among those who profess to regard each other as fellow-Christians, sectarianism indubitably creates various conflicting interests, presents numerous occasions and temptations to envy, hatred, jealousy, slander, and creates an atmosphere around the Christian, in which the flame of piety cannot burn with lustre, and not unfrequently expires.

'What observer of transpiring scenes can doubt, that the sectarian strife, and animosity between the churches, deter many sinners from making religion the subject of their chief concern, and from being converted to God? The Savior prayed: "That they all may be one, as Thou Father art in Me, and I in Thee; that they may also be one in us; that the world may believe that Thou has sent Me." Here, then, the Savior Himself informs us, what influence unity among his followers was designed to effect; history tells us, that when surrounding heathen were constrained to say, "See how these Christians love one another," the moral influence of their example was amazing: and who can doubt, that inverse causes produce inverse effects.

'How often does not the principle of sect, exclude the blessed Savior from our villages, and sparsely populated sections of country, in which united Christians might support the Gospel; but, cut up into jealous and discordant sects, and hating one another as though each believed a different Christ, all remain destitute of the stated means of grace! The occasional visits of ministers of different sects, serve to confirm each party in its own predilections, and thus we often witness the melancholy spectacle of the Savior excluded from such places by the dissensions of his professed friends, and sinners shut out from the sanctuary of God, because saints cannot agree whether Paul, or Apollos, or Cephas shall minister unto them.

PAUL'S EPISTLE TO THE COLOSSIANS,
WITH
PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS AND NOTES.

(Henry's Exposition, completed by Dr. W. Harris.)

Colosse was a considerable city of Phrygia, probably not far from Laodicea and Hierapolis; we find these three mentioned together, chap. 4:13. It is now buried in ruins, [see the cut, from Arundell,] and the memory of it chiefly preserved in this epistle.* Paul professes a great satisfaction in their steadfastness and constancy, and encourages them to perseverance. It was written about the same time with the epistles to the Ephesians and Philippians, A. D. 62, and in the same place, while he was now prisoner at Rome. He was not idle in his confinement, and the Word of God was not bound.

[The immediate occasion of this epistle, says Horne, was Epaphras' requesting Paul's advice, and perhaps the Laodicean letter, 4:16.] Like that to the Romans, it was written to those whom Paul had never seen. The church was not planted by Paul's ministry, but by the ministry of Epaphras, or Epaphroditus, † an evangelist, one whom he delegated to preach the Gospel among the Gentiles; and yet, I. There was a flourishing church at Colosse, and one eminent and famous among the churches. God is sometimes pleased to use the ministry of those who are of less note, and lower gifts, for doing great service to his church; He is not tied to those of note, that the excellence of the power may appear to be of God, and not of men, 2 Cor. 4:7. II. Though Paul had not the planting of this church, yet he did not, therefore, neglect it; nor, in writing his epistles, does he make any difference between that and other churches. The Colossians, who were converted by the ministry of Epaphras, were as dear to him, and he as much concerned for their welfare, as the Philippians, or any others who were converted by his ministry. Thus he put an honor on an inferior minister, and teaches us not to be selfish, or think all that honor lost, which goes beside ourselves. We learn in his example not to think it a disparagement to us to water what others have planted; or build on the foundation others have laid: as he himself, as a wise master-builder, laid the foundation, and another builded thereon, 1 Cor. 3:10.

HENRY.

There is a great similarity between this epistle, and that to the Ephesians; ‡ and it is generally supposed, they were written about the same time, and sent by the same messenger, even Tychicus; though Onesimus, being a Colossian, who accompanied Tychicus, is not mentioned in the epistle to the Ephesians. 4:7—14, v. 9.—The apostle had probably heard of some teachers, who, grafting heathen philosophy, along with the tradition of the Pharisees, on the ritual law of Moses, had corrupted the Gospel by this heterogeneous mixture, and were attempting to draw aside the Colossians. He therefore particularly warned them against these deceivers, and against all who, either by superstitious observances, or philosophy, attempted to seduce them from 'the simplicity of Christ,' in whom alone 'they were complete,' and had everything they could possibly want, or imagine, as really conducive to their edification and salvation. These cautions and exhortations are introduced, and connected with the most exalted views of the personal and mediatorial dignity of Christ, and the fulness and freeness of his salvation; which many suppose to have been directed against some of those heretical sects, which sprang up at an early period in the church, the leaders of which sought to exalt themselves, by derogating from the glory of the divine Savior.—It appears, however, that the church at Colosse was, on the whole, in a very flourishing state; and accordingly the epistle abounds far more in thanksgivings to God, commendations, and animating exhortations, than in reproofs and warnings.—Epaphras was, probably, when the apostle wrote, confined as a prisoner at Rome. § Phil. 23. SCOTT.

* Colosse was situated nearly midway between Laodicea and Hierapolis, on an eminence S. of the river Meander, near where the river Lycus enters the earth. All these cities were destroyed by an earthquake in the 10th year of Nero, and about a year after the writing of this epistle. Colosse is [proved] to have occupied a site now covered with ruins, near the village of Konous, or Khonos, about 3 hours from Laodicea, but on the other side of the river, supposed the Lycus, and about 20 miles N. W. of Deg-nizlu.

† This has of late been much controverted, yet (the general testimony of antiquity favors it, and) my decided opinion is, that the evidence against the apostle's having been at Colosse (comp. 2:1.) is far greater than any adduced on the affirmative side. S. ‡ Whoever, says Mich., would understand the Ephesians and Colossians, must read them together: one being, in most places, a commentary on the other, and parallel passages interpret each other. Yet in Colossians there is much not in Ephesians, especially as to worship of angels, and many single points which appear to be Essene, and might prevail at Colosse.

CHAP. I.

1 After salutation he thanketh God for their faith, 7 confirmeth the doctrine of Epaphras, 9 prayeth farther for their increase in grace, 14 describeth the true Christ, 21 encourageth them to receive Jesus Christ, and commendeth his own ministry.

PAUL, * an apostle of Jesus Christ, by the will of God, and Timotheus our brother,

2 To the saints <sup>b</sup> and faithful brethren in Christ which are at <sup>c</sup> Colosse: Grace be unto you, and peace, from God our Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ.

3 We <sup>d</sup> give thanks to God and the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, praying always for you,

4 Since we heard of your faith in Christ Jesus, and of the love which ye have to all the saints;

5 For the hope which is laid up <sup>e</sup> for you in heaven, whereof ye heard before in the word of the truth of the gospel;

6 Which is come unto you, as it is in all <sup>f</sup> the world; and bringeth <sup>g</sup> forth fruit, as it doth also in you, since the day ye heard <sup>h</sup> of it, and knew the <sup>i</sup> grace of God in <sup>j</sup> truth.

7 As ye also learned of <sup>k</sup> Epaphras our dear fellow-servant, who is for you a faithful minister of Christ;

8 Who also declared unto us your love <sup>l</sup> in the Spirit.

9 For this cause we also, since the day we heard it, do not cease to pray for you, and to desire that ye might be filled with the knowledge of his <sup>m</sup> will, in all <sup>n</sup> wisdom and spiritual <sup>o</sup> understanding.

10 That ye might walk <sup>p</sup> worthy of the Lord unto all <sup>q</sup> pleasing, <sup>r</sup> being fruitful in every good work, and increasing <sup>s</sup> in the knowledge of God;

CHAP. I. V. 1, 2. The inscription of this epistle is much the same with the rest; only it is observable,

1. That he calls himself an apostle of Jesus Christ by the will of God. He attributes this not to his own merit, strength, or sufficiency; but to the free grace and good-will of God.

2. He joins Timothy with himself; in his humility he calls him his son, 2 Tim. 2:1.

NOTES. CHAP. I. V. 1, 2. 'I cannot think, they are called holy and faithful brethren, on account of their adhering to the purity of the Christian faith, in opposition to those that urged the necessity of observing the Jewish law. This was indeed one instance of their fidelity, but I think it greatly impoverishes and debases the sense of such an extensive phrase, to reduce it within such narrow bounds. Many scores of criticisms of some modern commentators of reputation are liable to the same exception.' DODDR.—The author quotes this passage, as exactly conveying his own opinion on several learned expositions, both before and since the time of the pious Doddridge. They give you a bucket of water, and speak as if they had emptied the well. SCOTT.

(2.) Saints.] 'I would beg the reader not to overlook, that here, as in all others of Paul's inspired writings, [the epistle is] directed to the church of God, and to that church only.' HAWKER.—'It is plain there may be saints in this life,—on earth: this confutes the papists, who acknowledge no saints till canonized by the pope, and it must be one hundred years after they are dead.' BYFIELD, in Henry, abr.

V. 3. To God and the Father.] 'The God and Father.' DODDR. and MACKN.—Always.] 'It may be joined with either giving thanks, as by the more recent commentators; or with praying, as by the ancient, and earlier moderns. The latter is more natural:—but it may be said to belong to both.' BLOOMF.

V. 4. Faith.] 'The steadfastness, constancy, and perseverance of their faith.' HEWLETT.—Faith and love.] 'The former denotes the profession of the Christian religion; the latter, kindness and charity towards the poor brethren.—But the full sense of faith and heard [here] will depend on the determination of the question, whether or yet here his brother; an example to elder and more eminent ministers, towards the younger and more obscure.

3. He calls the Christians at Colosse saints, and faithful brethren in Christ. Note, Faithfulness runs through every character and relation of the Christian life, and is the crown and glory of them all.

4. The apostolical benediction is the same as usual. He wishes them grace and peace, the free favor of God, and all the blessed fruits of it; all kinds of spiritual blessings, and that from God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ; jointly from both, and distinctly from each; as in the former epistle.

V. 3—8. Here he proceeds with thanksgiving to God for what he had heard of them, though he had no personal acquaintance with them, and knew their state and character only by report. Observe,

I. Whom he gives thanks to, v. 3. In our thanksgiving we must have an eye to God as God, and as the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, in, and through whom, all good comes to us.

II. What he gives thanks to God for, v. 4, 5. Faith, hope, and love, the three principal graces in the Christian life, and proper matter of our prayer and thanksgiving. We must believe in Jesus Christ, love Christian brethren, and be looking for the blessed hope of heaven hereafter. Some understand the love here of their charity to the saints in necessity: the happiness of heaven is called their hope, because it is the thing hoped for, Tit. 2:13. Having blessed God for these graces, he blesses God for the means of grace which they enjoyed. They heard of the hope laid up in heaven in the word of the truth of the Gospel, v. 6.

'This Gospel is preached, and bringeth forth fruit in other nations; it is come to you, as it is in all the world, according to the commission, Go preach the Gospel in all the nations, and to every creature.' He takes this occasion to mention the minister by whom they believed, v. 7, 8. He mentions him with great respect, to engage their love to him. He calls him his fellow-servant; to signify not only that they served the same Master, but that they were engaged in the same work. He calls him his dear fellow-servant: it is an endearing consideration to the servants of Christ, that they are engaged in the same service. He represents him as one who was a faithful minister of Christ to them. Observe, Christ is our proper Master, and we his ministers. He does not say, your minister; but the minister of Christ for you. It is by Christ's authority, but for the people's service. He represents him as one who gave them a good word, v. 8. He recommends him to their affection, from the good report he made of their sincere love to Christ and all his members, which was wrought in them by the Spirit, and is agreeable to the Spirit of the Gospel. Faithful ministers are glad to be able to speak well of their people.

V. 9—11. The apostle proceeds in these vs. to pray for them. He heard they were good, and prayed they might be better. He was constant in this prayer. Observe, What he begs of God for them.

1. That they might be knowing, intelligent Christians; filled with the knowledge of his will, in all wisdom and spiritual understanding. The knowledge of our duty is the best knowledge. Our knowledge of the will of God must be always practical. Our knowledge is then a blessing indeed, when it is in wisdom; when we know how to apply our general knowledge to our particular occasions, and to suit it to all emergencies. Christians should endeavor to be filled with knowledge; not only to know the will of God, but to know more of it, and to increase in the knowledge of God, v. 10. 2 Pet. 3:18.

2. That their conversation might be good. Good knowledge, without a good life, will not profit. Our understanding is then a spiritual understanding, when we exemplify it in our way of living—That ye might walk worthy of the Lord unto all pleasing, v. 10. that is, as becomes the relation we stand in to Him, and the profession we make of Him. The agreeableness of our conversation to our religion, is pleasing to God, as well as to good men. This is what we should aim at. Good words will not do without good works. We must abound in good works, in every good work: not in some only, but in all, and in every instance of them. There must be a regular, uniform regard to all the will of God. And the more fruitful we are in good works, the more we shall increase in the knowledge of God, Jn. 7:17.

3. That they might be strengthened; strengthened with all might, according to his glorious power, v. 11. fortified against the temptations of Satan, and furnished for all their duty. To be strengthened, is to be furnished by the grace of God for every good work, and fortified by that grace against every evil one: it is to be enabled to do our duty, and still to hold fast our integrity. Of this strength, the blessed Spirit is the Author, Eph. 3:16. the Word of God the mean, and the method, prayer: so the apostle obtained sufficient grace. Observe, He prays they might be strengthened with might: i. e. might be mightily strengthened, or strengthened with might derived from another; with all might: he means, all we have occasion for, to enable us to discharge our duty, or preserve our innocence; the grace sufficient for us in all the trials of life, and to help us in time of need. It is according to his glorious power. He means, the grace of God: which in believers is the power of God; and there is a glory in it; it is an excellent and sufficient power; the communinot Paul founded the church at Colosse,—which, however, probably, he did not. BLOOMF.

BL. In all the world . . . comp. v. 23. Gospel . . . preached to every creature under heaven.] Being preached at Rome, whence was constant communication, from Parthia to Britain, from the Baltic to Ethiopia, it might be said to be heard of throughout that space. Some of the apostles, we know, though we have the lives of but few, (see Cave.) travelled to Babylon, India, Parthia, Tartary, Persia, &c., but the records of their labors are mostly buried in the obscurity of heathenism, and so can not much confirm, certainly not contradict, the assertion of Paul. The Chinese had intercourse, in the century before Christ, with foreigners dealing in 'pearls and merchandise,' some coming 'on a voyage of 4 or 5 months,' as their records evince (see Morrison); and also, expressly with 'India,' the 'Great West,' &c., in 173 to 195 A. D. Obscure traditions, too, are said to exist, both among the Chinese and Japanese, of the preaching of the Gospel among them, by the middle of the 1st century, A. D. So that, very possibly, Paul's language is not mere hyperbole: the subject, indeed, is well worthy of further investigation. ED.

eations of strength are not according to our weakness, to whom the strength is communicated, but according to his power, from whom it is received. The special use of this strength was for suffering work, v. 11.

He prays, not only that they might be supported under their troubles, but strengthened for them: there is work to be done, even when suffering. And they who are strengthened according to his glorious power, are strengthened not only to bear troubles patiently, but to receive them as gifts from God, and be thankful for them, Ja. 1:4. To you it is given to suffer, Phil. 1:29. The same reason for bearing one trouble, will hold for bearing another. All patience, includes all kinds of it; not only bearing patience, but waiting patience. This is even unto long-suffering, patience drawn out to bear trouble, as long as God pleases to continue it. It is with joyfulness that we are counted worthy to suffer for his name; to have joy as well as patience in the troubles of life. This we could never do by any strength of our own, but as we are strengthened by the grace of God.

V. 12—29. Here is the summary of the doctrine of the Gospel concerning the great work of our redemption by Christ, coming in here as the matter of a thanksgiving, v. 12. not in the natural order, the purchase first, and afterward the application; but here he inverts the order, the application before the purchase. The order and connexion of the apostle's discourse, may be considered in the following manner:

1. He speaks of the operations of the Spirit of grace on us. We must give thanks for them, because by these we are qualified for an interest in the mediation of the Son, v. 12, 13. It is spoken of as the work of the Father, because the Spirit of grace is the Spirit of the Father, and the Father works in us by his Spirit.

1. He hath delivered us from the power of darkness, v. 13. He hath rescued us from the state of heathenish darkness and wickedness; saved us from the dominion of sin, which is darkness, 1 Jn. 1:6. from the dominion of Satan, the prince of darkness, Eph. 6:12. from the damnation of hell, which is utter darkness, Mat. 25:30. They are called out of darkness, 1 Pet. 2:9.

2. He hath translated us into the kingdom of his dear Son, brought us into the gospel-state, and made us members of the church of Christ, which is a state of light and purity, Eph. 5:8. 1 Pet. 2:9. The conversion of a sinner, is the translation of a soul into the kingdom of Christ, out of the kingdom of the devil. The power of sin is shaken off, and the power of Christ submitted to. The law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus, makes them free from the law of sin and death; and it is the kingdom of his dear Son, of the Son of his peculiar love, his beloved Son, Mat. 3:17. and eminently the Beloved, Eph. 1:6.

3. He hath not only done this, but hath made us meet to partake of the inheritance of the saints in light, v. 12. prepared us for the eternal happiness of heaven, and given us the earnest and assurance of it. This he mentions first, because it is the first indication of future blessedness, that, by the grace of God, we find ourselves in some measure prepared for it. God gives grace and glory, and we are here told what they both are. The glory is the inheritance of the saints in light, an inheritance which belongs to them as children, the best security, and the sweetest tenure, Rom. 8:17. an inheritance of the saints,—proper to sanctified souls, an inheritance in light; the perfection of knowledge, holiness, and joy, by communion with 12:7—12. And to interpret it of the deliverance of the Gentile converts from idolatry, and of the happy state of the Jewish converts, as 'the saints in light,' is totally to encrivate this highly animated passage.—The 'glorious power,' here spoken of, is sometimes ascribed to the Father, or to God absolutely, sometimes to the Holy Spirit, and frequently to Christ. For 'these three are One.' Notes, Ps. 138:3. 2 Cor. 12:7—10. Eph. 3:14—19, v. 16. Phil. 4:10—13, v. 13.

(9.) 'Qualities, &c., are not, in the N. T., denominated spiritual, because they relate to things which are immaterial. But it is, in relation to the Spirit of God. The word spirit, as used to designate the third person in the Trinity, is the substantive, from which is formed the adjective spiritual. Christians are, therefore, denominated spiritual, because they are born of the Spirit of God. Things are called spiritual, as they stand related to the Spirit of God.'

V. 15—17. Being possessed of all divine perfections, as 'One with the Father,' [Christ] appeared on earth, displaying those perfections, and performing all divine operations, through the medium of the human nature. Thus, He made the invisible God known to mankind, as his 'express Image;' He represented the Father, and manifested his glory. [Indeed, how else could God have been otherwise than a mere infinite abstraction to us finite beings? ED.] In and through Him, as 'God manifest in the flesh,' sinners, believing 'the sure testimony of God,' might know, approach, trust, and worship Him with acceptance, which otherwise they could not have done.—It seems evident, that Christ is not called 'the Image of God,' in respect of his divine nature, as many, especially the ancient expositors, supposed; and so, by their illustrations, weakened or perplexed the argument for his real Deity; for the divine essence is no more visible in the Person of the Son, than in that of the Father, and therefore the One cannot be 'the Image,' or visible representation, of the other. 1 Tim. 6:13—16. But the Person of Christ, as God in human nature, is the visible, or sensible, discovery of the invisible God; and 'He that hath seen Him hath seen the Father.' Jn. 12:44—50. 14:7—14, v. 9. 15:22—25.—The apostle further declared Christ to be 'the First-born of the whole creation;' for so the words may be literally rendered. Christ is called the 'First-begotten,' or 'Only begotten,' of the Father; and it has been shown, that these expressions must be understood, of the mysterious union in the sacred Trinity, and the relation of the second Person to the first, in the divine subsistence; for the grand display of the love of God to the world, consisted, in 'giving his own Son' to become man, in order to die for our sins, rather than in giving Him, when incarnate, to death for us. The expression here used seems to be of the same import; He was qualified to be 'the Image of the invisible God' to men, by reason of his original and essential glory. (M. R. y, z.—Notes, Jn. 1:14, 18. 1 Jn. 4:9—12.) Existing, as the co-eternal Son of the Father, before the creation of the world, He appeared as the 'First-begotten Son of God,' to be 'the Heir of all things;' when they were called into existence, as the first-born is the heir of the estate or kingdom. The reason, or proof, adduced by the apostle, demonstrates, that he meant the words in this sense; 'for,' says he, 'by Him all things were created.' He then proceeds to mention all creatures in heaven and earth; and by the terms of 'thrones, dominions, principalities, and powers,' clearly including the highest created dignity and exaltation, he evidently intended to declare, in the most emphatical terms, that every creature of God, however distinguished, was created by Christ, as one in Deity and operation with the Father and the Holy Spirit. Nay, he added, that they were all 'created for Him,' for the display of his glory, and to do Him service; (M. R. a—d.—Notes, Prov. 8:22—33. 16:4. Is. 42:8, 9. 44:24. Jn. 1:1—3. that 'He was before all things,' yea, that 'all things by Him consist,' or are preserved in being and order; so that without his sustaining power, they must fall into confusion, or non-existence. (M. R. e, f.—Note, Rom. 11:33—35.)—It is, perhaps, impossible to use stronger language, to express creating and upholding Power, universal Sovereignty, and real Deity, than is here employed, to which the Socinians can only say, that it is all figurative, and means no more than the introduction of the gospel-dispensation, as a kind of new creation; but nothing can be more absurd. Or they may say, that the apostle was mistaken; and to such obstinate infidelity, we oppose the demonstrative evidences of the divine inspiration of the Scriptures. In fact, we find language in some respects similar, almost in every part of the N. T.—It should also be observed, that, however we may interpret the expression, 'The First-born of every creature,' no man can infer from it, that Christ is a sort of supra-angelic creature, (according to the inconsistent opinion of the Arians,) without expressly opposing Paul's inference from his own doctrine, or rather the argument by which he confirms it, in which he evidently shows, that he meant Christ was before, above, and distinct from all creatures, yea, the Author, Proprietor, and Supporter, of all ranks and orders of them in the universe.—18) The first-born.] Prōtotokos. Mat. 1:25. Luke 2:7. Rom. 8:29. Heb. 1:6. 11:28. 12:23. Rev. 1:5. Ps. 89:23. Sept. By using this word, and not 'First-created,' Prōtoktistos, the apostle marks the distinction, between the eternal Son of God and the most exalted of those creatures which derived their existence from Him.

(15.) First-born of every creature.] 'Or, "chief of all the creation." In the early ages, the first-born son possessed extraordinary privileges and honors. Hence the Heb. term, and its correspondent word in other languages, acquired the secondary meaning of that which is chief and most excellent. Of this there are many examples in the Scriptures; and in Jewish phraseology, the holy and blessed God is called the First-born of the world, to signify his supremacy over all created beings. The just inference is, that Christ is superior to all creatures, and consequently, that in his proper and original nature, He cannot be a creature.' J. P. SMITH, in Henry abr. — 'According to the Arians, "the first-born of the whole creation" is the first-made creature. But the reason advanced to prove the Son the first-born of the whole creation, overturns that sense of this passage. For surely, the Son's creating all things, doth not prove Him to be the first-made creature, unless his power of creating all things originated from his being the first-made creature; which no one, I think, will affirm. As little does the Son's creating all things prove, that He first of all created Himself. Yet all these absurdities will be established by the apostle's reasoning, if "the first-born of the whole creation" signifies the first-made creature.'

(15—17.) Of the two different views which have been taken of this passage, the one literal, referring to the natural creation of all things, by Christ, and the other figurative, referring to a new moral and spiritual creation, in the establishment of the Christian church, Bloomf., though he admits there is, from the connexion, plausibility in the latter view, yet prefers the former, as 'yielding an unobjectionable sense;' and, concerning the favor the former seems to have from the connexion, he remarks, 'that it must be remembered, that in so irregular a writer as Paul, even that is a principle of no very certain application.' As to parallel passages, he says, 'they are, most of them, not really such, or at least doubtful; and in the interpretation of them the present passage is appealed to, which is really reasoning in a circle. Besides, the exposition in question,' he adds, 'though it may be justified, as far as the use of the original word for create is concerned, yet, in other respects, it involves greater difficulties than the common one.' — Whitby's reasons

PRACT. OBS. V. 1-20. All spiritual blessings, 'from God the Father and our Lord Jesus Christ,' belong to 'the saints and faithful brethren in Christ,' wherever they are dispersed. May we be found of that number!—The hope of real Christians is 'laid up for them in heaven,' out of the reach of enemies and disappointments; they have been called to partake of it, by 'the word of the truth of the Gospel;' and, blessed be God, the joyful message is 'come to us,' in this far distant region!—If we have 'known the grace of God in truth,' it 'bringeth forth fruit,' in our holy lives and spiritual worship; but if it has in no degree this effect on us, it will only aggravate our condemnation. This may be learned from 'all the fellow-servants' of our common Lord, who faithfully minister in different parts of his church; for they all declare, that 'love in the Spirit,' love of Christ, of holiness, and of the people, ordinances, and commandments of God, and the unreserved obedience of love, are inseparable from saving faith.—It is not enough that we understand the grand outlines of divine truth; but we should also pray for ourselves, and for one another, while we use diligently all proper means, that we may be 'perfected in the knowledge of the Lord's will, in all wisdom and spiritual understanding;' in order that we may 'walk worthy of our vocation,' please God in every part of our conduct, and produce every kind of holy fruit in abundance.—Indeed, we may well be very joyful and thankful to the 'Father,' if we have 'the witness in ourselves,' 1 Jn. 5:9, 10, that 'we are made meet for the inheritance of the saints

(in Bloomf. and confrated by him) for understanding the passage in the natural sense, are: 1. The things here spoken of are such as are not capable of a moral creation; since all must comprehend inanimate substances; and to the angels, good or bad, it can by no means apply. 2. The words in this sense were far from being true when the apostle spoke them; for only a very small remnant of the Jews were then converted to the Christian faith; and yet the apostle plainly speaks of a creation wholly past already. 3. The apostle afterwards enters on the moral creation at vs. 18-20.

(16.) 'Davenant considers, that the exposition of those who apply the terms used in this passage exclusively to heavenly and invisible beings, is most correct.'

V. 18-20. The same glorious Person, of whose original majesty such sublime language had been employed, was next declared to be 'the Head of the body, the church.' This manifestly related to his mediatorial character, which He voluntarily assumed, and sustained in human nature.—For 'it pleased the Father, that in Him should all fulness dwell.' It seemed good to Him, that all the plenitude of divine power, authority, wisdom, knowledge, holiness, justice, truth, mercy, grace, even all 'the fulness of God,' should dwell in the Person of Christ, and be exercised and communicated, through his human nature, by virtue of the union of the Deity and humanity in his mysterious Person. Thus 'it pleased all Fulness,' the original, infinite, inexhaustible Fulness of Being and perfection, or of the Deity, 'to dwell in' Christ, for the benefit of his church.—(20) Reconcile, &c.] 'The spirits of just men' then in heaven, owed their reconciliation to the Savior's undertaking for them; and all on earth, whether Jews or Gentiles, who believed in Christ, were reconciled unto God, through their union with Him, and their interest in the atonement of his blood. Rom. 3:21-26. Thus the whole became and assures the full payment. They who are sanctified shall be glorified, Rom. 8:30. and will be for ever indebted to the grace of God, which hath sanctified them.

II. Of the Person of the Redeemer. 'Glorious things are here said of Him; blessed Paul was full of Christ, and took all occasions to speak honorably of Him. He speaks of Him distinctly as God, and as Mediator. As God, he speaks of Him, v. 15-17.

1. He is the Image of the invisible God. Not as man made so, Gen. 1:26. in his natural faculties and dominion over the creatures: no, He is the express Image of his person, Heb. 1:3. so the Image, as the Son is of his Father, who has a natural likeness to Him; and [so] as he who has seen Him, has seen the Father; and his glory was the glory of the only begotten of the Father, Jn. 1:14. 14:9.

2. He is the First-born of every creature. Not that He is Himself a creature; for the Greek is,—born or begotten before all the creation, or any creature was made; which is the scripture-way of representing eternity, and by which the eternity of God is represented to us, Pr. 8:23-26. It signifies his dominion over all things; as the first-born in a family is heir and lord of all, so He is the Heir of all things, Heb. 1:2. The word, with only the change in the accent, signifies, actively, the first begotter or producer of all things, and so it well agrees with the following clause: Vid. Isidor. Pelus. epist. 30. lib. 3.

3. He is so far from being Himself a creature, that He is the Creator, v. 16. He made all things of nothing; the highest angel in heaven, as well as men on earth, Jn. 1:3. He speaks as if there were several orders of angels, thrones, dominions, principalities, powers: which must signify either different degrees of excellence, or different offices and employment.* Angels, authorities, and pow-in light; having acquired a relish for those contemplations, and that holy worship, society, and felicity, in which the blessed spirits before the throne are incessantly engaged. Rev. 4:6-11. 5:8-14. 7:9-17.—When admitted into heaven, and not before, we shall have some adequate conceptions of 'the great mystery of godliness;' and shall understand, in another manner than we now do, the import of the apostle's energetic language concerning the Lord Jesus. Let us then at present adore these mysteries, in humble faith; and, instead of wanting material images 'of the invisible God,' or framing gross notions of Him, let us contemplate the glory of our God in Christ Jesus, 'the express Image' of his essential excellency. Here we may learn humble confidence, reverential fear, and filial love, and be prepared for spiritual worship, joyful communion with God, and growing conformity to his holiness, as dwelling in our nature, reconciling the world unto Himself; here we may become acquainted with the harmoniously glorious perfections of our God, and may approach Him, and have fellowship with Him, notwithstanding our exceedingly great guilt, and pollution, and infirmity. For it has pleased the infinitely glorious God, that 'all fulness should dwell in Christ,' both to relieve our weak apprehensions, and our guilty consciences, in our discoveries of his glorious majesty and holiness, through so encouraging a medium, as the Person of Emmanuel, 'making peace by the blood of his cross,' and reconciling all things in heaven, and on earth, to Himself and to each other, in this most gracious and astonishing manner. Sc.

one church and one body in Him; and they all will at length be translated to heaven, there to continue for ever in a state of perfect reconciliation to God, and friendship with Him and each other. This seems to be what is meant by 'all things in heaven and earth;' for, though holy angels become one family through Christ with released sinners, yet they cannot be said to be reconciled unto God, as they never were in a state of enmity against Him.—Some commentators would wholly confine the meaning, to man's being reconciled to God and his service; others explain it wholly of God's being reconciled to his offending creatures; but why should not both be included? For the atonement of Christ procured for all believers both pardon of sin and new-creating grace; that they might walk with God, in a state of mutual peace, and reciprocal friendship and love.

(20.) By Him. 'Whether God or Christ be meant, commentators are not agreed: the latter seems preferable.—[All things.] The best founded opinion on these words seems to be that of Ham., and the most eminent interpreters since his times, that the neuter gender is here put for the masculine, as often; and that by all things, as far as regards the things in earth, may be understood Jews and Gentiles.' Bloomf.

V. 21-23. The Lord had commanded, that this Gospel should be 'preached to every creature under heaven;' it had actually been published very widely, among Jews and Gentiles, without distinction of nation, or previous character; [but] he uses a general term, 'under heaven,' commonly employed on similar occasions, the import of which may be learned from other places. 'In all the creation, which is under the heaven.' See on Rom. 8:19.—This last v. may be rendered, 'Since ye continue, &c.' implying a confidence of the sincerity of the Colossians, as evidenced by their steadfastness. But our tr. is more obvious and literal, and perfectly consistent with the apostle's doctrine concerning per ers, 1 Pet. 3:22. Christ is the eternal Wisdom of the Father, and the world was made in wisdom. He is the eternal Word, and the world was made by the Word of God. All things are created by Him and for Him. Being created by Him, they were created for Him; being made by his power, they were made according to his pleasure, and for his praise. He is the End, as well as the Cause of all things, Rom. 11:36.

4. He is before all things, v. 17. He had a being before the world was made; before the beginning of time, and therefore from all eternity, Prov. 8:22. Jn. 1:1. He not only had a being before He was born of the virgin, but before all time.

5. By Him all things consist: by the word of his power they are still upheld in their order and dependencies, Heb. 1:3. The whole creation is kept together by the power of the Son of God, and made to consist in its proper frame.

He is a Mediator, v. 18, 19.

The Head of the body, the church: not only a Head of government and direction, but a Head of vital influence, as the head in the natural body: all grace and strength are derived from Him; the church is his body, the fulness of Him who filleth all in all, Eph. 1:22, 23. He is the Beginning, the First-born from the dead. All our hopes and joys take their rise from Him who is the Author of our salvation. Not that He was the first who ever rose from the dead, but the first and only one who rose by his own power, and was declared to be the Son of God, and Lord of all things. ['First who rose to die no more.' Scott.] And He is the Head of the resurrection, and has given us an example and evidence of our resurrection from the dead. He rose as the First-fruits, 1 Cor. 15:20. He hath in all things the pre-eminence; is preferred above angels, and all the powers in heaven, Heb. 1:4. and in all the affairs of the kingdom of God among men,

As the head is the seat and source of the animal spirits, so is Christ of all graces to his people; and we may have free resort to Him for all that grace which we have occasion for. He not only intercedes for it, but is the Trustee in whose hands it is lodged to dispense to us. *Of his fulness we receive, and grace for grace; grace in us answering to that grace which is in Him, Jn. 1:16 and *He fills all in all, Eph. 1:23.

III. Of the work of redemption, which consists in remission of sin, v. 14. Eph. 1:7. and in reconciliation to God, v. 20. and is procured by the Mediator through the blood of his cross. The Gentiles, who were alienated, and enemies in their minds by wicked works, yet now hath He reconciled, v. 21. By nature they were estranged from God, and at enmity with God; but now this enmity is slain, and, notwithstanding this distance, we are now reconciled. The greatest enemies to God may be reconciled, if it is not their own fault. It was the blood which made an atonement; for without the shedding of blood there is no remission, Heb. 9:22. Such was the value of Christ's shedding his blood, that, on that account, God was willing to deal with men on new terms, and bring them under a covenant of grace; and, for his sake, to pardon, and accept to favor, all who comply with them.

IV. Of the preaching of this redemption.

It was preached To every poor creature under heaven, v. 23. so Mk. 16:15. The Gospel excludes none who do not exclude themselves. More or less it has been, or will be, preached to every nation; though many have sinned away the light of it, and some never yet enjoyed it. It was preached by Paul, and according to the dispensation of God, v. 25. though an apostle, yet a minister, as his highest honor; and for you, for your benefit: ourselves your servants for Jesus' sake, 2 Cor. 4:5. Christ's ministers for the good of his people: to fulfil the Word of God, fully to preach it, of which you will have the greater advantage. What kind of a preacher Paul was, is particularly represented. 1. He was a suffering preacher, v. 24. not by way of expiations for sin, as the sufferings of Christ were; but Paul, and other good ministers, made themselves conformable to Christ, and followed Him in his suffering state: so they are said to fill up what was behind of the sufferings of Christ. Or it may be meant not of Christ's sufferings, but of the apostle's suffering for Christ. He filled up that which was behind. He had a certain rate and measure of suffering for Christ assigned him; and as his sufferings were agreeable to that appointment, so he was still filling up more and more what was behind, or remained of them to his share.

2. He was a close preacher, v. 28. Every man has need to be warned and taught, and therefore let every man have his share. Observe, Warning and teaching must go together. Men must be warned and taught in all wisdom. We must choose the fittest seasons, and use the likeliest means, and accommodate ourselves to the different circumstances, capacities [and spiritual state], of those we have to do with, and teach them as they are able to bear. What he aimed at, was, to present every man perfect in Christ Jesus; either perfect in the knowledge of the Christian doctrine, Phil. 3:15. 2 Tim. 3:17. or else crowned with a glorious reward hereafter, when He will present to Himself a glorious church, Eph. 5:27. and bring them to the spirits of just men made perfect, Heb. 12:23. Observe, Ministers ought to aim at the improvement and salvation of every particular person who hears them. 3. He was a laborious preacher, and one who took pains, v. 29. Observe, As Paul laid out himself to do much good, so he had this favor, that the power of God wrought in him the more effectually. The more we labor in the work of the Lord, the greater measure of help we may expect from Him in it, Eph. 3:7.

The Gospel preached. We have an account of that, v. 26, 27. Observe, The mystery of the Gospel was long hidden, concealed from ages and generations, the several ages of the church under the O. T. dispensation, but is now, in the fulness of time, made manifest to the saints. 2 Cor. 3:14. Eph. 3:4, 5. And what is this mystery? The riches of God's glory among the Gentiles, the peculiar doctrine of the Gospel, was a mystery, which was before hid, and is now made manifest and made known. But the great mystery here referred to, is, the preaching the Gospel to the Gentile world, and making them partakers of the privileges of the gospel-state, who before lay in ignorance and idolatry, Eph. 3:6. Which mystery, thus made known, is, Christ in you, the hope of glory, or among you. Observe, Christ is the hope of glory. The ground of our hope is Christ in the Word, or the gospel-revelation, declaring the nature and methods of obtaining it. The evidence of our hope is Christ in the heart, or the sanctification of the soul, and its preparation for the heavenly glory.

The duty of those who are interested in this redemption, v. 23. is, to continue in the faith grounded and settled, and not be moved away from the hope of the Gospel;

PRACT. OBS. V. 21—29. If we be convinced, that once we were 'alienated from God, and enemies in our minds by wicked works;' and if we are now reconciled to Him, by the incarnation, sacrifice, and grace of Christ; we shall not attempt to explain away, or presumptuously expect to comprehend, these deep mysteries; but we shall see a glory and suitableness in this plan of redemption, as uniting the honor of the divine law and government with the hope of guilty, perishing sinners, though much yet remains far above and out of the reach of our low capacities, and feeble conceptions of spiritual things; and, while we long to be 'presented holy, unblamable, and unreprouvable in the sight of God,' it will be impossible for us to abuse or pervert his grace, to enseverance; for many specious professors of true religion are 'moved away from the hope of the Gospel,' 'having no root in themselves;' fear of coming short is one grand mean of the true believer's perseverance, and it was frequently the apostle's manner, by such intimations, to caution his readers to beware of deceiving themselves.—(21) Mind, &c.] In the higher powers of the soul, the intellect and reasoning faculty, as well as the will and affections, man is 'an enemy to God;' so vain is the notion, that the opposition of reason to the sensual appetites, is the conflict 'between flesh and spirit,' of which the apostle elsewhere discourages! Rom. 7:12—25. Gal. 5:16—18.

(23.) Preached to every creature . . . under heaven.] Note, v. 6. Ev. v. 24. Filled up, &c.] The sufferings of Christ perfectly sufficed for the redemption of 'his body the church,' and were an atonement of infinite value. But his atonement must be received. It is received by faith; 'faith comes by hearing;' hearing by preaching; and preaching was in those days inseparable from suffering; so that the apostle's sufferings in his flesh, for the benefit of the church, were necessary in their place, and could not be dispensed with. Rom. 10:12—17. 2 Thes. 2:13, 14. 2 Tim. 2:8—13. By them he 'filled up what was behind of the afflictions of Christ,' as the sufferings of martyrs, confessors, and believers in general, form one aggregate of pain and distress, with those of the Head of the church, all of which is conducive and necessary, in different ways, to the complete salvation of the whole body. But the apostle might, with the more propriety, say this, as he suffered in the same cause, from the same persons, or those of the same character, in the congruence ourselves in sin. Many things, indeed, must try the faith of professed Christians; but every trial which we stand, and every temptation which we resist, without 'being moved away from the hope of the Gospel;' and every event which shows that we 'continue in the faith, grounded and settled,' tends to assure us, that we shall soon 'be presented faultless before our God, with exceeding joy.' (Notes, Jude 20—25.) May this Gospel then be [speedily and] successfully 'preached to every creature that is under heaven!'—And as Christ is preached among us, let us seriously inquire, whether He dwells and reigns in us, which alone can warrant our assured hope of his glory. Scott.

same meek and patient manner, and from the same spirit of zeal and love, with his divine Master; so that his afflictions resembled those of the Savior in everything, except that the Savior's alone were expiatory. Christ is also represented, as sympathizing in the sufferings of his disciples; and many think, the apostle had in view, the words, with which the Lord addressed him, in the way to Damascus; 'Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou Me?' In this sense, the sufferings of every part of the Lord's mystical body, are his sufferings; the former sense, however, is by far the most suitable to the tenor of the passage. 18:20. Eph. 1:15—23. Scott.

v. 25—27. Not only was Christ, the promised Messiah, 'God manifest in the flesh,' preached among the Gentiles, 1 Tim. 3:16. not only did He reign among them; but He actually dwelt in the hearts of true believers, 'in' the hearts of multitudes of the Gentiles, by faith, and the power of his Spirit; implanting his love, renewing his image, and writing his law, which fully sealed and warranted their hope of eternal glory.—Indeed, it cannot be made intelligible, how 'Christ, among the Gentiles,' according to the interpretation of some learned expositors, could give individuals a warranted 'hope of glory.' 2 Cor. 1:20, 21. 3:17, 18. 4:13—18. 13:5, 6. Eph. 1:13, 14. 1 Pet. 5:10, 11.

v. 23. According to his working, i. e. of a divine power on his [the apostle's] soul, which 'wrought mightily in him;' exciting fervent desires after God, and the salvation of souls; communicating vigor to all holy affections; raising him above all low and selfish aims; and supporting him in constancy, patience, and cheerful fortitude, amidst all difficulties and persecutions. Some would explain this power, to mean CHAP. II. V. 1—3. Paul had a great concern for the Colossians, and other churches, not personally known to him. He had never been at Colosse, and the church there was not of his planting; yet he had as tender a care of it, as if it had been the only people of his charge, v. 1. His care amounted to a conflict, a sort of agony, wherein he was a follower of his Master, who was in an agony for us. See how we can think, and pray, and be concerned for one another, at the greatest distance; and how those we never saw in the flesh, we may hope to meet in heaven.

But what was it the apostle desired for them? v. 2. It was their spiritual welfare; not that they may be healthy and merry, and rich and great, and prosperous; but that their hearts might be comforted. Note, The prosperity of the soul is what we should be most solicitous about for ourselves and others. We have here a description of soul-prosperity.

1. When our knowledge grows to an understanding of the mystery of God, and of the Father, and of Christ; either what was before concealed, but is now made known concerning the Father and Christ: or, the mystery before-mentioned, of calling the Gentiles into the Christian church, as the Father and Christ have revealed it in the Gospel; then the soul prospers.

2. When our faith grows to a full assurance, and bold acknowledgment of this mystery; and we not only believe with the heart, but are ready, when called to it, to make confession with our mouth; and are not ashamed of our Master and our holy religion, under the frowns and violence of their enemies. This is called the riches of the full assurance of understanding. Great knowledge and strong faith make a soul rich. This is being rich toward God, and rich in faith, and the true riches, Lu. 12:21. James 2:5.

3. It consists in the abundance of comfort in our souls; That their hearts might be comforted. The soul then prospers, when it is filled with joy and peace, Rom. 15:13. and has a satisfaction within, which all the troubles without cannot disturb; and is able to joy in the Lord, when all other comforts fail, Hab. 3:17, 18.

4. The more intimate communion we have with our fellow-Christians, the more the soul prospers; Being knit together in love. The stronger our faith is, and the warmer our love, the more will our comfort be. Observe, The treasures of wisdom are hid, not from us, but for us, in Christ, v. 2, 3. They who would be wise and knowing, must apply to Christ. He is the Wisdom of God, and is, of God, made unto us Wisdom, &c. 1 Cor. 1:24, 30.

His concern for them is repeated, v. 5. He had heard of the Colossians, that they were orderly and regular; and though he had never seen them, nor was present with them, he tells them he could easily think himself among them, and look with pleasure on their good behavior. The order and steadfastness of Christians are matter of joy to ministers; the more steadfast our faith in Christ is, the better order there will be in our whole conversation; for we live and walk by faith, 2 Cor. 5:7. Heb. 10:38.

V. 4—12. The apostle cautions the Colossians against deceivers, v. 4. and v. 8. He insists so much on the perfection of Christ and the gospel-revelation, to preserve them from the insinuating insinuations of those who would corrupt their principles. Note, Satan and his agents spoil men, by beguiling them with enticing words. See the danger of enticing words; how many are ruined by the flattery of those who lie in wait to deceive; and by the false disguises, and fair appearances, of evil principles and wicked practices. Observe,

I. A sovereign antidote against seducers, v. 6, 7. the reception of Christ. Here, note, 1. All Christians have received Jesus Christ the Lord; received Him as the great Prophet of the church, anointed by God to reveal his will; as the great High Priest, and Savior from sin and wrath, by the expiatory sacrifice of Himself; and as Lord, or Sovereign and King, whom we are to obey and be subject to. 2. The great concern of those who have received Christ, is, to walk in Him; to make their practices conformable to their principles, and their conversations agreeable to their engagements. 3. The more closely we walk with Christ, the more we are rooted and established in the faith. A good conversation is the best establishment of a good faith. If we walk in Him, we shall be rooted in Him; and the more firmly we are rooted in Him, the more closely we shall walk in Him; rooted and built up. Being established in the faith, we must abound therein, and improve in it more and more; and this with thanksgiving. We must join thanksgiving to all our improvements, and be sensible of the mercy of all our privileges and attainments. Observe,

II. The fair warning given us of our exclusively the miracles which the apostle wrought; but every one must perceive, that this wholly destroys the energy, and darkens the sense of the passage.

NOTES. CHAP. II. V. 2—4. The apostle... especially, wrestled most earnestly with God in prayer, that their hearts might be encouraged by divine consolations, in every part of their duty; and that, in order to this, they might be united together in the most perfect love of one another: that so all envies, resentments, suspicions, and competition might be excluded; which would otherwise certainly burden their consciences, inflame their passions, 'grieve the Holy Spirit,' and interrupt their comfort. (3:12—15. Eph. 4:1—6, 14—16, 30—32. Phil. 2:1—4.) (2) Mystery, &c. 'The mystery of God, even of the Father and of Christ,' his beloved Son, as One with Him, according to 'the great mystery of godliness, God manifest in the flesh;' 1 Tim. 3:16. 'in whom' (or in which mystery) were 'hidden all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge.' These treasures were indeed hidden from the eyes of unbelievers; but the infinite wisdom and knowledge of God were more displayed in the Person and redemption of Christ, than in all his other works. All true wisdom and knowledge consisted in a believing, and practical, and experimental understanding of these mysteries, and such instructions as are deducible from them: yea, from this treasury all true wisdom and knowledge must be derived by faith and prayer; and all science or philosophy contrary to this are worthless. 'It grieved the apostle to think, how incapable he was rendered of serving them, otherwise than by his letters and prayers. Oh! that such language might inspire every minister who reads it, with a desire to use his liberty to the best purposes, and to exert himself, as under such confinement he would wish he had done.' Doddr.—(3) All the treasures, &c. 'Let this be the firmest argument against cavillers, that without Christ there is no true wisdom.' Beza.—The language of the first v. renders it at least highly probable, that the apostle had not been at Colosse. (1) What great conflict. 'Fear, or care.'—Earnest prayer seems here specially intended. (3) In whom. 'Wherein.' Marg. Possibly, he may intend to intimate, that he was not only concerned for those whom he personally knew, but likewise for others, to whom he was a stranger, and who might have been converted after he left them; yet I think this epistle contains no argument from whence it can certainly be inferred that he was acquainted with these Christians.' Doddr.

V. 5—7. Some think, that he had an immediate revelation concerning the prosperous state of their church; as Elisha had of Gehazi's conduct in following Naaman. 2 K. 5:26. 27. 6:8—12. Scott.

(7) Rooted, &c. 'Rooted and well founded in it, as Jude 20. like the immense stones, without cement, which formed the foundations of the edifices of the ancients.' Bloomf.

V. 8, 9. It was especially requisite for the Christians at Colosse to be on their guard, that no man might 'rob them,' (as victorious armies plunder the vanquished,) of their hope and comfort, or turn them aside from Christ, by philosophical subtleties, and vain, exclusive speculations, opposed to the simple faith of the Gospel. These were 'traditions of men,' delivered from the heads and teachers of the several sects of philosophers, and so handed down from age to age: they formed 'the elements,' or first principles, of a supposed wisdom, suited to the proud, curious, speculating, and carnal temper of the world; but which was totally incompatible with the doctrine of Christ.—The Judaizing teachers seem to have blended their systems with speculations borrowed from the Pagans, and their different sects of philosophers: thus the tra-danger, v. 8. There is a philosophy which nobly exercises our reasonable faculties, and highly promotes religion; such a study of the works of God, as leads to the knowledge of God, and confirms our faith in Him. But there is a vain and deceitful philosophy, prejudicial to religion, and that sets up the wisdom of man in competition with the wisdom of God; as nice and curious speculations about things above us, or of no use to us; or a care of words and terms of art, which have only an empty, and often a cheating, appearance of knowledge. After tradition, after the rudiments of the world: as the Jews governed themselves by the traditions of their elders, and the Gentiles mixed maxims of philosophy with their Christian principles; and both alienated their minds from Christ.

The deceivers were especially the Jewish teachers, who endeavored to keep up the law of Moses in conjunction with the gospel of Christ, but really in competition with it, and contradiction to it. Here the apostle shows,

1. That we have in Christ the substance of all the shadows of the ceremonial law: for example, (1.) Had they then the Shechinah, or special presence of God, called the glory, from the visible token of it? So have we now in Jesus Christ, v. 9. Now the presence of God dwells, not between the cherubim, in a cloud covering the mercy-seat, but in the Person of our Redeemer, who partakes of our nature, and has more clearly declared the Father to us. It dwells in Him bodily; not as the body is opposed to the spirit, but as the body is opposed to the shadow. The fulness of the Godhead dwells in Christ, really, and not figuratively, for He is both God and Man. (2.) Had they circumcision, which was the seal of the covenant? In Christ we are circumcised with the circumcision made without hands, v. 11. by the work of regeneration in us, which is the spiritual or Christian circumcision, Rom. 2:29. This is owing to Christ, and belongs to the Christian dispensation. It is made without hands; not by the power of any creature, but by the power of the blessed Spirit of God, Ju. 3:5. Ti. 3:5. It consists in putting off the body of the sins of the flesh; in renouncing sin, and reforming our lives, not in mere external rites. It is not the putting away the filth of the flesh, but the answer of a good conscience toward God, 1 Pet. 3:21. Rom. 6:6. Christ was circumcised, and, by virtue of our union to Him, we partake of that effectual grace which puts off the body of the sins of the flesh. Again, The Jews thought themselves complete in the ceremonial law; but we are complete in Christ, v. 10. That was imperfect and defective, Heb. 8:7. 10. 1. But all the defects of it are made up in the Gospel of Christ, (by the complete sacrifice for sin,) and revelation of the will of God, who is the Head of all principality and power. As the O. T. priesthood had its perfection in Christ, so likewise had the kingdom of David, which was the eminent principality and power under the O. T. and which the Jews valued themselves so much upon. And He is the Lord and Head of all the powers in heaven and earth, of angels and men. 1 Pet. 3:22.

2. We have communion with Christ in his whole undertaking, v. 12. We are both buried and rise with Him, and both are signified by our baptism; not that there is any ditions of the sages, and those of the Pharisees, were incorporated; and the 'worldly elements' of heathen superstition, or philosophy, were blended with legal and traditional external observances. Unless something of this kind be supposed, it will be found difficult to understand the apostle's discourse: for he spoke of philosophical delusions and legal ceremonies at the same time; he argued against both of them at once; but he levelled his reasonings chiefly against the Judaizing teachers. (Mat. 15:1-6.)—To what he had before advanced, he here added, that 'in Christ all the fulness of the Godhead dwelleth bodily.' . . . All the divine perfections are exercised by Christ, as 'God manifest in the flesh,' through the mysterious Union of the divine and human nature in one Person. When the apostle spoke of believers being 'filled with all the fulness of God;' Eph. 3:14-19, he evidently meant it of their receiving a rich abundance of all divine communications from God; and his in-dwelling in his people refers to his gracious and powerful presence with them. But 'all the fulness of the Godhead dwelling bodily' in Christ, is language unspeakably stronger, and evidently refers to his being constituted the repository of all spiritual blessings, from whose fulness all believers receive. John 1:14-16. For God, dwelling in human nature as in a temple, exercises all divine perfections, performs all divine operations, and communicates all benefits to man, through that medium. 1-4, v. 3. 1:15-20. John 5:20-23. 14:18-20. 2 Cor. 5:18-21. 'Christ is not here said to be "filled with all the fulness of God;" . . . but the whole fulness of the Godhead is said to reside in Him. Now, theiotēs and to theion, never signify the gifts of God, or the doctrine of the Gospel, but the divine nature only; nor can the will or revelation of God be said to "dwell bodily" in any person.' Whitby.—If the union of Deity and manhood in one person can be expressed in human language, without doubt this verse does express it. 1 Tim. 3:16. [Comp. also Davenant's Exp. by Allport, 1831.]

(8.) Through philosophy and vain deceit. 'Sophistical and fallacious philosophy. So most commentators. For the apostle, they say, does not absolutely condemn philosophy, but only comparatively [when it is] out of its limits, &c. But I rather apprehend he meant to censure the Grecian philosophy in general.' BLOOMF.

(9.) Godhead. 'A plain Anglicism, equivalent to Deity. Comp. Ac. 17:29. I cannot think these wonderful words are intended merely to signify, that God hath lodged, in the hands of Christ, a fulness of gifts to be conferred on men, as if the passage were merely parallel to Eph. 3:19, and Ju. 1:16, 17. I assuredly believe it refers to the adorable mystery of the union of the divine and human natures in the person of the glorious Emmanuel, which makes Him such an object of our hope and confidence, as the most exalted creature, with the most glorious endowments, could never of himself be.' DONNE.

'The ancients, and earlier moderns, recognize here a strong evidence of the Deity of Christ. . . . Whitby observes, the apostle does not directly say Christ is God, but expresses his divine nature thus, partly to represent to the Jews the divinity of Christ, with allusion to the God of Israel dwelling in the temple, partly to oppose Him to the plerōma of the Gnostics, and to the partial deities of the heathen. We may, I think, conclude, with Whitby, adopting the words of the council of Antioch, that the body born of the Virgin, receiving the whole fulness of the Godhead bodily, was immutably united to the Divinity, and deified, which made the same person, Jesus Christ, both God and Man.' BL.

V. 10. As Christ was completely qualified for his mediatorial work, by 'all the fulness of the Godhead dwelling in Him bodily,' so believers are completely supplied with all they want, by their mystical union with Him: . . . all their instruction, acceptance, holiness, deliverance, liberty, victory, and happiness, are derived from Him by faith, in the use of his appointed means, and they want nothing, which they have not in Him. They therefore can have no need to seek any additional instruction, wisdom, help, or encouragement, either from Jewish ordinances and traditions, or from heathen sages.—As Christ is also 'the Head of all principality and power,' all angels being his willing servants, and the whole creation being subjected to Him; so Christians have no cause to fear any creatures, or reason to seek help from them. Rom. 8:28-39. 1 Cor. 1:26-31. Eph. 1:15-23. Phil. 2:9-11. 1 Pet. 3:21-22.

—The Judaizing teachers seem to have imbibed, and new modelled, the Pagan notions of subordinate deities, and, applying it to the scriptural doctrine of angels, to have introduced the mediatorial worship of them; with which they, at an early period, attempted to corrupt the Christian church, and not wholly without success. To this, the apostle here evidently refers, as well as in what is said afterwards. (N. T. 20-23.) But Christians could have no occasion to pay homage of any kind to those creatures, who, however exalted, were subjected to Christ, their Lord and Redeemer. SCOTT.

V. 11, 12. 'The circumcision of Christ,' seems rather to signify his work in the believer's soul, than his own personal circumcision, though that was a part of his mediatorial humiliation, by which the true circumcision was procured for them, and in which they are rendered conformable to Him.—The baptism of Jews and Gentiles, when converted to Christianity, implied their 'death unto sin, and new birth unto righteousness,' their entrance into the church and kingdom of Christ; the washing away of the guilt and pollution of their sins, and their dedication to the service of God, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, in whose name, as the God of their salvation, they were baptized. (Note, Mat. 28:19, 20, v. 19.) The same inward change had been signified by circumcision, which was administered to adult proselytes, and then to their infant offspring; so that no argument can hence be produced against the baptism of infants. (Notes, Gen. 17:9-12. Rom. 4:12.)—This conformity to the crucified and risen Savior was effected, 'through the faith of the operation of God, who raised Him from the dead,' or, by a believing reliance on that effectual saving power of God, as displayed in the resurrection of Christ. Eph. 1:15-23. It is, no doubt, an important scriptural truth, that the faith, by which we receive all other blessings, is itself the gift and work of God: (Notes, An. v. 10-13. Eph. 2:4-10) and this has induced some expositors, in many preachers, to explain the clause to mean, 'the faith which God has wrought in the heart.' This was the author's view, when he wrote the first edition of this work. But a careful examination of the subject has convinced him, that this is rather imposing a sense on the apostle's words, than inquiring after the true meaning of them. The ablest Greek scholars are decided, that the idiom of the language will not admit of that construction; and certainly there is no instance in the N. T., in which a similar mode of expression can fairly be thus interpreted. (Mk. 11:22. Acts 3:16. Rom. 3:22, 26. Gal. 2:16, 20. 3:22. Eph. 3:12. Phil. 1:27. 3:9. 2 Thes. 2:13. Jam. 2:1. Rev. 2:13. 14:12. Gr.) It should however be observed, that though the clause does not affirm faith to be the work and gift of God, it neither teaches nor implies anything to the contrary. Indeed, this is taught in the subsequent v. 10.

(12.) See Woods on Baptism, page 159 and onward. See also Stuart on this passage, in Bib. Repos. article, 'Is the mode of Bap. prescribed in the Bible?' See Wardlaw, on Bap. p. 117, published by Wm. Pierce. 'In regard to the parallel passage in Rom. 6:4. Dwight remarks, 'in the next v. it is said, "For if we are planted together in the likeness of his death." My antagonists (the Baptists) are bound to show, that this figurative expression, which refers to the same thing, does not as strict signify the mode in which baptism is received, as the word "buried," and, if it does, to point out the particular mode of administering baptism denoted by the word "planted."'

(12.) Buried with Him in baptism. Pr. Stuart (on the parallel passage, Rom. 6:4.) says: 'Most comtr. have maintained, that synetaphemen (buried with, or like) has here a necessary reference to the mode of literal baptism, which, they say, was by immersion; and this, they think, affords ground for the employment of the image used by the apostle, because immersion (under water) may be compared to burial (under the earth). It is difficult, perhaps, to procure a patient rehearing of the subject, so long regarded by some as being out of fair dispute. Nevertheless, as my own conviction is not, after protracted and repeated examinations, accordant here with that of commentators in general, I feel constrained briefly to state my reasons.

'The first is, that in the v. before us there is a plain antithesis; one so plain, that it is impossible to overlook it. If now synetaphemen is to be interpreted in a physical way, i. e. as meaning baptism in a physical sense, where is the corresponding physical idea, in the opposite part of the antithesis or comparison? Plainly, there is no such physical idea or reference in the other part of the antithesis. The resurrection there spoken of, is entirely a moral, spiritual one; for it is one which Christians have already experienced, during the present life; as may be fully seen by comparing Rom. 5:6, 11. I take it for granted, that after hemeis, in v. 4. egertentes is implied; since the nature

13 And you, being dead in your sins and the uncircumcision of your flesh, hath he quickened together with him, having forgiven you all trespasses ;

14 Blotting out the handwriting of ordinances that was against us, which was contrary to us, and took it out of the way, nailing it to his cross ;

15 And having spoiled principalities and powers, he made a shew of them openly, triumphing over them in it.

16 Let no man therefore judge you in meat, or in drink, or in respect of an holy day, or of the new moon, or of the sabbath days ;

thing in the sign or ceremony of baptism, which represents this burying and rising, any more than the crucifixion of Christ is represented by any visible resemblance in the Lord's supper: and he is speaking of the circumcision made without hands; and says, it is through the faith of the operation of God. But the thing signified by our baptism, is, that we are buried with Christ, as baptism is the seal of the covenant, and an obligation to our dying to sin; and that we are risen with Christ, as it is a seal and obligation to our living to righteousness, or newness of life. God in baptism engages to be to us a God, and we engage to be his people, and by his grace to die to sin, and to live to righteousness, or put off the old man, and put on the new.

V. 13-15. The apostle here represents the privileges of Christians.

1. Christ's death is our life, v. 13. A state of sin is a state of spiritual death. They who are in sin, are dead in sin, in separation from God and his favor, morally impotent, though possessed of natural power, or the power of a reasonable creature. The Gentile world lay in wickedness, and were dead, Eph. 2: 11, 12, dead in their sins. It may be understood of the spiritual uncircumcision or corruption of nature; and so it shows that we are dead in law, and dead in state. The sinner has no spiritual power, till he has the divine life, or renewed nature. An unsanctified heart is called an uncircumcised heart: this is our state. Now, through Christ, we, who were dead in sins, are quickened; effectual provision is made for the taking away of the guilt of sin, and breaking the power and dominion of it. Quickened together with Him; by virtue of our union to Him, and in conformity to Him. Christ's death was the death of our sins; Christ's resurrection is the quickening of our souls.

2. Through Him we have the remission of sin; Having forgiven you all trespasses. This is our quickening. The pardon of the crime is the life of the criminal: and this is owing to the resurrection of Christ, as well as his death; for as He died for our sins, so He rose again for our justification, Rom. 4: 25.

3. Whatsoever is in force against us, is taken out of the way. He has obtained for us a legal discharge from the handwriting of ordinances, which was against us, v. 14. which may be understood, (1.) Of that obligation to punishment, in which consists the guilt of sin. The curse of the law is the handwriting against us, like the handwriting on Belshazzar's wall. This was removed when He redeemed us from the curse of the law, being made a Curse for us, Gal. 3: 13. He cancelled the obligation for all who repent and believe. He vacated and disannulled the judgment which was against us. And our indwelling corruption is crucified with Christ, and by the virtue of his cross. Or, rather, (2.) It must be understood of the ceremonial law; the handwriting of ordinances, the ceremonial institutions, or the law of commandments contained in ordinances, Eph. 2: 15, which was a yoke to the Jews, and a partition-wall to the Gentiles. This the Lord Jesus disannulled, that all might be satisfied it was no more binding, 2 Cor. 3: 13. Heb. 8: 13. The expressions are in allusion to the ancient methods of cancelling a bond, either by crossing the writing, or striking it through with a nail.

4. He has obtained a glorious victory for us over the powers of darkness, v. 15. redeemed us from the power of Satan, with a high hand. He led captivity captive. The devil, and all the powers of hell, were conquered and disarmed by the dying Redeemer. The first promise pointed at this, Gen. 3: 15. The expressions are lofty and magnificent: let us turn aside, and see this great sight. The Redeemer conquered by dying. See his crown of thorns turned into a crown of laurels. He spoiled them, broke the devil's power, and conquered and disabled him, and made a show of them openly; exposed them to public shame, and made a show of them to angels and men: triumphing, either in his cross and by his death; or, as some read it, in Himself, by his own power; for He trod in the wine-press alone, and of the people there was none with Him.

V. 16-23. The apostle concludes with exhortations to proper duty, which he infers from the foregoing discourse.

I. Here is a caution to take heed of Judaizing teachers, or those who would impose on Christians the yoke of the ceremonial law, v. 16. It appears by Rom. 14. there were such, who were for keeping up those distinctions: but here the apostle shows, that since Christ is come, and has cancelled the ceremonial law, we ought not to keep it up. And this the rather, because these things were shadows of things to come, v. 17.

of the comparison, the preceding hos egerthe Christos, and v. 5, make this entirely plain.

If we turn now to the passage in Col. 2:12. (altogether parallel,) we shall there find more conclusive reason still, to argue as above, respecting the nature of the antithesis presented. "We have been buried with Him (Christ) in baptism." What now is the opposite of this? What is the kind of resurrection from this grave in which Christians have been buried? The apostle tells us: "We have risen with Him (Christ) by faith wrought by the power of God, (tes energias tou Theou,) who raised Him (Christ) from the dead." Here, then, is a resurrection by faith, i. e. a spiritual, not a one. Why then should we look for a physical meaning in the antithesis? If one part of the antithesis is to be construed in a manner entirely moral, or spiritual, why should we not construe the other in the like manner? To understand sunetaphemen, then, of a literal burial under water, is to understand it in a manner which the laws of interpretation forbid.

(b) Nothing can be plainer, than that the word sunetaphemen, in Rom. 6:4. is equivalent in sense to the word apothanomen in v. 8. It seems to be adopted merely for the sake of rendering more striking the image of a resurrection, which the apostle employs in the other part of the antithesis. A resurrection from the grave is a natural phrase, when one is speaking with respect to the subject of a resurrection; see Jn. 5:28, 29. comp. Dan. 12:2. In accordance with this statement, the context does most plainly speak, both in respect to Rom. 6:1. and Col. 2:12. For in respect to Rom. 6:4. the apostle goes on in the very next v., (as is usual with him,) to present the same idea which is contained in v. 4. in a different costume. V. 5. (which is a mere epexegesis of v. 4.) says: if we have been homogeneous (sumphutot, like, of the same kind) with Christ IN HIS DEATH, then shall we be in his resurrection. The same idea and explanation is repeated in v. 8.—apothanomen,—succeomen, and the whole is summarily explained in v. 11. So reckon ye yourselves to be nekros men te hamartia, zontas de to Theo.

Exactly in the same manner has the apostle gone on to explain sunetaphentes in Col. 2:12. In v. 13. he adds: "You nekros in your offences . . . succeoopotes, has He (God) made alive with Him (Christ), having forgiven us all our offences."

There can be no real ground for question, then, that by sunetaphemen, in both cases, is meant neither more nor less than by apothanomen, nekroti, &c. The epexegesis added in both cases seems to make this quite plain.

The only reason, then, which I can find, why sunetaphemen is preferred in Rom. 6: 4. and in Col. 2:12. is, as has been suggested above, that the language may be a fuller antithesis of the word resurrection, which is employed in the corresponding part of the comparison. "You who were (dead) buried with Christ," gives energy to the expression.

(c) But my principal difficulty in respect to the usual exegesis of sunetaphemen is, that the image or figure of immersion, baptism, is, so far as I know, nowhere else in Scripture employed as a symbol of burial in the grave. Nor can I think that it is a very natural symbol of burial. The obvious import of washing with water, or immersing in water, is, that it is symbolical of purity, cleansing, purification. But how will this aptly signify burying in the grave, the place of corruption, loathsomeness, and destruction?

For these reasons I feel inclined to doubt the usual exegesis of the passage before us, and to believe that the apostle had in view only a burying which is moral and spiritual; for the same reasons, that he had a moral and spiritual (not a physical) resurrection in view, in the corresponding part of the antithesis.

Indeed, what else but a moral burying can be meant, when the apostle goes on in v. 5. We are buried with Him (not by baptism only, but) by baptism INTO HIS DEATH? Of course, it will not be contended, that a literal physical burying is here meant, but only a moral one. And although the words, into his death, are not inserted in Col. 2:12. yet, as the following v. there shows, they are plainly implied. In fact, it is plain, that reference is here made to baptism, because, when that rite was performed, the Christian promised to renounce sin and to mortify all his evil desires, and thus to die unto sin, that he might live unto God. I cannot see, therefore, that there is any more necessary reference to the modus of baptism, than there is to the modus of the resurrection. The one may as well be maintained as the other.

I am aware, however, that one may say, "I admit that burial with Christ has a moral sense, and only such a one; but then the language in which this idea is conveyed (sunetaphemen), is evidently borrowed from the custom of immersion." In reply to this, I would refer to the considerations under (c) above. The possibility of the usage I admit; but to show that the image is natural, and obvious, and that it is a part of Scripture usage elsewhere, is what seems important, in order to produce entire satisfaction to the mind of a philological inquirer. At any rate, I cannot at present think the case to be clear enough, to entitle any one to employ this passage with confidence, in a contest respecting the mode of baptism."

V. 13-15. This 'handwriting was against' the Jews, and contrary to them, as well as to the Gentiles; for it is observable, that the apostle changed the person, when he came to speak on this subject, saying 'against us,' not you. Mat. 5:17, 18. Jn. 1:17. Eph. 2:14-18. Heb. 7: 18, 19. 8:7-13. 9:1-14, 13-23. 10:1-18. Not only was the ritual law a heavy yoke for them to bear, Acts 15:7-11. but all its sacrifices and ablutions testified, that they were guilty and polluted; yet these typical expiations could not take away sins. So that the bond could never have been discharged, except Christ had come and made payment of it; and unbelievers among the Jews were under condemnation, by the testimony even of the ceremonial law, as well as for the additional sins which the multiplying of precepts necessarily occasioned. Rom. 5: 20, 51. At the same time, the Gentiles, who had not so much as these typical expiations, were under condemnation as transgressors, and were excluded by them even from the visible church. Eph. 2:11-13. But Christ, . . . by satisfying the justice of God for sin, had removed the ease of fallen man's subjection to Satan, and made way for the preaching of the Gospel to the nations, 'with the Holy Spirit sent down from heaven,' to make it successful. (14) Against us.] 'Circumcision publicly testified innate depravity; the purifications, the pollutions of sin, and the sacrifices, that its guilt deserved death, to which the remarkable saying of Augustine refers. In those ceremonies there was rather the confession, than the removal of sin.' Beza.—The silencing of the heathen oracles and the gradual, yet rapid subversion of the Grecian and Roman idolatry, in consequence of the death of Christ, are fixed on by some commentators, as almost the exclusive meaning of the clause, 'triumphing over them in it;' but these, however important, constituted only a small part of that victory over 'the powers of darkness,' which Christ obtained on the cross, and of his subsequent triumphs. Of these triumphs, the salvation of the dying thief may be considered as an earnest. Lu. 23:39-43.—(15) Having spoiled' 39. Not elsewhere. See on 11. 'He disarmed them, . . . and left them naked, and spoiled of all power to do hurt.'—He made a show of them.] Here only.—'Conquerors . . . lead their captives chained together after their triumphal chariot into the city, with great pomp, the people looking on and applauding.' V. 16, 17. Doubtless, this last [sabbath days] related principally to the weekly Sabbath, which, as observed on the 7th day, was now become a part of the abrogated Jewish law. For the Sabbath, under the Mosaic dispensation, was a ceremonial, and a judicial, as well as a moral requirement; the morality of it had no necessary connexion with the 7th day, in preference to all others, save as that was appointed during that dispensation; but the appropriation of a part of our time for the [special] worship and service of God, is of moral and essentially immutable obligation. (Marg. Ref. f—k—Ex. 20:8-10. 'The first day of the week,' 'the Lord's day,' was the time kept holy by Christians, in remembrance of Christ's resurrection, and 'the Sabbath,' in the N. T., always signifies the 7th day, the observance of which the Judaizing intimating, that they had no intrinsic worth in them, and that they are now done away: the body is of Christ. Observe, the advantages we have under the gospel, above what they had under the law: they had the shadows, we the substance.

II. He cautions them to take heed of those who would introduce the worship of angels as mediators between God and them, as the Gentile philosophers did, v. 18. It looked modest to do so; but though it has a show of humility, it is a voluntary, not a commanded humility; and therefore not acceptable, yea, not warrantable: it is taking that honor which is due to Christ only, and giving it to a creature. Besides, the notions on which this practice was grounded, were merely the inventions of men, and not by divine revelation; the proud conceits of human reason, which makes men presume to dive into things, and determine them without sufficient knowledge and warrant; pretending to describe the orders of angels, and their respective ministries, which God has hidden from us; and, therefore, though there was a show of humility in the practice, there was a real pride in the principle. Pride is at the bottom of a great many errors and corruptions, and even of many evil practices, which have a great show and appearance of humility. They who do so, do not hold the Head, v. 19. They did, in effect, disclaim Christ, the only Mediator between God and man. It is the highest disparagement to Christ, who is the Head of the church, for any of the members of it to make use of any intercessors with God but Him. When men let go their hold of Christ, they catch at that which is next them, and will stand them in no stead. Observe, 1. Jesus Christ is not only a Head of government over the church, but a Head of vital influence to it. 2. The church is a growing body; the nature of grace is to grow, where there is not an accidental hindrance. Increase of God, is an increase from God as its Author; or, in a usual Hebraism, a large and abundant increase. That ye may be filled with all the fulness of God,

Eph. 3:19. See a parallel expression, Eph. 4:15, 16.

He takes occasion from hence to warn them again, v. 20. 'If, as Christians, ye are dead to the observances of the ceremonial law, why are ye subject to them?' v. 21, 22. Under the law, there was a ceremonial pollution contracted by touching a dead body, or anything offered to an idol; or by tasting any forbidden meats, &c., which all are to perish with the using; having no intrinsic worth in themselves to support them; and they who used them, saw them perishing and passing away: or, which tend to corrupt the Christian faith, having no other authority than the traditions and injunctions of men. Which things have, indeed, a show of wisdom in will-worship and humility. They thought themselves wiser than their neighbors, in observing the law of Moses, together with the gospel of Christ, that they might be sure, in one at least, to be in the right; but alas, it was but a show of wisdom, a mere invention and pretence. So they seem to neglect the body, by abstaining from such and such meats, and mortifying their bodily pleasures and appetites; but there is nothing of true devotion in these things, for the Gospel teaches us to worship God in spirit and truth, and not by ritual observances; and through the mediation of Christ alone, and not of any angels. Subjection to ordinances, or [mere] human appointments in the worship of God, is highly blamable, and contrary to the freedom and liberty of the Gospel. The apostle requires Christians to stand fast in the liberty with which Christ hath made them free, and not be entangled again with the yoke of bondage, Gal. 5:1. and the imposition is invading the authority teachers wanted to impose on the Gentile converts; and 'the Lord's day,' not the 'Sabbath,' is the scriptural term for this day of sacred rest. Jn. 20:19—23. Ac. 20:7—12, v. 7. Rev. 1:9—11, v. 10. Drink.—'In the law, no kind of drink was forbidden, except to the Nazarites. . . . Now . . . it is not improbable, that the elders, who pretended to have received from Moses and the prophets, by tradition, many precepts not written in the law, might enjoin abstinence from wine and strong drink, to such of their disciples as aimed at superior holiness.' Mackn. S.

(16.) Sabbath days. 'Dwight, in answer to Paley, states, that the passage refers to the ordinary holidays of the Jews, or at most to the 7th day only, and not at all to the Christian Sabbath, especially as the latter is not, in the Scriptures, and was not, by the primitive church, called the Sabbath, but "the first day of the week," and, "the Lord's day."—The Sabbath, under the Mosaic dispensation, was a ceremonial, as well as a moral requirement.'

V. 18, 19. Beguile. The original word seems to be taken from the office of those, who presided in the Olympic and Isthmian games, and decided to whom the prize belonged. Now, if any man usurped authority of this kind among Christians, he would mislead all who willingly submitted to him, as well as dominate over their consciences.—It has before been intimated, that the Jews seem to have borrowed some of the Pagan notions, and applied them to the scriptural doctrine of angels; by these means, the Judaizing teachers had begun to corrupt Christianity with a new and refined species of idolatry. To what lengths the same principles afterwards carried professed Christians, in the worship of departed saints, real or imaginary, and the worship of images, as well as that of angels, especially in the church of Rome, is well known; and indeed it continues, in very many places, unimpaired to this day. But the whole has always been done in direct defiance to the apostle's testimony, which fully proves all such practices to be as contrary to the honor of Christ in the gospel, as the most gross, or rather acknowledged idolatry is to the honor of God in the law.—Many expositors bestow great pains, in showing what heretics, or heretical teachers, the apostle had in view, and what sects of the philosophers had supplied, so to speak, the materials for these corruptions of the Gospel. But it appears to me, that if Cerinthus, or the Gnostics, or any other heretics, had been then known, as avowing anti-Christian tenets; the apostle would no more have scrupled to name them, than he did to name 'Hymeneus and Philetus;' unless he had thought that by naming some, he should be supposed to exculpate others, who, with some shades of difference, were equally corrupting the Gospel. In like manner, the Stoics and Epicureans are named by the sacred historian, in the same way as the Pharisees and Sadducees are: Acts 17:18, and if Christianity had been corrupted, exclusively, by the speculations of Pythagoreans or Platonists, it does not appear, why the apostle should omit to protest against them. But, if all the sects of the philosophers held notions suited to corrupt Christianity, then the reason is evident, why the apostle names no one; and it is equally strong against our interpreting his words of any one exclusively. In fact, it is of immensely more importance for us to know what, than whom, he opposed; for if our attention be engrossed by the danger of ancient Christians, from this or the other sect, either of heretics or philosophers, we shall probably be led to forget our own danger, from papists, Socinians, philosophizing infidels, rational Christians, (as some falsely call themselves,) and all the varieties of superstitious and enthusiastical deceivers, against all of whom the apostle's words, as explained in an enlarged sense, most solemnly warn us. In a voluntary humility. 'Being a voluntary in humility.' The deceiver was voluntary in humility.

SCOTT.

(18.) 'It is justly remarked by Bp. Burnet, that, had it been the apostle's intention to give the least encouragement to any religious addresses to saints and angels, this would have been a very natural occasion of introducing the subject, and adjusting its proper boundaries.' DODDR.—'Some suppose, there is a reference here and in the following vs. to the doctrines and overscrupulousness of the Essenes, who, among other singularities, had peculiar views respecting angels. From affected humility, some held, that direct access to God in prayer was presumptuous, and that prayers could only be presented and accepted through the mediation of angels. The worship of angels afterwards prevailed so much in that country, that it was found necessary expressly to condemn it, at a council held at Laodicea, A. D., 363.'

HENRY, abr.
V. 20—23. The next words [which all are to perish] are differently interpreted. But the more general, and, as it appears to me, the best founded interpretation, supposes the apostle to refer to our Lord's words concerning the traditions of the Pharisees, and implies, that abstaining from such things, when not divinely prohibited, as supported the body by perishing themselves, could do nothing towards the salvation of the soul; as all such things perish with the using, and could communicate no real defilement. Mat. 15:10—20. 1 Cor. 6:12—17.—The last clause is differently interpreted.—'Nor are they of any value, as they regard those things by which the flesh is gratified (or pampered)?' Beza. By 'the flesh,' he means 'the carnal mind,' which is gratified with everything that affords nutriment to pride, self-preference, and contempt of others.—'Not by any provision for satisfying the flesh;' timē (honor) 'sometimes, in Scripture, signifies the food and clothing necessary for the body.' . . . Thus the provision of the necessaries and conveniences of life, made for parents, elders, and widows, is called timē. (1 Tim. 5:17.) The body is as real a part of our nature as the soul, and ought to have such food and recreation, as are necessary to its health and vigor. [So essential also to a sound mind.] . . . The wisdom which teaches the "neglecting of the body," is not wisdom, but folly.' Mackn.—'Forbidding marriage, which "is honorable in all."—And allowing no honorable means of satisfying those desires, which are implanted by nature, . . . brought them to all dishonorable lusts.' Hann. If this last meaning could be clearly made out, and established, it would very well suit the context. For it can hardly be doubted, that the Holy Spirit led the apostle to speak against the corruptious, by which certain Judaizing and speculating teachers, grafting the heathen philosophy, so to speak, on the superstitious Pharisee, attempted to corrupt the church, in language strictly prophetic of the subsequent corruptions of the 'man of sin,' the papal antichrist. (Note, 1 Tim. 4:1—5.)—But it can hardly be supposed, that the words tr. 'satisfying the flesh,' which seems to imply full gratification, even to repletion, would have been used by the apostle in this connexion; so that, on the whole, the first interpretation appears to me the most satisfactory. 'While it puffed up men with a vain conceit of their own sanctity, it might rather be said to tend to the dishonorable satisfying "of the flesh," though it seemed most to afflict it; for that self-complacency, ostentation, and contempt of others, with which these severities are often attended, is indeed a carnal principle; nor could the grossest sensualities be more contrary to the will of God, and the genius of true religion.' Doddr.—(22) To perish with the using. 2 Pet. 1:4. 2 12, 19. See on Rom. 8:21. 'All these things tend to the corruption of that excellent religion, into which you are initiated.' Doddr.—This accords to one meaning of phthora, but does not suit the context.—Commandments, &c. Ental-mata. 'This word occurs but thrice in the N. T. (Mat. 15:9. Mk. 7:7.) . . . In all these places it is joined with anthrōpōn, of men, and is men-of Christ, the Head of the church, and introducing another law of commandments contained in ordinances, when Christ has abolished the old one, Eph. 2:15. Observe, Such things have only a show of wisdom, but are really folly. True wisdom is, to keep close to the appointment of the Gospel; and an entire subjection to Christ, the only Head of the church.

23 Which things have indeed a show of wisdom in will-worship, and humility, and neglecting of the body; not in any honor to the satisfying of the flesh.

CHAP. III. V. 1—4. The apostle, having described our privileges by Christ, in the former part of the epistle, and our discharge from the yoke of the ceremonial law, comes here to press our duty inferred from of faith, and the way to the Father. Mat. 11:27. Jn. 14:4—6, v. 6. Without union and communion with Christ, and with the Father through Him, by 'the supply of his Spirit,' we can do nothing: Note, Jn. 15:3—5.—but true Christians are 'complete in Him.' If we enter into the spirit of genuine Christianity, we have no occasion either for Jewish ceremonies or newly-invented superstitions. We want no other wisdom, righteousness, strength, holiness, liberty, or victory, than those which Christ bestows. We need not regard those, who 'judge us in respect of meats and drinks, and holy-days,' or other human traditions, which are not so much as 'a shadow of things to come,' as Jewish ceremonies once were: but we enjoy the substance in Christ, living by faith in Him, and walking in his ordinances and commandments blameless.—Having one all-sufficient 'Advocate with the Father,' we want no other mediators; and must not by any means abuse ourselves to worship fellow-servants, to the great dishonor of our common Lord. The church has long enough been corrupted, and souls deceived, with these gross delusions, with human inventions, 'will-worship,' and self-imposed austerities: men have long enough been misled by those who said, 'Touch not, taste not, handle not;' concerning such 'things as perish with the using.' Let us then not depart from the simplicity of our dependence on the Lord Jesus, and obedience to Him. As 'dead with Him' to the world, and its wisdom and maxims, let us willingly bear his yoke, and steadily assert our liberty from human impositions. What he has left indifferent, let us regard as such, and leave others to the like freedom; and, remembering the transient nature of earthly things, let us endeavor to glorify God by a temperate, thankful, and charitable use of them. SCOTT.

tioned with evident disapprobation, and contrasted, by implication, with the commandments of God, which are called entolai. Campbell. Sc.

Concluding Note. V. 12. 'After all, what resemblance is there between a man's being dipped or plunged in water, and Christ's being laid in a sepulchre hewn out of a rock?—The common manner of burial among us is very different from that in which Christ was buried, and may have been the occasion of misleading the judgment of common readers. There are still remaining in the neighborhood of Jerusalem, many ancient tombs, which clearly show the manner of interment formerly practised. A chamber or excavation was made in a rock, and, at the sides, niches were formed for the reception of dead bodies. The body of Jesus was wrapped in linen and laid in one of these niches. Now what resemblance is there between a body's being carried, —not let down, as into a grave, but carried into such a chamber or excavation in a rock, and lying there 3 days in one of the niches at the side, and the plunging of a living person, for a moment, in water? If there is any resemblance, is it not too remote and fanciful to be regarded by the apostle?' Rev. Dr. Woods. See his Treatise on Infant Baptism, in which he justifies it from its suitability to the relation between parents and children, from its administration being decidedly implied in the N. T., though not directly enjoined, because, being a substitute for circumcision, no question arose rendering its injunction necessary: also from considerations founded on 1 Cor. 7:14. 1:15. Is. 55:23. Rom. 11:16. &c., &c. He further points out its utility; and the fact of its use by the primitive Christians, proved, from the direct testimony of Origen, Cyprian, Optatus, Gregory Nazianzen, &c., and the expressions of Justin Martyr, Tertullian, Irenæus, &c. See the Notes on Heb. 6:2. 9:10. Ed.

NOTES. CHAP. III. V. 1—4. Hid, &c. The Fountain of their life, and the nature, supports, and principles of it, were 'hidden' from carnal men, who could not understand what were the secret springs of thence. He begins with exhorting them to set their hearts on heaven, and take them off from this world. It is our privilege, that we are risen with Christ, have benefit by the resurrection of Christ, and, by virtue of our union and communion with Him, are justified and sanctified, and shall be glorified. From hence he infers, that we must seek those things which are above, seek the favor of God, and make it our constant care and business to secure our title to the heavenly bliss. And the reason is, because Christ sits at the right hand of God. He who is our best Friend, and our Head, is advanced to the highest dignity and honor in heaven, and is gone before, to secure to us the heavenly happiness; therefore, we should seek and secure what He has purchased at so vast an expense, and is taking so much care about. We must, according to our capacities, live such a life as Christ lived here on earth, and lives now in heaven.

He explains the duty, v. 2. Observe, To seek heavenly things, is, to set our affection on them, love them, and let out our desires toward them. This is to be spiritually minded, Rom. 8:6. and to seek and desire a better country, that is, a heavenly, Heb. 11:14, 16. Things on earth, are here set in opposition to things above; for heaven and earth are contrary one to the other, and a supreme regard to both is inconsistent; and the prevalence of our affection to one, will proportionably weaken and abate our affection to the other. He assigns three reasons for this, v. 3, 4.

1. We are dead; i. e. to present things, and as our portion. We are so in profession and obligation, buried with Christ, planted into the likeness of his death, crucified unto the world, and the world unto us, Gal. 6:14. And if dead to the earth, having renounced it as our happiness, it is absurd for us to set our affection on it, and seek it. We should be like a dead thing to it, unmoved and unaffected towards it.

2. Our true life lies in the other world, v. 3. The new man has its livelihood from thence. It is born and nourished from above; and the perfection of its life is reserved for that state; hid with Christ. Because I live ye shall live also, Jn. 14:19. Christ is at present a hidden Christ, or one whom we have not seen; but this is our comfort, that our life is hid with Him, and laid up safe with Him: we love Him whom we have not seen, 1 Pet. 1:8. and a happiness out of sight is reserved in heaven for us.

3. Because, at the second coming of Christ, we hope for the perfection of our happiness. If we live a life of Christian purity and devotion now, when Christ, who is our Life, shall appear, we shall also appear with Him in glory, v. 4. Observe, (1.) Christ is a believer's life, Gal. 2:20; the Principle and End of it, Phil. 1:21. (2.) Christ will appear again. He is now hid; and the heavens must contain Him; but He will appear in all the pomp of the upper world, with his holy angels, and his own glory, and his Father's glory, Mk. 8:38. Lu. 9:26. (3.) We shall then appear with Him in glory. It will be his glory to have his redeemed with Him, 2 Thess. 1:10. and their glory to come with Him, and be with Him for ever. At the second coming of Christ, there will be a general meeting of all the saints; and they whose life is now hid with Christ, shall then appear with Christ in that glory He Himself enjoys, Jn. 17:24. Do we look for such a happiness as that, and should we not set our affection on that world, and live above this? What is there here to make us fond of it? What is there not there to draw our hearts to it?

V. 5—11. The apostle exhorts the Colossians to the mortification of sin, the great hindrance to seeking the things above. It is our duty to mortify our members which are upon the earth, which naturally incline us to the things of the world. 'Subdue the vicious their active diligence and joyful patience, in opposition to all temporal interests and satisfactions. Rev. 2:17. This life was likewise secured, as 'a hidden treasure,' from wicked men and fallen spirits, who could by no means deprive them of it; nor was it in their own keeping, but in that of Christ, by whom it was sustained, and who was Himself the un-failing Source of it. Thus it was 'with Christ in God,' through the union of the Deity with his human nature, and so the immutable power, faithfulness, wisdom, and love of God secured it for them. SCOTT.

(1.) Seek. Seek, in Scripture, denotes the constant employing of one's thoughts and endeavors for obtaining the object of one's desires, Mat. 6:33.

(2.) Things above. Calvin takes this of the sublime doctrines of Christianity, as opposed to the rudiments of the world, ch. 2:20. yet Doddr. objects, that those are not in heaven. This, however, seems not very conclusive. It is plain, the words must be taken in their popular acceptation, and in all that extent of signification which a plain Christian would assign to them. And it is well observed by Doddr., that Paul proceeds on the principles he had laid down, to graft a most important practical exhortation, different from any he had advanced before, v. 5. than which nothing could more effectually tend to take them off from those bigoted attachments, of which he was solicitous to cure them. BL.

V. 5, 6. The exhortations here given are similar to those already considered. Eph. 4:17—32. 5:1—7.—In the detail of particulars here ad-fornication, uncleanness, inordinate affection, evil concupiscence, and covetousness, which is idolatry :

6 For which things' sake the wrath of God cometh on the children of disobedience :

7 In<sup>i</sup> the which ye also walked sometime, when ye lived in them.

8 But now ye also put off all these ; anger, wrath, malice, blasphemy, filthy communication out of your mouth.

9 Lie not one to another, seeing that ye have put off the old man with his deeds ;

10 And have put on the new man, which is renewed<sup>j</sup> in knowledge after the image of him that created him :

11 Where<sup>k</sup> there is neither Greek nor Jew, circumcision nor uncircumcision, Barbarian, Scythian, bond nor free : but Christ is all, and in all.

12 Put on therefore, as the elect of God, holy and beloved, bowels habits of mind which prevailed in your Gentile state ; suppress them, destroy them, as an enemy which fights against you and wounds you.' Your members which are upon the earth ; either the members of the body, or the corrupt affections of the mind, the members of the body of death, Rom. 7:24. He specifies the lusts of the flesh, for which they were before so notorious ; fornication, uncleanness, inordinate affection, evil-concupiscence ; also, the love of the world ; and covetousness, which is idolatry ; an inordinate love of present good, and outward enjoyments. Observe, Covetousness is spiritual idolatry : it is giving that love and regard to worldly wealth, which is due to God only ; and carries a greater degree of malignity in it, and is more highly provoking to God, than is commonly thought : it is very observable, that among all the other instances of

duced, we may observe, that 'inordinate affection' may relate to inordinate and excessive desires, after even lawful indulgences of any kind ; though some understand it of unnatural crimes. 'Evil concupiscence,' signifies the sensuality of the heart and imagination, which must be mortified, or gross crimes will follow. But several expositors explain the word rendered 'covetousness,' as denoting rather the excessive desire of sensual gratification, than the love of riches. *Eph. 5:3-7. This appears to me a most dangerous misconception ; for, by this mean, sensuality is supposed to be forbidden with a needless redundancy of words, and 'covetousness' escapes without the least rebuke ; whereas, 'the love of money is the root of all' kinds of 'evil,' and both the Scripture and matter of fact, show it to be one of the greatest possible hindrances to men's salvation, and the greatest of all snares to the professors of the Gospel ; nor can any vice so properly be called 'idolatry,' as avarice. 'As heathens place their confidence in idols, so the avaricious man doth his in gold and silver. . . The covetous person, though he doth not indeed believe his riches or his money to be a god ; yet by so loving and trusting in them, as God alone ought to be loved and trusted in, he is as truly guilty of idolatry, as if he so believed.' *Whitby. — By 'the children of disobedience,' some understand wicked men in general ; others seem to confine the interpretation to idolaters. But the word rendered 'disobedience' often signifies 'unbelief.' (Note, Rom. 11:25-32.) — 'It signifieth the want of the obedience of faith.' *Leigh. — And 'the children of disobedience' are doubtless all those, however distinguished, who do not believe and obey the Gospel, while the most profligate and abandoned, believing and obeying the Gospel, become the 'children of obedience.' Eph. 2:1, 2. 5:5-7. 1 Pet. 1:13-16. — The rites of Bacchus and Cybele were peculiarly observed at Colosse, the chief city of Phrygia, and conducted exceedingly to deprave the morals of the inhabitants, in many of the things here spoken of ; but alas ! the ease of immense multitudes, even in professed Christian countries, requires precisely the same warnings and exhortations.

(5.) Covetousness, which is idolatry.] Paul enumerates some disgusting fruits of selfish propensity, and sums them up with covetousness, note, 2 Tim. 3:2. which is idolatry, the worst form of sin he could think of ! For, says Harris, in his admirable essay, 'Self, self is the idol to which [we] are perpetually sacrificing ; the master, whose ravenous appetite [we] are perpetually feasting, and which eats up nearly all [we] have. So great is the cost of dressing and decorating this idol, of serving and feasting it, of consulting its voracious appetites, and ministering to its various gratifications, that but little is left for the cause of Christ. It is (says Howe) "a soul-wasting monster, that is fed and sustained at a dearer rate, and with more costly sacrifices and repasts, than can be paralleled by sacred or profane history ; that hath made more desolation in the souls of men, than ever was made in their towns and cities, where idols were served with only human sacrifices, or monstrous creatures, satiated only with such food ; or where the lives and safety of the majority were to be purchased by the constant tribute of the blood of not a few ! that hath devoured more, and preyed more cruelly upon human lives, than Moloch or the Minotaur !" [How many millions have been sacrificed to one attribute of it, covetousness, alone ! Call to mind the millions killed in this new world, for wealth ! — the hundreds stranded yearly on our coast, or blown up in steamboats, in the pursuits of commerce, who would have been ridiculed as enthusiasts, had they perished in the missionary cause. Yes, self is, indeed,] 'Dives in the mansion, clothed in purple, and faring sumptuously every day, — the cause of Christ, is Lazarus, lying at his gate, and fed only with crumbs which fall from his table.' Mammon, a Prize Essay, of which, could room be spared, the Ed. would gladly quote the whole, in the aim to rouse the church to cast off the worship, in all his forms, of that 'demon of selfishness, whose name is Legion ;' and which, in every age, has been the great antagonist of the Gospel, threatening at times even to drive from the world the principle of benevolence ; 'to reinstate which, in the hearts of man, the ocean of divine love was stirred to its utmost depths, and its infinite treasures lavished on the world in the "unspeakable gift" of Jesus Christ, the embodied love of the adorable Godhead ! "Herein is love !" — love defying all computation. How should the very mention of it surcharge our hearts with gratitude, impress us with infinity, and replace our selfishness with a sentiment of the most generous and diffusive benevolence.' HARRIS. Ed. — 'The acquisition and selfish appropriation of wealth has a tendency to strengthen all our earthly passions, and so to exclude God and eternity from our minds. Now, if Christians will take a part of that which has been the nutriment of their selfish passions, and has withdrawn their hearts from God, and will devote it to his honor, and the good of his church ; they will directly counteract this spirit of covetousness. CHRISTIANS WHO HOLD LARGE ESTATES, SELDOM ATTAIN TO EMINENT PIETY ; and, for the most part, they are destitute of those elevated enjoyments in religion, which are so often granted to others. By giving, the poison is extracted from riches, — the curse is removed.'

(6.) Wrath.] Both in this world and the next. Disobedience.] Disobedience of any of God's laws draws after it some appropriate punishment. Ed.

V. 7-11. The word tr. 'blasphemy,' may signify slanders and revilings, as well as profane speeches respecting God and holy things. Sc.

(8.) Filthy communications.] 'Lewd conversation, obscene or impure words.' DODDR.

V. 12. Kindness.] 'Properly, that sweetness of disposition, [433] sin, which good men are recorded in the Scripture to have fallen into, there is no instance in all the Scripture of any good man charged with covetousness.

He proceeds to show how necessary it is to mortify sins, v. 6, 7.

1. Because, if we do not kill them, they will kill us, v. 6. See what we all are by nature, more or less ; children of disobedience, under the power of sin, and naturally prone to disobey, Ps. 58:3. And, being children of disobedience, we are children of wrath, Eph. 2:3. The wrath of God comes on all the children of disobedience. The sins he mentions were their sins in their heathen and idolatrous state, and they were then especially the children of disobedience ; yet these sins brought judgments on them, and exposed them to the wrath of God.

2. We should mortify these sins, because they have lived in us, v. 7. Observe, 'The consideration that we have formerly lived in sin, is a good argument why we should now forsake it. We have walked in by-paths, therefore let us walk in them no more, Job 34:32. 1 Pet. 4:3. When ye lived among them who did such things, (so some understand it,) then ye walked in those evil practices. It is as hard to live among them who do the works of darkness, and not have fellowship with them, as it is to walk in the mire, and contract no soil. Let us keep out of the way of evil-doers.

And as we are to mortify inordinate appetites, so we are to mortify inordinate passions, v. 8. anger, wrath, malice : for these are contrary to the design of the Gospel, as well as grosser impurities ; and though more spiritual, have not less malignity. For the Gospel introduces a change of the higher as well as the lower powers of the soul, and supports the dominion of right reason and conscience, over appetite and passion.

And as corrupt principles must be cut off, so must the product of them : as blasphemy, which seems here to mean, not so much speaking ill of God, as giving ill language to men, or raising ill reports of them, and injuring their good name by any evil arts and filthy communication : all lewd and wanton discourse, which comes from a polluted mind in the speaker, and propagates the same defilements in the hearers. Lying, v. 9. is contrary both to the law of truth and the law of love ; is both unjust and unkind, and naturally tends to destroy all faith and friendship among mankind. Lying makes us like the devil, the father of lies, and is a prime part of the devil's image on our souls. Therefore, we are cautioned against this sin by that general reason ; seeing ye have put off the old man with his deeds, and have put on the new man. They who have put off the old man, have put it off with its deeds ; and they who have put on the new man, must put on all its deeds. The new man is said to be renewed in knowledge ; because an ignorant soul cannot be a good soul. Without knowledge, the heart cannot be good, Prov. 19:2. The grace of God works on the will and affections, by renewing the understanding. Light is the first thing in the new, as it was in the first, creation : after the image of Him who created him. It was the honor of man, in innocence, that he was made after the image of God ; but that image was defaced and lost by sin, and is renewed by sanctifying grace : so that a renewed soul is something like what Adam was in the day he was created.

In the privilege and duty of sanctification, there is now no difference arising from different country, or different condition and circumstance of life, v. 11. it is as much the duty of the one as of the other, to be holy ; and as much the privilege of the one as of the other, to receive from God the grace to be so. Christ came, that all might stand on the same level before God, both in duty and privilege. And for this reason, because Christ is all in all. Christ is a Christian's all, his only Lord and Savior, and all his Hope and Happiness. And to those who are sanctified, one as well as another, and whatever they are in other respects, He is All in all, the Alpha and Omega, the Beginning and the End : He is All in all things to them.

V. 12-17. The apostle proceeds to exhort to mutual love and compassion, v. 12. The argument used to enforce the exhortation, is very affecting ; Put on, as the elect of God, holy and beloved. The holy, are the elect of God ; and the elect of God, of mercies, kindness, humbleness of mind, meekness, long-suffering ;

14 And above all these things put on <sup>o</sup> charity, which is <sup>p</sup> the bond of perfectness.

15 And let the peace <sup>q</sup> of God rule in your hearts, to the which also ye are called in one body ; and be ye thankful.

16 Let the word <sup>r</sup> of Christ dwell in you richly in all wisdom ; teaching and admonishing one another in <sup>s</sup> psalms and hymns and spiritual songs, singing with grace in your hearts to the Lord.

17 And whatsoever <sup>t</sup> ye do in word or deed, do all in the name of the Lord Jesus, giving thanks to God and the Father by him.

and holy, are beloved ; beloved of God, and ought to be of all men. They ought to conduct themselves, in everything, as becomes them, and so as not to lose the credit of their holiness, or the comfort of their being chosen and beloved. Observe, What we must put on in particular. 1. Compassion toward the miserable ; bowls of mercy, the tenderest mercies ; merciful, as your Father is merciful, Lu. 6 : 36. 2. Kindness toward our friends, and those who love us ; a courteous, soft, sweet disposition : the design of the Gospel is, to promote friendship and benevolence among men, as well as reconciliation with God. 3. Humbleness of mind, in submission to those above us, and condescension to those below us ; not only a humble carriage, but a humble mind. Learn of Me, for I am meek and lowly in heart, Mat. 11 : 29. 4. Meekness toward those who have provoked us, or been any way injurious to us. We must not be transported into resentment, but prudently bridle our anger, and patiently bear that of others. 5. Long-suffering toward those who continue to provoke us. Charity suffereth long, as well as is kind, 1 Cor. 13 : 4. If God is long-suffering to us, under all our provocations of Him, we should exercise long-suffering to others in like cases. 6. Mutual forbearance, in consideration of the infirmities and deficiencies we all labor under ; forbearing one another. We all have something which needs to be borne with ; and that is a good reason why we should bear with others in what is disagreeable to us. 7. A readiness to forgive injuries ; forgiving one another, if any man have a quarrel against any. While we are in this world, where there is so much corruption in our hearts, and so much occasion of difference and contention, quarrels will sometimes happen, even among the elect of God, who are holy and beloved, Acts 15 : 39. Gal. 2 : 14. But it is our duty to forgive one another in such cases ; not to bear any grudge, but put up with the affront, and pass it by. And the reason is, the consideration that we are forgiven by Christ so many offences, Mat. 6 : 12.

Now, in order to all this, we are exhorted here to several things :

1. To clothe ourselves with love, v. 14. Above, over all things, put on charity. Let this be the upper garment, the robe, the livery, the mark of our dignity and distinction. Or, Let this be principal and chief, as the whole sum and abstract of the second table, 2 Pct. 1 : 5—7. He lays the foundation in faith, and the top-stone in charity, which is the bond of perfectness, the cement and centre of all happy society. Christian unity consists in unanimity and mutual love.

2. To submit ourselves to the government of the peace of God, v. 15. Let the peace of God rule in your hearts, i. e. God's being at peace with you, and the comfortable sense of his acceptance and favor : or, a disposition to peace among yourselves, a peaceable spirit, that keeps the peace, and makes peace. This is called the peace of God ; because it is of his working in all who are his. We are called to this peace, to peace with God, as our privilege, and peace with our brethren, as our duty. Being united in one body, we are called to be at peace one with another, as the members of the natural body ; for we are the body of Christ, and members in particular, 1 Cor. 12 : 27. ' Instead of envying one another, on account of any particular favors and excellence, be thankful for his mercies, which are common to all.'

3. To let the Word of Christ dwell in us richly, v. 16. The Gospel is the Word of Christ, which must dwell in us, not as a servant in a family, under control, but as a master, to prescribe and direct. It must dwell in us ; be always ready and at hand in everything, and have its due influence and use. We must be familiarly acquainted with it, and know it for our good, Job 5 : 27. It must dwell in us richly : not only keep house in our hearts, but keep a good house. Then the soul prospers, when we have abundance of the Word of God in us, and are full of the Scriptures, and of the grace of Christ. And this in all wisdom. The Word of Christ must dwell in us, not in all notion and speculation, to make us doctors, but in all wisdom, to make us good Christians, and enable us to conduct ourselves in everything as becomes Wisdom's children.

4. To teach and admonish one another. This would contribute very much to further us in all grace ; for we sharpen ourselves by quickening others, and improve our knowledge by communicating it for their edification. We must admonish one another in psalms and hymns. Observe, Singing of psalms is a gospel-ordinance ; this was instead of their lewd and profane songs in their idolatrous worship. Religious poetry seems countenanced by these expressions, and is capable of great edification. But when we sing psalms, we make no melody unless we are suitably affected with what we sing, and go along in it with true devotion and understanding. Singing of psalms is a teaching ordinance, as well as a praising ordinance ; and we are not only to quicken and encourage ourselves, but to teach and admonish one another.

5. All must be done in the name of Christ, leads men to comply with the innocent inclinations of others, and to speak to them courteously.'

V. 12—15. 'Our obedience must not consist in the mere negatives ; it must include the positives of religion. Sins of omission are breaches of the commands of God, as much as sins of commission. (Mat. 25.) A man is not universally obedient, only because he is no thief or drunkard ; he must be pious, humble, forgiving, charitable, &c.' EDWARDS.

(14.) Bond of perfectness.] 'An elegant allusion to the girdle of the orientals, which was not only ornamental and expensive, but was put on last, serving to adjust the other parts of the dress, and to keep the whole together.'

V. 16, 17. By 'the Word of Christ' the whole of the sacred Scripture seems to be meant, which was all from Him, as 'the Light of the world,' and the personal 'Word of God,' and which, in one way or other, all related to Him. Rev. 19:9, 10.—It [the singing of songs on festive occasions] has always been the case, in every country ; and the popular songs have an immense, but generally a most pernicious, effect on the people. They are learned in early life, and not soon forgotten ; and often are considered as proverbial or oracular.—Let then Christians, excluding those polluting vanities, labor to get their memories and minds richly replenished with hymns and songs of praise to God, and poems of every kind, which are suited to prepare them for the worship of heaven, and to anticipate its joys ; and let them use these hymns and songs constantly, not on public occasions alone, but in social meetings also ; and even when alone in their houses, or when journeying, and, indeed, in any other situation. (Note, Eph. 5:15—20, v. 18.) This will also render them edifying and animating companions to their fellow-Christians.—In general, whatever they are employed about, whether in conversation, in public acts of adoration, in social worship, in their secular or domestic concerns, in everything relative to the place of their abode, their removal to other residences, their employment in life, the connexions they form, for themselves or their children, as well as in every work of piety or charity ; let them do all in the name of the Lord Jesus ; in a believing dependence on his merits and grace, out of love to Him, in obedience to his precepts, and for the honor of his name, 'giving thanks to God, even the Father, by Him.' For even the best services can be accepted from sinners, only through his intercession : and nothing ought to be ventured on or engaged in by them or any Christians, which cannot thus be done 'in the name' and for the sake of Jesus the Savior.

SCOTT.

(16.) 'I see not the authority for supposing all these words refer to David's poetical pieces, and think it much more reasonable to believe, that by hymns and spiritual songs, he means such poetical compositions as, under the influence of the Spirit, were written or uttered. For it would be very absurd to suppose, that when there was such a gift in the church as we are sure there was, (comp. 1 Cor. 14:15, 16.) they should be confined to the words of David, in all their devotions of this kind. And it would certainly be as reasonable for us, in these latter ages, to explode all kinds of prayer in public, but liturgies collected from the words of Scripture, as well as sacred songs in divine worship, but literal translations from what is called the Book of Psalms. Numberless passages of the O. and N. T. are equally capable of furnishing us with sacred anthems. DODDR. So MACKN., and modern divines in general. And Williams here refers to that well known passage in Pliny, concerning the early Christians, that they used 'to meet before daylight, and sing hymns to Christ as to God.' He refers also to the musical historian, Burney, in proof that inspiration is not necessary to these sacred hymns and songs, since as B. testifies, 'the gondoliers (or bargemen of Venice) are wont to address and challenge one another in extemporaneous stanzas.' Rich observed the harvesters of Kurdistan thus singing at their work. Comp. Is. 9:3. 16:9. Ed.—Sacred music is a very important part of Christian, as it was of Jewish public worship. (Notes, Eph. 5:19. Ja. 5:13.) But it is one which is too much neglected in nearly all our churches, and considered rather as a religious performance, by the choir, than a solemn, and devotional exercise, in the spirit of which all are bound to participate, as much as in that of the prayers. Very little pains are taken in most of our churches, to improve and sustain the singing, it being generally left to a few persons, usually of the younger class, who volunteer to perform the service, while the great mass, even of the members of the church, are regardless of the subject as though it were no part of the services of God's house. But there is no good reason why it should not be considered absolutely essential in these services, and therefore provision should be made and care taken that it be properly sustained and conducted, as well as the preaching. Not by the employment of theatrical performers, and other persons, of notoriously irreligious character, but by liberally supported schools, for the instruction of the young, in the science, and by proper care on the part of the officers of the church, to provide a sufficient number of competent persons, who will properly lead in the exercise, 'singing with the spirit and with the understanding,' and 'with grace in their hearts.' The principal singer, or leader, at least, of the choir, he who gives character and tone to the whole exercise, should be a religious man, and both he and his assistants should feel a special, religious responsibility for this part of the worship of the sanctuary ; and every member of the church ought to feel, that he is bound to do all in his power, by his efforts and example, to promote an increased regard for, and interest in, this important exercise. Oh, could our churches catch something more of that spirit which animates their redeemed brethren in heaven, as they sing 'the song of Moses and the Lamb,' how would their feelings of devotion be kindled, and their hearts bow with humble adoration, when assembled for the worship of God !

18 <sup>v</sup> Wives, submit yourselves unto your own husbands, as it is fit in the Lord.

19 Husbands, love your wives, and be not bitter against them.

20 <sup>v</sup> Children, obey your parents in all things: for this is well pleasing unto the Lord.

21 Fathers, provoke not your children to anger, lest they be discouraged.

22 <sup>v</sup> Servants, obey in all things your masters according to the flesh: not with eye-service, as men-pleasers; but in singleness of heart, fearing God:

23 And whatsoever ye do, do it heartily, as to the Lord and not unto men;

25 But he that doeth wrong shall receive for the wrong which he hath done: and there is no respect of persons.

v. 17. according to his command, in compliance with his authority, by strength derived from Him, with an eye to his glory, and depending on his merit for the acceptance of what is good, and pardon of what is amiss; Giving thanks to God and the Father by Him. Observe, We must give thanks in all things; whatsoever we do, Eph. 5:20. The Lord Jesus must be the Mediator of our praises as well as of our prayers; in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, Eph. 5:20. They who do all things in Christ's name, will never want matter of thanksgiving to God, even the Father.

PRACT. OBS. The sincerity of our professed faith and love must be evidenced by a consistent temper and conduct. Thus we shall know our interest in the atonement of the Savior, by the life which we have derived from Him; Rom. 8:5-9, and may be assured, that 'when Christ, who is our Life, shall appear, then shall we also appear with Him in glory.' Having such hopes and comforts, we should daily employ ourselves in mortifying every carnal affection, and in seeking a more entire deliverance, not only from all hankering after forbidden gratifications, but from every desire of sensual indulgence even if lawful, if in any way inexpedient; and from that idolatrous 'covetousness, which God abhorreth;' for 'because of these things cometh the wrath of God on the children of disobedience.' Let us also put off anger, malice, slander, revilings, irreverent words concerning God, polluting discourse, and all kinds and degrees of insincerity. Having therefore 'put off the old man and his deeds,' and 'put on Christ,' and being 'renewed in knowledge after his image,' let us study more and more to copy his example, to have the same mind which was in Him, and to act consistently with our rank and character. We may well be indifferent to all other interests and distinctions, if we be indeed true believers, seeing 'Christ is all and in all;' but we should be earnestly desirous of evidencing that we are 'the elect of God, holy and beloved,' by cultivating every benign, friendly, humble, and gentle temper; by copying the forgiveness through which we are saved; and by putting on that 'love which is the bond of perfectness,' that it may above all appear in every part of our conduct; while 'we follow peace with all men,' and are of one mind with those who belong to the Lord's body.—We should also seek to be enriched in

V. 18, 19. Christian wives would, at that time, in many cases be required to obey idolatrous husbands; and Christian husbands to love heathen wives. (19) Be not bitter.] 'Thou art not a lord, but a husband; thou hast not got a maid-servant, but a wife: God would have thee the ruler of the inferior sex, not the tyrant.' Ambrose. [It will be recollected, that the oriental wives, as now, 'stood before,' (Gen. 2:18. marg.) their husbands while the latter sat eating, eat separately, &c.] Gen. 2:21-24. 3:16. Deut. 24:1-4. Mal. 2:13-16. Mat. 19:7, 9.—'In this precept, fidelity to the marriage-covenant is enjoined; as well as care to provide for the wife such conveniences, as may be necessary to her happiness, agreeably to the husband's station.' Mackn. Scott.

(19.) 'It is a great injury to a man to be an unkind and disobliging husband; it injures him in his inner man, [in his spiritual habits,]—in ways which he does not suspect; whereas, the smallest acts that indicate the submission of his own feelings to those of his wife in certain cases have a good influence upon him, by [fixing habits of feeling that] make him a better and happier man.'

V. 20, 21. Provoke not.] A manifestation of the lusts of power and distinction, and the fighting propensity, so common in parents while punishing children, only excites fear, the lowest and most selfish principle of duty, arousing the hereditary propensities in the child cognate to those the parent sets in example before him. And so the punishment excites

V. 18—25. The apostle concludes with exhortations to relative duties, as in Ephesians. The epistles most taken up in displaying the glory of the divine grace, and magnifying the Lord Jesus, are most particular and distinct in pressing the duties of the several relations. We must never separate the privileges and duties of the Gospel.

I. He begins with the duties of wives and husbands, v. 18. Submission is the duty of wives; the same word is used to express our duty to magistrates, Rom. 13:1, and for subjection and reverence, Eph. 5:24, 33. See 1 Tim. 2:13, 14. 1 Cor. 11:3, 8, 9. It is agreeable to the order of nature and the reason of things, as well as the appointment and will of God. But then it is submission, not to a rigorous lord, or absolute tyrant, who may do his will, and is without restraints; but to a husband, her own husband, who stands in the nearest relation, and is under strict engagements to proper duty too. And this is fit in the Lord: it is becoming the relation, and what they are bound in duty to do, as an instance of obedience to the authority and law of Christ.

On the other hand, husbands must love their wives, and not be bitter against them, v. 19. They must love them with tender and faithful affection, as Christ loved the church, and as their own bodies; and even as Himself, Eph. 5:25, 28, 33, with a love peculiar to the nearest relation and the greatest comfort and blessing of life. And they must not be bitter against them; or use them unkindly, with harsh language, or severe treatment; but be kind and obliging to them in all things, 1 Cor. 11:9, 11, 12.

II. The duties of children and parents, v. 20. Children must be willing to do all their parents' lawful commands, and be at their direction and disposal; as those who have a natural right, and are fitter to direct them than themselves. The apostle, Eph. 6:2, requires them to honor, as well as obey, their parents; their obedience must proceed from esteem. This, also, is well-pleasing to God, or acceptable to Him; for it is the first commandment, with promise, Eph. 6:2, an explicit promise; and dutiful children are the most likely to prosper in the world, and enjoy long life.

But parents must be tender, as well as children obedient, v. 21. 'Let not your authority be with rigor and severity, but with kindness and gentleness; lest you raise their passions, and discourage them in their duty, and, by holding the reins too strait, you make your children fly out with the greater fierceness.' The ill-temper and example of imprudent parents often prove a great hindrance to their children, and a stumbling-block in their way; see Eph. 6:4. And it is by the tenderness of parents, and dutifulness of children, that God ordinarily furnishes his church with a seed to serve Him, and propagates religion from age to age; [for, as is often remarked, most converts are from those who have had some early impressions of religion.]

III. Servants and masters, v. 22. Servants must do the duty of the relation in which they stand, and obey their masters' commands in all things, consistent with their duty to God, their heavenly Master: not only when their master's eye is on them, but when they are from under it. They must be both just and diligent; without selfish designs, or hypoerisy and disguise, as those who fear God, and stand in awe of Him. Observe, The fear of God, ruling in the heart, will make people good in every relation, Gen. 20:11. Neh. 5:15. 'And whatsoever ye do, do it heartily, v. 23, with diligence, not idly and slothfully;' or, 'Do it cheerfully, not discontented at the providence of God which put you in that relation.' As to the Lord and not as to men. Observe, We are really doing our duty to God, when we are faithful in our duty to men. And for servants' encouragement, let them know, that a good and faithful servant is never the further from heaven for his being a servant, v. 24. Serving your masters according to the command of Christ, you divine 'knowledge and wisdom,' by a comprehensive acquaintance with 'the Word of Christ;' that, being familiarly versed in the Holy Scriptures, we may be 'thoroughly furnished unto every good work.' By these means, our ordinary employments and relative conduct will be sanctified, and made a spiritual sacrifice. Thus the disobedient and disobliging behavior of wives, and the bitter words and harsh conduct of husbands, will alike be precluded; children will learn obedience to their parents; parents will learn to exercise their authority with prudence and gentleness; not exasperating their children by violent anger or durable resentment, nor discouraging them, by disapproving of their endeavors to please; and servants will learn to be faithful, diligent, and conscientious in obeying their masters, from fear of God, and regard to his authority and all-seeing eye upon them. In short, true religion will teach every man to do the work of his station, from his soul, to the best of his ability, and with cheerful diligence, in obedient faith, as the servant of Christ, expecting from Him the gracious reward of the heavenly inheritance; and fearing, when tempted to do wrong, lest he should come short of that inheritance, or expose himself to the displeasure of God, who is 'no Respector of persons.' These principles, and these alone, will render men universally conscientious in all places and circumstances, from love to Christ, zeal for his glory, a desire of recommending the Gospel, and of possessing the assurance that they are interested in its blessings. Let us then earnestly pray for grace, to enable us 'to adorn the doctrine of God our Savior,' in these and in all other things; that the sincerity of our love may be evinced, beyond all reasonable ground of doubt, either in our own consciences, or in those of other men. Sc.

instead of correcting, selfish habits and lusts. Yet there should be in the parent a sufficient manifestation of feeling, to show his child he has caused disturbance and unhappiness to the parent; then his better nature is exercised, and thus the end of punishment, as to the individual, attained. Ep. (21) Lest they be discouraged.] When parents are continually finding fault with their children, and confounding the distinction between wilful offences, obstinate disobedience, or immoral conduct, and the heedlessness or inadvertencies of youth; and when they sharply reprove even the defects of their endeavors to obey, without commending what is right; children imbibe the notion, that it is impossible to please their parents, and so discouragement renders them careless. They then count their parents harsh and unfriendly: they shun their company, and prefer the society of others; and in consequence are exposed to numberless and powerful temptations.

V. 22—25. (22) Singleness, &c.] He who simply aims to please one master, will serve him with an open, liberal, and free heart.—Thus the poor slave, who singly aimed to please his gracious Lord and Savior, in obeying even the unreasonable commands of a harsh and severe master, would do it cheerfully and willingly, to the best of his ability, as singly aiming to honor and obey Christ, and adorn his Gospel: and he would never want a powerful motive to faithful obedience, even to an idolatrous, iniquitous, and cruel master; as 'his Master in heaven' abundant-serve Christ, and will have a glorious reward at last. But, on the other hand, He who doeth wrong, shall receive for the wrong which he hath done, v. 25. There is a righteous God, who, if servants wrong their masters, will reckon with them for it, though they may conceal it from their notice; and so of masters, if they wrong their servants. The righteous Judge of the earth will be impartial, and carry it with an equal hand toward master and servant; the one and the other will stand on a level at his tribunal.

It is probable the apostle has a particular respect, in all these instances of duty, to the case mentioned, 1 Cor. 7. of relations of a different religion, as a Christian and heathen, a Jewish convert and uncircumcised Gentile; where there was room to doubt, whether they were obliged to the proper duties of their several relations to such persons. And if it hold in such cases, it is much stronger on Christians, one to-

PRACT. OBS. V. 1—6. There 'is no respect of persons' with God; and his ministers must act with similar impartiality, and instruct and exhort masters as well as servants, the rich as well as the poor, and rulers as well as their subjects, when opportunity is given them, in the duties of their several stations. . . .—None of these duties can be performed aright, except we 'persevere in prayer,' and watch unto it with thanksgiving.—Those who love the Gospel should always remember faithful ministers in their prayers, beseeching the Lord to assist and prosper all their labors, and to enable them, with suitable plainness and boldness, to declare 'the mystery of Christ;' (Notes, 2 Cor. 3:12—16. 4:1—4.) and they who are exposed to peculiar dangers or sufferings, in ly deserved it at his hands. (24) Serve the Lord Christ. 'We are (saith Schlichtingius, a Socinian) to serve Christ as our heavenly Lord, which, saith He, comprehends faith in Him, obedience to Him, and worship and adoration of Him.' Whitby.—(25) He that doeth wrong, &c. The misconduct of the servant would not excuse the cruelty and injustice of the master; and the idolatry, wickedness, or severity of the master would not exempt the slothful, dishonest, or disobedient servant from punishment. SCOTT.

NOTES. CHAP. IV. V. 1. 3:22—25. The obligation here of masters toward their servants, implies the duty of care for them in sickness, provision in old age, and proportionable rewards for extraordinary fidelity and exertions. ID.

(1.) Give. 'Yield in turn. Do as you would be done by.' The phrase seems to suggest all that was necessary; and it required no Oedipus to see why Paul should be brief and delicate on this head, considering that slaves formed so very considerable a part of the population, in some places far exceeding the free persons.' Bl.—Just and equal. To their fearful responsibility, as in subjection to God, and to their conscience, as awakened and enlightened by this and similar passages of his Word, those who sustain the relation of master to slaves, must ultimately be left. But how, in view of the divine requirements, can any man or body of men, acknowledging Christian obligation, systematically withhold the SS. from the slave? The Lord show them the path of duty, and enable them to walk in it! ED.

V. 2—4. In order to the suitable performance of all the before-mentioned duties, the apostle exhorted the Colossians to persist steadily in prayer. SCOTT.

(3, 4.) That God would open, &c. . . as I ought. 'Give him a fur-wards another, and where both are of the same religion. And how happy would the Gospel make the world, if it everywhere prevailed; and how much would it influence every state of things, and every relation of life!

CHAP. IV. V. 1. The apostle proceeds with the duty of masters to their servants, which might have been joined to the foregoing ch. and is a part of that discourse.

1. Justice is required of them, v. 1. not only strict justice, but equity and kindness. Be faithful to your promises to them, and perform your agreements; not defrauding them of their dues, or keeping back by fraud the hire of the laborers, Ja. 5:4. Require no more than they can perform. Provide for them what is fit, and allow them such liberties as may enable them the better for cheerful service, and make it the easier to them.

2. A good reason for this regard; 'Knowing ye also have a Master in heaven. Deal with your servants as you expect God should deal with you; and as those who believe you must give an account. Ye are both servants of the same Lord, in the different relations in which you stand, and are equally accountable to Him at last. Knowing that your Master, also, is in heaven, neither is there respect of persons with Him,' Eph. 6:9.

V. 2—4. If this be considered as connected with the foregoing v. then we may observe, that it is part of the duty of masters to their servants, to pray with them, and daily, or to continue in prayer; be concerned for their souls as well as their bodies; 'as parts of your charge, and under your influence.' And this is the duty of every one; to continue in prayer. Christians should seize all opportunities for prayer, choose the fittest seasons, and keep their minds lively in the duty. With thanksgiving, or solemn acknowledgment of the mercies received. Thanksgiving must have a part in every prayer.

Withal praying also for us, v. 3. People must ever pray particularly for their ministers, Eph. 6:19. 1 Thess. 5:25. Heb. 13:18. That God would open to them a door of utterance; either afford opportunity to preach the Gospel, 1 Cor. 16:9. or give ability and courage, to do it with freedom the cause of the Gospel, should be especially remembered in the supplications of their brethren.—Great wisdom and circumspection are required in all our conduct, 'towards those that are without,' with whom we are often connected in relative life, and engaged in secular concerns. They will certainly watch and scrutinize our whole behavior, and sometimes artfully endeavor to persuade, entice, or provoke us to sin, that they may charge the blame on our religious principles; and they will make little or no allowance for our faults.—We ought then to 'redeem the time,' that we may employ it in seeking wisdom from the Word and Spirit of God, as well as in using it for the benefit of mankind. SCOTT.

ther and more favorable opportunity of preaching the Gospel, by setting him at liberty. That such is the sense, is clear from what follows, where he alludes to this liberty, in relation to what he felt to be his obligation, being an apostle of the Gentiles.' BLOOMF.

V. 5, 6. 'Wisdom toward them that were without,' might perhaps be intended to include a prudent caution, not to expose themselves needlessly to their persecutors, to which some expositors in a great measure restrict it. But the words contain a general rule of great extent and importance.—(6) Salt. The wit, smartness, or ingenuity, often accompanied with polluting or profane allusions, which was customary and admired among the Greeks, was called Attic salt. Probably, the apostle refers to this, but shows his readers a far more excellent way. SC.

(5.) 'Christ is an example of entering mixed society. But a feeble man must avoid danger. If one can go into society as Christ did, let him go: let him attend marriage-feasts and Pharisees' houses. Yet if a Christian falls in with a mere worldling, it must be like the meeting of two persons in rain,—they part hastily. To love such company, is an evil symptom.' CECIL.

(6.) With grace, &c. 'Salt was the emblem of wisdom and virtue. Its well known effects in preventing corruption from taking place, and in communicating a pleasing relish to almost every kind of animal and vegetable food, render the metaphorical use of salt, peculiarly significant and happy.' HEWLETT.—Bl. with other 'eminent moderns,' understands it, of the mode in which any conversation with the heathens should be maintained, and interprets it in 'a moral not religious sense,' of 'that prudence and discretion which regards place, time, and persons.' ED.—'Paley, here, notices a minute coincidence, which should not be passed over. Some names being mentioned as of the circumcision, or Jews,

V. 7—18. In the close of this epistle the apostle does several of his friends the honor to leave their names on record, with some the others, it is inferred, were not so. Among the latter, is Luke, the penman of the Acts, and in Ac. 1:19. we find an observation apparently by the historian, who, speaking of the Heb. language, calls it "their proper tongue," an expression not likely to have been used by a Jew, but suitable to a Gentile writing of Jews.

V. 7, 8. (M. R.—Note, Eph. 6:21—24.) These vs. compared with the parallel passage in Ephesians, show that the two epistles were written about the same time, and sent by the same persons.—(7) Minister. Diakonos. 'A deacon of your church.' Doddr. In Eph. he paraphrases it, 'a minister and fellow-servant.' Tychicus was rather an assistant of the apostle, like Timothy and Titus. The word diakonos is used with great latitude, and the apostle uses it of himself. 1:23, 25. 1 Cor. 3:5. nay, of Christ his Lord. Rom. 15:3.

V. 9—14. Onesimus, of whom we read elsewhere, Philem. 2—21. had been formerly an inhabitant of Colosse. Aristarchus continued with Paul during his imprisonment, but it is not certain, whether this was voluntary, or whether he was confined with him for the sake of the Gospel; the latter, however is probable. Acts 19:23—31. 20:1—6. 27:1, 2. Probably, the Colossians had formerly received some injunction from the apostle, not to countenance Mark as a minister, but he now reversed it; for he and Aristarchus, with one called Jesus, (a common name among the Jews,) and surnamed 'Justus,' because of his integrity, were the only ministers 'of the circumcision,' who had cordially united with him in preaching the kingdom of God among the Gentiles, and who had been a comfort to him, by their animating converse, hearty counsel, and zealous concurrence or assistance, in all his designs. This is generally and justly urged, as absolutely conclusive against the traditions of the papists, that the apostle Peter was at this time bishop of Rome, where he resided 25 years! It also renders it highly probable, that Luke was not a Jew, or a circumcised proselyte. (Pref. to Luke.)—Epaphras, a Colossian, a pastor of the church, and probably its founder, sent his salutations to them. (Note, 1:3—8.) (11) Comfort. Parægoria. Here only. It implies animating and encouraging exhortation, such as delights and solaces the soul.—(12) Laboring fervently. Agônizomenos. 1:29.

(13.) 'Laodicea was situated near the Lycus; about 63 miles E. of testimony of his respect, which will be spoken of wherever the Gospel comes, and last to the end of the world.

1. Tychicus, v. 7. By him this epistle was sent; and he gives them no account in writing of his present state, because Tychicus would do it by word of mouth more fully and particularly. He gives him the character of a beloved brother, faithful minister, and a fellow-servant in the Lord. Faithfulness in any one is truly lovely, and renders him worthy our affection and esteem; and it adds much to the beauty and strength of the gospel-ministry, when ministers are thus loving and condescending one to another, and by all just means support and advance one another's reputation.

2. Onesimus, v. 9. He was sent back from Rome with Tychicus, probably, with the epistle to Philemon, to introduce him again into his master's family. Observe, Though he was a poor servant, and had been a bad man, yet, being now a convert, Paul calls him a faithful and beloved brother. The meanest circumstances of life, and greatest wickedness of former life, make no difference in the spiritual relation among sincere Christians: they partake of the same privileges, and are entitled to the same regards. Perhaps this was sometime after he was converted, and sent back to Philemon; and by this time he had entered into the ministry, because Paul calls him a brother.

3. Aristarchus, a fellow-prisoner. They who join in services and sufferings, should be thereby engaged to one another in holy love, and endeared to one another. Paul had a particular affection for his fellow-servants and his fellow-prisoners.

4. Marcus, sister's son to Barnabas. This is supposed to be the same who wrote the gospel which bears his name. Paul is not only reconciled to him himself, Acts 15:38. but recommends him to the respect of the churches, and gives a great example of a truly Christian and forgiving spirit. If men have been guilty of a fault, it must not be always remembered against them. We must forget as well as forgive, Gal. 6:1.

5. Here is one called Jesus, which is the Greek name for the Hebrew Joshua, Heb. 4:8. Who is called Justus. Probably he changed it for the name of Justus, in honor to the name of the Redeemer. Or else Jesus was his Jewish name, for he was of the circumcision; and Justus his Roman or Latin name. Observe, what comfort the apostle had in the communion of saints and ministers. One is his fellow-servant, another his fellow-prisoner, and all his fellow-workers, who were working out their own salvation, and endeavoring to promote the salvation of others. Good ministers take great comfort in those who are their fellow-workers unto the kingdom of God. Their friendship and converse together are a great refreshment under the sufferings and difficulties in their way.

6. Epaphras, v. 12. the same with Epaphroditus. He is one of you, one of your church; he solves you, or sends his service to you, and his best affections and wishes. Always laboring fervently for you in prayers. Epaphras had learned of Paul to be much in prayer for his friends. Observe, He labored in prayer, fervently, and always for them. They who would succeed in prayer, must take pains in prayer; and we must be earnest in prayer, not only for ourselves, but for others, also, Ja. 5:16. v. 17.

His prayer was, That ye may stand perfect and complete in all the will of God; in the will of his precepts, by a universal obedience; and in the will of his providence, by a cheerful submission to it; and perfect and complete in both, by constancy and perseverance unto the end. The apostle was witness for Epaphras, that he had a great zeal for them; and his zeal extended to all about them; to them who are in Laodicea and Hierapolis. He had a great concern for the Christian interest in the neighboring places, as well as among them.

7. Luke is another here mentioned, whom he calls the beloved physician. This is he who wrote the gospel and Acts, and was Paul's companion. Observe, He was both a physician and an evangelist. Skill in physic is a useful accomplishment in a minister, [a missionary peculiarly,] and may be improved to more extensive usefulness and greater esteem among Christians.

8. Demas. Whether this was written before the second epistle to Timothy, or after, is not certain, 2 Tim. 4:10. Some have thought it was written after; and then it is an evidence, that though Demas forsook Paul, yet he did not forsake Christ, or but for a time, and recovered himself again, and Paul forgave, and owned him as a brother. But others think, this epistle was written before the other; this in anno 62, that in 66, and then it is an evidence how considerable a man Demas was, who yet afterward revolted.

9. The brethren in Laodicea are here mentioned, as living in the neighborhood of Colosse; and Paul sends salutations to them, Ephesus; it is now called Eski-hissar, 'the old castle.' When visited by Chandler, all was silence and solitude; and a fox, first discovered by his ears peeping over a brow, was the only inhabitant. [Note, pref. to Rev.]—Hieropolis, now Pambouk-Kalesi, was situated, according to the Itinerary, 6 miles N. of Laodicea; and its ruins are now about a mile and a half in circumference. GREENFIELD.

V. 15, 16. Nymphas seems to have been an eminent Christian at Laodicea, whose well-ordered family might properly be called a Christian church, or a society by whom the Lord was stately worshipped. Mat. 13:15—13.—This direction [that about the letter] has given rise to various conjectures; but, probably, the apostle had written to the Laodiceans, though the epistle was not preserved.—'For all the epistles, which the apostles ever wrote, are not preserved, any more than all the words and actions of our blessed Lord.' Doddr.—Some think, that the epistle to the Ephesians was intended to be a kind of circular letter, and that, by private direction, a copy of it was sent to Laodicea, to be thence forwarded to Colosse. Indeed, that epistle contains so little peculiar to the church at Ephesus, and so much important instruction of general interest, that this opinion, though probably unfounded, is not destitute of plausibility. (Pref. to Eph.) SCOTT.

(16.) Epistle from Laodicea. 'Those who contend that Paul wrote to the Laodiceans, understand this of that epistle, to be received from them, which seems an unnatural construction. J. Edwards, therefore, suggests, that it was the epistle to Timothy to which the apostle refers, and which, by the superscription, appears to have been written from that city. This we consider as much the most easy and natural solution of the difficulty.' WILLIAMS.—'The question here is for the epistle. 1. There is a writing extant, called Paul's epistle to the Laodiceans, but it is an evident forgery. 2. Some suppose, an epistle which has been lost is referred to; but there is nothing to support this but conjecture; and had the apostle written expressly for the Laodiceans, he would in that have named Nymphas, who was a Laodicean, rather than when writing to the Colossians. 3. The best and most general explanation seems to be, that the epistle referred to was written partly, but not solely, for the use of the Laodiceans. This epistle, in all probability, is that to the Ephesians, for Laodicea was within the circuit of which Ephesus was and orders that this epistle should be read in the church of the Laodiceans, v. 16. Some think he sent another epistle at this time to Laodicea, and ordered them to send for that from Laodicea, and read it in their church; And that ye likewise read the epistle from La-odicea. If so, that epistle is now lost, and did not belong to the canon; for all the epistles the apostles ever wrote, were not preserved, any more than all the words and actions of our blessed Lord, Jn. 21:25. But some think it was the epistle to the Ephesians [also], which is still extant.

10. Nymphas is mentioned, v. 15. as one who lived at Colosse, and had a church in his house; either a religious family, where the several parts of worship were daily performed; or some part of the congregation met there, when they had no public places of worship allowed, and they were forced to assemble in private houses for fear of their enemies, Jn. 20:19. Acts 28:23, 30. In the former sense it showed his exemplary piety; in the latter his zeal and public spirit.

11. Archippus, who was one of their ministers at Colosse, v. 17. Observe, They who have received the ministry, must fulfil it, and people may put their ministers in mind of their duty, and excite them to it; Say to Archippus, Take heed to the ministry; though, no doubt, with decency and respect, not from pride and conceit.

12. Paul himself, v. 18. He had a scribe to write all the rest of the epistle, but these words he wrote with his own hand; Remember my bonds; not 'I am a prisoner, and send me supply;' but, 'Remember I am in bonds as the apostle of the Gentiles, and let that confirm your faith in the Gospel of Christ;' it adds weight to his exhortation; I, therefore, the prisoner of the Lord, beseech you to walk worthy, Eph. 4:1. 'Grace be with you. The free favor of God, and all good, the blessed fruits and effects of it, be with you, and your portion.'

PRACT. OBS. V. 7—18. Christians should desire to know one another's state; and mutual visits, or friendly correspondence, among faithful ministers and fellow-servants of Christ, may help forward this 'communion of saints,' excite their prayers for each other, and conduce to the comfort of their hearts.—What amazing changes does divine grace make in men's characters! Dishonest and worthless servants thus become 'faithful and beloved brethren.' Often 'the first becomes last, and the last first,' in the visible church. Mat. 19:29, 30. 20:1—16, v. 16. Lu. 13:22—30, v. 30. our fears of some who have misbehaved are removed, and they become 'fellow-workers who are a comfort to us;' while our hopes of others are grievously disappointed. But 'the Lord knoweth them that are his;' and we should always 'labor fervently in the metropolis. See T. H. Horne. Doddr. remarks, that this supposition may the rather be adopted, as the epistle to the Ephesians has nothing peculiarly referring to the state of that church, but much of common concern to all Christians, particularly Gentile converts. Bl. considers it to have been in some measure a circular epistle.'

HENRY, abr.

V. 17. Some suppose Archippus to have been the bishop of Colosse. —That he should have been then bishop of Colosse, and that Paul should not write one word, or send one salutation to him, but send to the people at Colosse to admonish him of his duty, is not very credible. Whitby.—'Archippus being old and infirm, . . . received this encouragement from the apostle, to strengthen him.' Bengelius. It is far more probable, that he had been newly appointed to the ministry, and showed some symptoms of timidity or negligence; the apostle therefore sent a message to him in particular, charging him to take heed to his sacred ministry; and to perform fully the several duties of it, with diligence, faithfulness, boldness, and zealous affection, for the edification of believers and the conversion of sinners, by sound doctrine, a holy example, fervent prayers, unwearied labors, and every mean in his power. For he had 'received it from the Lord,' being accountable to Him for his conduct in it; he was warranted to expect his assistance in his endeavors to act by his authority, and he was bound to seek his glory, in a prayer,' for those connected with us, 'that they may stand perfect and complete in the whole will of God,' in this manner testifying our zeal for them, when unable to render them other help.—Ministers, especially when they first enter on their office, or when they seem wavering in it, should be seriously and affectionately exhorted, 'to take heed to their ministry, which they have received of the Lord, that they fulfil it.' Let such persons 'take heed to themselves and to their doctrine,' as those who serve the Lord Jesus; let them remember the counsel of Paul, his bonds for Christ, and his laborious, self-denying faithfulness even unto death; for in preaching his doctrine, imbibing his spirit, and copying his example, we may expect that the favor and blessing of God will be with our souls, and prosper all the labors of our hand. 1 Tim. 4:11—16. CONCLUDING NOTE. Ch. 3:9. Lie not.] In Davenant's Exp. of Col. many things are argued against the church of Rome, with which was the leading controversy of his day. His editor, in carrying out those views, appends the following important note to the ch. on 3:9, 10. 'The doctrine of the church of Rome, concerning equivocations, mental reservations, and the lawfulness, or rather obligation, of concealing, with the most solemn oaths, what has been revealed under the seal of confession, has, perhaps, some affinity with the doctrine of the Priscillianists, which overspread and disturbed Europe in the 5th cent.—a sect which inculcated on their proselytes the dreadful maxim, "Swear, forswear, but never betray a secret." The defence set up by the Romish divines for such a notion, is, "That what is only known under the seal of confession, is not known to a man, but to God, represented by a man, i. e. to the priest, or confessor; and, therefore, the priest may, with a safe conscience, affirm, even upon oath, that he knows not what he thus knows. It is by recurring to this doctrine, that P. Daniel Bartoli, in his Hist. of Engl., or rather of the Jesuits in Engl., endeavors to justify the conduct of the Jesuit Garnet, in not discovering the gunpowder plot, to which he supposes him to have been privy. But as it was disclosed to him in confession, he would have sinned grievously by discovering it, though by such a discovery he might have saved a whole nation from destruction. So that, violating under such a seal, is a far greater evil, than the loss of so many lives,—than the utter ruin of an entire nation;"—a doctrine evidently repugnant to the dictates, both of reason and humanity, horrible in its own nature, and awfully dangerous in its consequences wherever it is held. See Bower's Hist. of the Popes, Vol. I. p. 150.' ALLPORT'S DAV. on Colossians.

'Nor is the principle of sect less unfriendly to the spread of the Gospel in heathen lands. By often stationing on the same ground, at home, more men than are necessary, or can be supported, laborers are improperly withdrawn from the destitute portions of the field, which is "the world;" conflicting interests unavoidably arise among the ministers and churches thus crowded together: as all cannot long continue, a struggle for existence is carried on, more or less openly, and with different degrees of violence, until the failure of one or more drives them from the field, and makes room for others. Nor is this conflict to be attributed so much to the want of piety in the parties, as to that actual conflict of interests which unavoidably results from the influence of sects. But certainly every true Christian must deplore this state of things, and it is the writer's deliberate conviction, that one of the many bitter ingredients in the cup of ministerial sorrow, in many portions of our land, is this unholy and unhappy strife among brothers. In short, it is a solemn and mournful truth, that sectarianism, the principle of sect, in a great measure changes the direction in which the energies of the church are applied, transfers the seat of war from pagan to Christian lands, from the territory of Christ's enemies into the very family of his friends! In the beginning, the church of the Redeemer, at peace, at home, directed all her surplus energies against the world around her, and the world of Jews and Gentiles in foreign lands. The war was waged, not by one portion of Christ's family against another, but emphatically and distinctly by the church against the world; such was the almighty force of the spiritual artillery wielded in this holy war, that, in about 300 years, the little band, of fishermen and tentmakers, fought their way to the utmost bounds of the Roman empire, [and perhaps the world?] and the banner of King Jesus, first unfurled in the valleys of Judea, was waving in triumph over the palace of the Cæsars. But who can deny, that a large portion of the energies of Christian sects, is now expended in contending with each other, in building up walls of partition, in fortifying and defending those peculiar views by which they are kept asunder? The war is no longer a foreign, it is an intestine one. How large a portion of the periodical literature of the day, is occupied in these family feuds, and consists of mere "doubtful disputations?" How large a portion of ministerial talent is placed in requisition to sustain this conflict? How many precious hours of time are thus applied? If all the time, and talent, and effort, spent by the orthodox Protestant churches, in disputing with one another, about the points of their difference, since the blessed Reformation, had been devoted to the projects of benevolent enterprise for the unconverted, heathen world, who can calculate the progress that might have been made in evangelizing the Gentile nations? Let every true disciple of the Savior, inquire, why do 600 millions of our fellow-men languish in the shadows of death, 1800 years after the blessed Gospel has been entrusted to Christian hands for them? [Note, Lu. 24:36—48.] Four and fifty times has the entire population of the globe been swept into eternity, since the Savior commissioned his disciples to publish the glad tidings to every creature. Who that has witnessed the prompt, and overwhelming blessing of God, on the efforts of the little band of Christians in Europe and America, during the last 30 years; who that has seen a nation new-created almost in a day, in the isles of the Pacific, and witnessed the standard of the cross erected in Africa, in Greece, in Turkey, in Hindoostan, in Ceylon, in China, and many other places; and the glorious Gospel of the Son of God, translated into about 150 languages; who that reflects on the millions of Bibles, and the tens of millions of tracts, which the united bands of liberal-minded Christians have sent forth, can doubt, that if the Christian church had not become secularized by the unhappy union with the civil government, under Constantine, in the 4th century, the world had been long ago evangelized? Or, if the Protestant church had not been split into so many parts by adopting the new, and we must believe unauthorized and pernicious doctrine, that they had a right to adopt for themselves, and require of others as terms of communion, not only the fundamental doctrines which were required in the earlier centuries, and were supposed sufficient for hundreds of years after the apostolic age, but also as many additional and disputed points as they pleased, thus dividing the body of Christ, and creating internal dissensions; who that is acquainted with her history, can doubt, that greater, far greater, inroads would have been made into the dominions of the papal beast, and the glorious Gospel of the Son of God, in the three centuries since the Reformation, have been carried to the ends of the earth?

'Such then being the mournful consequences of that disunion, against which the Savior and his apostles so urgently admonished their followers, we feel, with double force, that the church has been guilty of suicidal error, and that it is the solemn duty of every friend of Jesus, sincerely to inquire, Lord what wouldst Thou have me to do, to heal the wounds of thy dismembered body?' AN EXPOSITION
FIRST EPISTLE OF
PAUL TO THE THESSALONIANS, WITH
PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS AND NOTES.

(Henry's Exposition, completed by Mr. D. Mayo.)

THESSALONICA, formerly the metropolis of Macedonia, is now [under the Turks, and] called Salonica, and is the best peopled, and one of the best towns for commerce, in the Levant. Paul, being diverted from his design of going into the provinces of Asia, properly so called, and directed, after an extraordinary manner, to preach the Gospel in Macedonia, Acts 16:9, 10. in obedience to the call of God, went from Tarsus to Samothracia, thence to Neapolis, and thence to Philippi, where he had good success in his ministry; but met with hard usage, being cast into prison with Silas, his companion in travel and labor; from whence, being wonderfully delivered, they comforted the brethren there, and departed. Passing through Amphipolis and Apollonia, they came to Thessalonica, where the apostle planted a church, that consisted of some believing Jews, and many converted Gentiles, Acts 17:1—4. But a tumult being raised in the city by the unbelieving Jews, and the lewd and baser sort of inhabitants; Paul and Silas, for safety, were sent away by night to Berea: and afterwards Paul was conducted to Athens, leaving Silas and Timotheus behind, but sent them directions to come to him with all speed.

When they were come, Timotheus was sent to Thessalonica, to inquire after their welfare, and to establish them in the faith, 1 Thess. 3:2. who returned to Paul at Athens, and was sent again, with Silas, to visit the churches in Macedonia. So that Paul, being left at Athens alone, 1 Thess. 3:1. departed thence to Corinth, where he continued a year and a half; in which time Silas and Timotheus returned to him from Macedonia, Acts 18:5. and then he wrote this epistle to the church of Christ at Thessalonica; which, though placed after Paul's other epistles, is supposed to be first in time of them all, and to have been written about A. D. 51. The main scope is, to express the apostle's thankfulness for his good success in preaching among them, establish them in the faith, and persuade them to a holy conversation. [See the 'Supplement.'] HENRY.

In the notes on the concise narrative of the apostle's labors at Thessalonica, it has been shown to be at least highly probable, that he continued there a considerable time, preaching to the Gentiles, beyond the 'three Sabbath days,' on which he 'reasoned with the Jews in the synagogues;' and that he was peculiarly successful. (Notes, Acts 17:1—9.) He was, however, at length constrained, by the persecution of the zealots for the Mosaic law, and the zealots for idolatry, who had formed a most unnatural coalition against him, to leave the newly planted church under heavy trials, and destitute of many advantages; for though it seems clear, that pastors had been appointed over them, yet the pastors themselves must have been new and inexperienced converts. (Note, 5:12—15.) The apostle was, on this account, peculiarly solicitous about them; and Timothy having come to him at Athens, according to his appointment, he chose to be left alone in that city, that he might send this his faithful coadjutor to Thessalonica, (Notes, 3:1—10. Acts 17:10—15. 18:1—6.) But Timothy, returning to him at Corinth, brought him so good an account of them, that he was filled by it with joy and gratitude. He, indeed, exceedingly longed to visit them; but, having been repeatedly disappointed in his plans for that purpose, he at length wrote this epistle, which breathes a peculiar spirit of paternal love and affection, and shows, that he considered the Christians at Thessalonica, as at least equal, in faith and holiness, to those of any church to which he wrote.—It is clear from these particulars, that this epistle was written from Corinth, and not from Athens, according to the spurious postscript, but probably soon after the apostle arrived at Corinth. This is supposed, by some expositors, to have been as early as A. D. 51; [as above;] by others, A. D. 54; but, for reasons before given, a rather later date is here assigned to it. (Note, Acts 15:1—6. Pref. 1 Cor.—Note, Gal. 2:1—5.) It is, however, generally agreed, that it was written before any other of the apostolical epistles: and some think, probably without sufficient reason, before any other part of the New Testament.

As it was the apostle's design, to confirm the Thessalonians in the faith, and animate them to a courageous profession of the Gospel, and the practice of all the duties of Christianity, notwithstanding their persecutions and trials, he mentions, with high approbation, the manner in which they had received the Gospel from him; which led him to speak of his ministry and conduct among them, in a way peculiarly instructive to the ministers of the Gospel, in every age and place.—'With much address he improves the influence his zeal and fidelity in their service gave him, to inculcate on them the precepts of the Gospel, and persuade them to act agreeably to their sacred character. This grand point he always kept in view, to which everything else was made subservient. Nothing appears, in any part of his writings, like a design to establish his own reputation, or to use his ascendancy over Christian friends, to answer any secular purposes of his own. On the contrary, in this and in his other epistles, he discovers a most generous, disinterested regard for their welfare, expressly disclaiming all authority over their consciences, and appealing to them, that he had chosen to maintain himself by the labor of his own hands, rather than prove burdensome to the churches, or give the least color of suspicion, that, under zeal for the Gospel, and concern for their improvement, he was carrying on any private, sinister view.—The discovery of so excellent a temper, must carry with it a strong, presumptive argument in favor of the doctrines he taught. . . . And, indeed, whoever reads Paul's epistles attentively, and enters into their spirit, will discern such intrinsic characters of their genuineness, and the divine authority of the doctrines they contain, as will, perhaps, produce in him a stronger conviction, than all external evidence.' Doddr. These remarks are well grounded and important; but to suppose, with Dr. Macknight, that the apostle's main object was, to prove the divine authority of Christianity, by regular arguments against the several objections, which the heathen philosophers are supposed to have advanced against him, seems foreign to the nature of the epistle; and also to be grounded on a mistake, that the philosophers deigned, at so early a period, to enter into a regular disputation with the Christians, when, in fact, they derided them as enthusiasts, and their doctrine as 'foolishness.'—The apostle, in writing this first epistle, found very much to commend, which he does unreservedly, and scarcely anything to blame; though he saw it needful to intermix cautions and warnings with his exhortations.—The exact, though manifestly undesigned, coincidence of this epistle with the history contained in the Acts of the Apostles, which it tends to elucidate and confirm, is worthy of special notice.*—It appears, that afterwards the apostle visited Thessalonica; (Note, Acts 20:1—6.) but nothing further is found in Scripture concerning this flourishing church, except the second epistle which the apostle wrote to it.—'Our epistle concludes with a direction, that it should be publicly read in the church to which it was addressed. . . . The existence of this clause . . . is an evidence of its authenticity; because, to produce a letter, purporting to have been publicly read in the church at Thessalonica, when no such letter had been read or heard of in that church, would be to produce an imposture destructive of itself. . . . Either the epistle was publicly read in the church of Thessalonica, during Paul's lifetime, or it was not. If it was, no publication could be more authentic, no species of notoriety more unquestionable, no method of preserving the integrity of the copy more secure. . . . If it was not, the clause . . . would remain a standing condemnation of the forgery, and, one would suppose, an invincible impediment to its success.' Paley.—It may also be added, that the circumstance of this injunction being given, in the first epistle which the apostle wrote, implied a strong and avowed claim to the character of an inspired writer, as, in fact, it placed his writings on the same ground with those of Moses and the ancient prophets. SCOTT.

* Paley remarks, that the accordance between this epistle and the history in the Acts of the Apostles, is circumstantial and complete in many points. Thus, the sufferings of the apostle and his companions at Philippi, Ac. 16. are mentioned, ch. 2:2. The tumult at Thessalonica, Ac. 17:5. see ch. 3:4. Paul, Silas, and Timothy were together at Thessalonica, Ac. 18:5. see ch. 2:17. He also refers to facts noticed in the epistle, but not mentioned in the Acts, as a visit Paul had intended to pay them, ch. 2:18. 3:10, 11. and observes, that a person conscious of his own purpose, may probably mention it in a letter, though his historian is likely to be silent, if not ignorant respecting it. Thus it is evident, the materials of neither of these writings were derived from the other.' HENRY, abr.

CHAP. I.

<sup>1</sup> The Thessalonians are given to understand both how mindful of them St. Paul was at all times in thanksgiving, and prayer: <sup>5</sup> and also how well he was persuaded of the truth and sincerity of their faith, and conversion to God.

PAUL, and <sup>a</sup> Silvanus, and Timotheus, unto the church of the <sup>b</sup> Thessalonians, which is in God the Father and in the Lord Jesus Christ: Grace <sup>c</sup> be unto you, and peace, from God our Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ.

<sup>2</sup> We give thanks to God always for you all, making mention of you in our prayers;

CHAP. I. V. 1. Paul, the inspired writer of this epistle, though he makes no mention here of his apostleship, which was not doubted by the Thessalonians, or opposed by any false apostles among them, yet, in his humility, joins Silvanus [or Silas] and Timotheus with himself, who were now come to him with an account of the prosperity of the churches in Macedonia.

The persons to whom he writes, are the church of the Thessalonians; the converted Jews and Gentiles in Thessalonica: said to be in God the Father, and in the Lord Jesus Christ; Gentiles turned to God from idols, and Jews among them believing Jesus to be the promised Messiah; all devoted and dedicated to God the Father and the Lord Jesus Christ: to God as their chiefest Good and highest End: to Jesus Christ as their Lord, and Mediator between God and man.

Grace and peace, as in the salutations in the other epistles, are here well joined together; for the free grace and favor of God are the spring and fountain of all the peace and prosperity we do or can enjoy; and where there are gracious dispositions in us, we may hope for peaceful thoughts in our own breasts: no good can be hoped for by sinners, but from God in Christ, and the best good may be expected from God, as our Father, for the sake of Christ.

V. 2—5. I. The apostle begins with thanksgiving to God. God is the Object of all religious worship, of prayer, and praise. And thanksgiving to God is a great duty, to be performed constantly: even when we do not actually give thanks to God by our words, we should have a grateful sense of his goodness on our minds; and not only be thankful for the favors we ourselves receive, but for benefits bestowed on others, our fellow-creatures and fellow-Christians. The apostle gave thanks for all.

II. He joined prayer with his praise or thanksgiving. So we should do, Phil. 4: 6. We may sometimes mention names; at least, we should have persons and circumstances in our minds; remembering them without ceasing.

Note, As there is much that we ought to be thankful for on the behalf of ourselves and our friends, so there is much occasion of constant prayer for further supplies of good.

III. He mentions the particulars for which he was so thankful to God; namely, 1. The saving benefits bestowed on them.

(1.) Their faith, and work of faith. This, v. 8. was very famous, and spread abroad, Jam. 2: 18.

(2.) Their love, and the labor of love. Faith works by love, love to God, and love to our neighbor.

(3.) Their hope, and the patience of hope. This grace is compared to the soldier's helmet, and sailor's anchor; and wherever there is a well-grounded hope of eternal life, that will appear by the exercise of patience; in a patient bearing of the calamities of the present time, and a patient waiting for the glory to be revealed.

The apostle not only mentions these three cardinal graces, faith, hope, and love, but also the Object and efficient Cause of them,—our Lord Jesus Christ. He notices the sincerity of them,—being in the sight of God, even our Father. The great motive to sincerity, is, the apprehension of God's eye as always upon us. Then is the work of faith, and labor of love, and patience of hope, sincere, when it is done as under the eye of God. He mentions the fountain whence these graces flowed,—God's electing love, v. 4. Some would understand, only the temporary separation of the Thessalonians from the unbelieving Jews and Gentiles in their conversion; but this was according to the eternal purpose of Him, who worketh all things according to the counsel of his own will, Eph. 1: 11. Speaking of their election, he calls them, brethren beloved: for the original of the brotherhood between Christians, and the relation they stand in one to another, is, election. The election of the Thessalonians was known to the apostle, and might be to themselves, and that by the fruits thereof,— their sincere faith, and hope, and love. Observe, All those who, in the fulness of time, are effectually called and sanctified, were from eternity elected and chosen to salvation. The election of God is of his own good pleasure and mere grace, not for the sake of any merit in them who are chosen; and it is to be known by the fruits thereof. Whenever we give thanks to God for his grace, either to us, or others, we should run up the streams to the fountain, and thank God for his electing love, by which we are made to differ.

2. Another ground or reason of the apostle's thanksgiving, is, the success of his ministry among them. He had the seal and evidence of his apostleship hereby, and great encouragement in his labors and sufferings.

(1.) The Gospel came to them not in word only, but in power; they not only heard the sound of it, but submitted to the power of it; it affected their hearts: a divine power went along with it, convincing their consciences and amending their lives.

(2.) It came in the Holy Ghost, that is, with the powerful energy of the divine Spirit. Note, Wherever the Gospel comes in power, it is to be attributed to the operation of the Holy Ghost; and unless the Spirit of God accompanies the Word of God, to render it effectual by his power, it will be to us but as a dead letter; and the letter killeth, the Spirit giveth life.

(3.) It came in much assurance. Thus did they entertain it by the power of the Holy Ghost. They were fully convinced of the truth of it, willing to leave all for Christ, and to venture their souls and everlasting condition on the verity of the gospel-revelation. Their faith was the evidence of things not seen; and the Thessalonians thus knew what manner of men the apostle and his fellow-laborers were among them, and what they did for their sake, and with what good success.

V. 6—10. In these words we have the evidence of the apostle's success among the Thessalonians.

I. They were careful to imitate the good examples of the apostle and ministers of Christ, v. 6. Herein they became also followers of the Lord, who is the perfect example we must strive to imitate; and we should be followers of others no further than they are followers of Christ, 1 Cor. 11: 1. Perhaps their trials and sufferings made the Word more precious, being dear-bought; and the examples of the apostles shined very bright under their afflictions; so that the Thessalonians embraced the Word cheerfully, and followed the example of the suffering apostle with joy; such solid, spiritual, lasting joy, as the Holy Ghost is the Author of, who, when our afflictions abound, makes our consolations much more abound.

II. Their zeal prevailed to that degree, that they were themselves examples to all about them, v. 7, 8. Their example was very effectual to make good impressions on

NOTES. CHAP. I. V. 1—4. Silas, or Silvanus, did not come to the apostle when driven from Thessalonica and Berea, till after his arrival at Corinth, nor did Timothy continue with him in that city, being speedily sent back to Thessalonica. 3:1—5. Acts 17:10—15. 18:1—5. so that the epistle could not be written from Athens. These graces and duties they attended to, as 'in the sight of God,' even their reconciled Father, and the apostle was satisfied, from what he had witnessed, that they were his 'brethren beloved,' and 'the elect of God' in Jesus Christ. This he did not speak as a matter of immediate revelation; but his favorable conclusion respecting them was drawn, by tracing back the effects of divine grace in their conversion, to the source of them in 'their election of God.' (Marg. Ref. n.—Notes, Phil. 1:3—8. 2 Pet. 1: 5—11.)—The purpose of God, in calling the Gentiles collectively, could not be known in this manner, and, indeed, some of the Thessalonians were Jewish converts. And in what sense a remnant of Thessalonians, (that is, a small proportion of the inhabitants of one city,) could prove the national election of the Macedonians, those who adopt this opinion would do well to inform us. Some explain the words to mean, election to external privileges, as Israel had been chosen. Rom. 9:6—23. but an external profession of Christianity was sufficient to prove this; whereas the apostle grounds his confidence, respecting the Thessalonians, on 'their work of faith, and labor of love, and patience of hope,' 'things which,' no doubt, 'accompany salvation.' (Notes, Rom. 8:28—31. 2 Thes. 2:13, 14. Heb. 6:9—12.)—He had once indeed had his fears of them, but subsequent tidings from them had fully satisfied him. (3:5—7.) yet, if any individuals did not show the same 'active faith, laborious love, and patient hope,' as the rest did, they were exceptions also to the apostle's general confidence, respecting the professed Christians at Thessalonica.

(4, 5.) 'It is a most decided mark, whereby we know our election of God, when we cannot receive false doctrines, nor follow teachers un- sent of the Lord. The glorious, and discriminating truths of grace, the elect of God delight in. They know from their own experience, what manner of men they are who hold up Christ, as the one only ordinance of heaven; who inculcate among their people salvation in his blood and righteousness without works; determined to know nothing among men but Jesus Christ and Him crucified.' HAWKER.

V. 5—8. In power, and in the Holy Ghost, &c.] This cannot relate to miracles exclusively; for numbers saw miracles, who notwithstanding continued unbelievers; but the new-creating power of the Holy Spirit, accompanying the Word of God, had produced such a full conviction of its nature and importance, and such an assurance of faith and hope, as <sup>1</sup> In what manner the Gospel was brought and preached to the Thessalonians, and in what sort also they received it.

<sup>18</sup> A reason is rendered, both why St. Paul was so long absent from them, and also why he was so desirous to see them.

FOR yourselves, brethren, know our entrance in unto you, that it was not in vain :

2 But even after that we had suffered before, and were shamefully entreated, as ye know, at <sup>a</sup> Philippi, we were <sup>b</sup> bold in our God to speak unto you the gospel of God with much <sup>c</sup> contention.

PRACT. OBS. It excites cordial joy and fervent gratitude, in faithful ministers, when they witness 'the work of faith, and labor of love, and patience of hope in the Lord Jesus,' of those among whom they have preached the Gospel. . . . But faith which works not obedience, professed love that declines self-denying labor, and hope which is separated from 'patient continuance in well-doing,' can never prove a man's 'election;' all other ways of proving it are vain and delusory, and this scriptural medium is not capable of being perverted.—Alas! even the Gospel, which the apostle preached, often 'comes in word only,' and thus men continue impenitent, and slaves to sin, or, at most, become only notional formalists and mere professors of the Gospel. This should excite all who preach, and all who love the Gospel, to 'pray without ceasing,' that it may everywhere, and at all times, be attended by the divine power of the Holy Spirit, producing, in the minds and hearts of men, that 'full assurance' of its truth and importance, which alone can prevail with them to break through all hindrances, and make all sacrifices, that they may follow Christ and be partakers of his salvation. (Notes, Rom. 1:13—16. 1 Cor. 1:25. 2:3—5. 2 Cor. 4:7. 10:1—6.) This is 'the work of God,' but He works by means; and when great numbers of careless, ignorant, and immoral persons, are turned from their idols and iniquities, their worldly pursuits and connexions, 'to serve the living and true God,' to believe in and obey the Lord Jesus, to 'deny ungodliness and worldly lusts, to live soberly, righteously, and godly in this present world,' and to 'wait for the Lord Jesus from heaven;' there needs little pains to spread the report, for it is a work of God which will be sure to be known, and rendered conspicuous by its own light. May He then send forth ministers into all parts of the world, attended by his power, and thus made abundantly successful, in the conversion of the nations to the worship of the living God, and the obedience of faith in his beloved Son!—But let us remember, 'that the wrath of God is revealed from heaven against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men.' Rom. 1:18—20. None but Jesus can deliver any man from this merited condemnation; all who believe in Him, with an obedient faith, are delivered from it, and on all others 'the wrath of God still abideth.' Let us then 'give diligence to make our calling and election sure,' and if we have obtained this assurance, let us remember the price our deliverance cost the great Redeemer, that humble love may constrain us devotedly to obey Him, and cheerfully to suffer for Him. But, if any are conscious that they have not experienced this deliverance, let them take warning, without delay, 'to flee from the wrath to come,' and to seek refuge in Christ and his salvation. Heb. 6:16—20.

before the Thessalonians, were edified by their example. The Word of the Lord, or its wonderful effects on the Thessalonians, was famous and well known, in the regions round about that city, and in every place; not strictly everywhere, but here and there, up and down in the world: so that, from the good success of the Gospel among them, many others were encouraged to entertain it, and to be willing, when called, to suffer for it.

The readiness of their faith was famed.

They embraced the Gospel as soon as it was preached to them; so that every body took notice what manner of entering in among them the apostles had; that there were no such delays as at Philippi, where it was a great while before much good was done.

The effects of their faith were noted. They quitted their idolatry, in which they had been educated, gave themselves up to serve the living and true God, and wait for his Son from heaven, v. 10. And this is one of the peculiarities of our holy religion, to wait for Christ's second coming, as those who believe He will come, and hope He will come to our joy. Believers under the Old Test. waited for the coming of the Messiah, and believers now wait for his second coming; He is yet to come. And there is good reason to believe He will come, because God has raised Him from the dead, which is a full assurance unto all men, that He will come to judgment, Acts 17:31. And there is good reason to hope and wait for his coming, because He has delivered us from the wrath to come; from that wrath which is yet to come on unbelievers; and which, when it is once come, will be yet to come, because it is everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels, Mat. 25:41.

CHAP. II. V. 1—6. Here we have an account of Paul's manner of preaching, and his comfortable reflection on his entrance in among the Thessalonians. As he had the testimony of his own conscience witnessing to his integrity, so he could appeal to the Thessalonians how faithfully he, and Silas, and Timothy, his helpers in the work of the Lord, had discharged their office, v. 1. He here comforts himself either in the success of his ministry, that it was not fruitless or in vain, or, as others think, reflecting on the sincerity of his preaching, that it was not vain and empty, or deceitful and treacherous. The subject-matter of his preaching was not vain, but sound, solid truth, such as was most likely to profit his hearers. A good example this is, to be imitated by all the ministers of the Gospel. Much less was his preaching vain or deceitful, 2 Cor. 4:2. He had no sinister or worldly design in his preaching; and he puts them in mind how it was,

I. With courage and resolution, v. 2. He had met with ill usage at Philippi, as they well knew; there he and Silas were put in the stocks; yet no sooner were they set at liberty than they went to Thessalonica, and preached the Gospel with as much boldness as ever, nay, with contention, with great agony: which denoted either the apostles' striving in their preaching, or their striving against the opposition they met with. This was Paul's comfort; he was neither daunted in his work, nor driven from it.

II. With great simplicity, and godly sincerity, v. 3. This, no doubt, was matter of the greatest comfort to the apostle,—his conscious sincerity; and was one reason of his success. The Gospel he preached was pure and holy, worthy of its holy Author, tending to discountenance all manner of impurity; and as the matter of his exhortation, so the manner of his speaking was without guile. He not only asserts his sincerity, but subjoins the reasons and evidences thereof. The reasons are contained, v. 4.

1. They were stewards, in trust with the Gospel, who must be called to an account, when they must be no longer stewards.

2. Their design was to please God, and not men. The Gospel is not accommodated to the fancies and lusts of men: but, on the contrary, is designed to mortify corrupt affections, and deliver from the power of fancy, that we may be brought under the power of faith, Gal. 1:10.

3. They acted under the consideration of God's omniscience, as in the sight of Him who tries our hearts.

The evidences of the apostle's sincerity follow; and they are these: He avoided, had induced the Thessalonians, at all events, to embrace and profess the Gospel; even as a ship is carried, by a full tide and a fair wind, over every obstacle, into the haven. 'A metaphor taken from ships, when they are carried on under full sails.' Leigh.

(1.) Flattery, v. 5. He and his fellow-laborers were far from that. They did not flatter men in their sins; nor tell them, if they would be of his party, they might live as they listed.

(5—8.) 'For ages, the true method of promoting religion had been sadly misunderstood. And when Providence placed the church in America on its own resources, the general expectation was, that we should become a nation of infidels. And even now, thousands in the world imagine that religion cannot live and flourish, without the fostering care of civil government. America, therefore, owes it to the universal interests of the church, and to that method of promoting religion which must be everywhere adopted before religion can have universal sway, to be very holy, very zealous, very benevolent,—to undertake enterprises on a scale which measures the earth, and to demonstrate that they can be accomplished by the power of truth and love. The church, in this country, must not only sustain herself and purify the nation, but she must stretch out her arms, and make the whole world feel the strong embrace of her benevolence.'

V. 9. 'I do not hesitate to say, having well considered the import of my words, that men are not so mean (I must use the word) to any cause, as Christians in general are to Christ's cause. They give more sparingly to it than to any other. Some Christians will give more to promote a political election, than to [serve the living God, by] helping on the conversion of the world.'

Rev. Dr. NEVINS.

NOTES. CHAP. II. V. 1. In vain.] 'Many ancients interpret it "free of danger and fear;" but the sense is inapposite. Most moderns explain it "false, lying;" but this is harsh. If the connexion be traced it must be taken in the sense of unfruitful, to which I am more inclined.'

V. 3. Exhortation.] 'Here it must signify teaching, and comprehend the whole of the apostle's religious instruction. Ac. 13:15. 15:31. Deceit.] 'It may denote either imposture and seduction: as Eph. 4:14. 2 Thess. 2:11. 1 Jn. 4:6. 2 Pet. 3:17. or error, self-deceit, enthusiasm; as Rom. 1:27. Ja. 2:13.' So Bloomf., who reports Benson as adopting the former; but he himself, after Koppe, Mackn., Schl., Ros., and most commentators, adopts the latter.

5 For neither <sup>f</sup> at any time used we flattering words, as ye know, nor a cloak of covetousness; God <sup>is</sup> witness:

6 Nor of men <sup>g</sup> sought we glory, neither of you, nor <sup>yet</sup> of others, when we might have <sup>h</sup> been <sup>i</sup> burdensome, as the apostles of Christ.

7 But we were gentle among you, even as a nurse cherisheth her children:

8 So, being affectionately desirous of you, we were willing to have <sup>j</sup> imparted unto you, not the gospel of God only, but also our own souls, because ye were dear unto us.

9 For ye remember, brethren, our <sup>k</sup> labor and travail: for laboring night and day, because we would not be chargeable unto any of you, we preached unto you the gospel of God.

(2.) Covetousness, v. 5. His design was not to enrich himself by preaching the Gospel; so far from that, he did not condition with them even for bread. He was not like the false apostles, who, through covetousness, with feigned words made merchandise of the people, 2 Pet. 2:3.

(3.) Ambition and vainglory, v. 6. He expected neither people's purses nor their caps, neither to be enriched by them, nor caressed and adored by them, and called Rabbi, ch. 5:26. His ambition was to obtain that honor which comes from God, John 5:41.

PRACT. OBS. V. 1-12. Confidence in God, zeal for his glory, love to the souls of men, and conscious integrity, will support faithful ministers amidst manifold hardships and sufferings.—All ministers should be careful, that their preaching be far removed from fallacy, deceit, and a licentious tendency; and that their motives be equally pure from all artful designs of advancing, enriching, or indulging themselves, by means of their ministry. For such scandalous discoveries have been made, respecting priests of different religions, and even the more plausible and earnest of them; that men are very apt to suspect some fraud, or corrupt intention, lurking under a great appearance of zeal and devotion. It is in vain to oppose arguments to this deep-rooted suspicion, except they are corroborated by manifest facts.—We should by no means 'seek to please men;' but simply study to 'approve ourselves to God, who trieth the hearts.' Even the approbation of pious men may be fallacious, and may interfere with our simplicity, in aiming to please the Lord by faithfulness to our trust. A man may, indeed, by harshness and severity, in his manner of stating the truth, prevent his own usefulness; but selfish principles will far more generally lead men to temporize, to palliate, and to 'speak smooth things.' This strain tends to bring the hearers into a good humor with themselves, and that makes them friend-

V. 5-8. (5) Flattering. 'Because men flatter for the sake of the belly.' Leigh. Her children. 'Her own children,' ns distinguishing the nursing mother, from the hired nurse of another woman's child.—(8) Being affectionately desirous, . . . we were willing, &c. Here only. 'Longing after you, we took pleasure.' The clause can hardly be done justice to in a translation; and the original throughout is peculiarly tender and pathetic.

(6.) Burdensome. 'The apostle evidently refers to his right of being maintained at their charge. Comp. v. 9. 2 Cor. 11:9. 1 Tim. 5:18. 1 Cor. 9. throughout. But he was acting now on the same maxims at [442].'

He tells them, they might have used greater authority as apostles, and expected greater esteem, and demanded maintenance, which is meant by the phrase of being burdensome; because, perhaps, some would have thought this too great a burden for them to bear.

V. 7-12. He here reminds them of the manner of their conversation among them. He and his fellow-laborers were,

I. Gentle in their behavior, v. 7. He showed great mildness and tenderness, who might have acted with the authority of an apostle of Christ. Though he abhorred flattery, yet he was most condescending to all men. He showed the kindness and care of a nurse that cherishes her children. This is the way to win people, rather than to rule with rigor. The Word of God is indeed powerful; and as it comes often with awful authority on the minds of men, as it always has enough in it to convince every impartial judgment, so it comes with the more pleasing power, when the ministers of the Gospel recommend themselves to the affections of the people. And as a nursing mother bears with frowardness in a child, and condescends to mean offices for its good, and cherishes it in her bosom; so in like manner should the ministers of Christ behave toward their people, 2 Tim. 2:24. This gentleness and goodness the apostle expressed several ways.

1. By the most affectionate desire of their welfare, v. 8. He sought them, not theirs; their spiritual and eternal welfare was what he was earnestly desirous of.

2. By great readiness to do them good, v. 8. See here the manner of Paul's preaching. He spared no pains, was willing to run hazards, and venture his soul, or life, willing to spend and be spent; and as they who give bread to the hungry from a charitable principle, are said to impart their souls in what they give, Isa. 58:10. so did the apostles in giving forth the bread of life; so dear were these Thessalonians in particular to this apostle, and so great was his love to them.

3. By bodily labor to prevent their charge, v. 9. He denied himself the liberty he had of taking wages from the churches. To the labor of the ministry he added that of his calling, as a tentmaker, that he might get his own bread; not that he spent the whole night and day in bodily labor; but he was willing to forego his rest in the night, that he might have opportunity to do good to the souls of men in the daytime: a good example for ministers of the Gospel, to be industrious for the salvation of men's souls; though it will not follow that they are always obliged to preach freely: no general rule is to be drawn from this, that ministers may at no time work with their hands, for supply of their outward necessities, or that they ought always so to do.

4. By the holiness of their conversation, concerning which, he appeals not only to them, but to God also, v. 10. They were observers of their outward conversation in public before men, and God was witness not only of their behavior in secret, but of the inward principles from whence they acted. Herein, said this apostle, do I exercise myself, to have always a conscience void of offence toward God, and toward men, Acts 24:16.

II. He mentions their faithful discharge of the work and office of the ministry, v. 11, 12. Concerning this also, he could appeal to them as witnesses. Paul exhorted the Thessalonians, not only informing them in their duty, but exciting and quickening them to the performance of it, by proper motives and arguments. He comforted them, also, endeavoring to cheer and support their spirits, under difficulties and discouragements they might meet with. And this he did not only publicly, but privately also, and from house to house, Acts 20:20. and charged every one of them by personal addresses: this, some think, is intended by the similitude of a father's charging his children. As my beloved sons, I warn you, 1 Cor. 4:14.

The manner of this apostle's exhortation ought to be regarded by ministers in particular for their imitation; and the matter of it is greatly to be regarded by them and all others; namely, that they would walk worthy of God, who hath called them to his kingdom and glory, v. 12. Observe, 1. Our great gospel-privilege,—God has called us to his kingdom and glory. 2. Our great gospel-duty,—that we walk worthy of God; that the temper of our minds, and tenor of our lives, be answerable to this call, and suitable to this privilege.

V. 13-16. Here observe,

I. The apostle mentions the success of his ministry among these Thessalonians, v. 13. expressed,

1. By the manner of their receiving the Word of God, v. 13. Where, note, The Gospel is preached by men like ourselves, yet it is, in truth, the Word of God; from the apostles, by divine inspiration; from others, as in the Scriptures: and they are greatly to blame, who give out their own fancies or injunctions for the Word of God: this is the vilest way of imposing on people, and to deal unfaithfully. They are also to blame, who, in hearing the Word, look no further than to the ministry of men, or the ly to the preacher; which may be greatly conducive to his popularity and secular advantage, and for a time even add to his reputation. It is therefore a very great thing indeed, for a minister to be able on good grounds to say, 'Neither at any time used we flattering words, as ye know, or a cloak of covetousness, God is witness; nor of men sought we glory;' and to be able to appeal, both to the Lord and to men, that he has constantly receded even from his equitable claims, out of love to the souls of his hearers, and lest he should be 'burdensome to them.' But, when this decided faithfulness, this unambitious, disinterested and self-denying 'plainness of speech,' on all occasions, unites with equal tenderness and affection; so that the same persons can say, 'We were gentle among you, even as a nursing mother cherisheth her own children: so, being affectionately desirous of you, we were willing to have imparted unto you, not the Gospel of God only, but also our own souls, because ye were dear unto us;' then the servants of Christ come as near to the mind of their Lord, as can be conceived attainable by mortal men. There are, however, but few, if any, who are not warped, either one way or the other, by constitution, habit, or circumstances: it behooves us therefore to search out our spirits, to be open to conviction, and to guard against our own peculiar weakness. V. 9, 10. 'Paley shows, that although Ac. 17. only mentions Paul's resort to the synagogue at Thessalonica on three Sabbath-days, yet there is nothing which shows that he did not remain and exercise his ministry there, among the Gentiles, for a longer period, as the passage implies.'

HENRY, Abr.

V. 15-16. The apostle and his friends thanked God continually, because the Christians at Thessalonica, when they received 'the Word of God, which they had heard from them, did not receive it as the word of

as the word of men, but, as it is in truth, the word of God, which effectually worketh also in you that believe.

14 For ye, brethren, became followers of the churches of God which in Judea are in Christ Jesus: for ye also have suffered like things of your own countrymen, even as they have of the Jews;

15 Who both killed the Lord Jesus and their own prophets, and have persecuted us; and they please not God, and are contrary to all men;

16 Forbidding us to speak to the Gentiles that they might be saved, to fill up their sins alway; for the wrath is come upon them to the uttermost.

17 But we, brethren, being taken from you for a short time in presence, not in heart, endeavored the more abundantly to see your face with great desire.

18 Wherefore we would have come unto you, even I Paul, once and again; but Satan hindered us.

19 For what is our hope, or joy, or crown of rejoicing? Are not even ye in the presence of our Lord Jesus Christ at his coming?

20 For ye are our glory and joy.

CHAP. III.

I Paul testifieth his great love to the Thessalonians, partly by sending Timothy unto them to strengthen and comfort them; partly by rejoicing in their well doing; 10 and partly by praying for them, and desiring a safe coming unto them.

words of men; who are only, or chiefly, pleased with the elegance of the style, or the beauty of the composition, or the voice and manner in which the Word is preached,

PRACT. OBS. V. 13—20. It is incumbent on us, to 'give thanks to God without ceasing,' in behalf of those who receive the Gospel from us, not as the opinion of fallible men, but as the 'sure testimony of the Lord,' which maketh wise the simple. This it most certainly is, as far as any man preaches according to the Scriptures; however unlearned, obscure, or frail he may be. When thus received with reverent faith and obedient attention, it 'works effectually' an entire change in the judgment, disposition, and characters of men: they become not so much followers of this or the other leader of a sect, as imitators of the primitive Christians, and so of Christ Himself. But they who would forbid us thus to preach to 'the chief of sinners,' and to those who are dead in sin, and to send or carry the Gospel, and the Word of God to the heathen, 'that they may be saved,' do not in this 'please God, and they are contrary to all men.' The object and motives of those in general, who would hinder the publishing of the Gospel, in any part of the world, are manifest: they idolize worldly interests, care little for the temporal good, and nothing for the souls of men, and either hate or slight the genuine and unadulterated Word of God. But it is grievous to think, that some apparently pious men, misled by an undue attachment to system, should in any way or degree, countenance the conduct of those, who in every age are actuated by the same worldly, proud, bigoted, and selfish spirit, which influenced the Jews of old, when filling up the measure of their sins, 'till wrath came upon them to the uttermost.' SCOTT.

This might be disputed against, rejected, or even derided; or it might be received and believed in part. The morose and unsocial bigotry of the Jews, respecting all Gentiles, from the time when they ceased to copy their idolatries, is largely insisted on by commentators in general; and the testimony of Gentiles is adduced in proof of it. This evidence, however, is not much to be regarded: for if the Jews had shown the most compassionate, liberal, and friendly attention to idolaters in temporal things; while they steadily adhered to the divine law, by separating from them in all things relating to religion; the clamor of the Gentiles against their bigotry would not have been silenced, if it had been even abated. The steady refusal of what some have called an intercommunity of deities and religious rites, would have sufficed to keep up the prejudice against Jews, and the disdain of them, among the proud Greeks and Romans; for the same reasons, that no philanthropy or liberality can exempt those from contempt and reproach, even among professed Christians, who unreservedly avow their attachment to the doctrines of the Gospel as their rule of faith, and the precepts of Christ as their rule of conduct. The Jews were, however, in this respect very blamable; and so are many Christians: but the grand point, which here demands consideration, is this; that the determined opposition of the Jewish nation, to the preaching of the Gospel among the Gentiles, was the immediate cause of 'wrath coming on them to the uttermost.' Let Britain, let America, let every inhabitant of every Christian land, tremble at the thought, of opposing the cause of missions among the heathen, as too many are disposed to do, 'lest wrath come upon us also and expect to receive their advantage herein. We should receive the Word of God as the Word of God, with affections suitable to the holiness, wisdom, verity, and goodness thereof.

2. By the wonderful operation of this Word they received, v. 13. They who by faith receive the Word, find it profitable: it converts their souls, enlightens their minds, rejoices their hearts, Ps. 19. and such as have this inward testimony of the truth of the Scriptures, have the best evidence to themselves of their divine original.

II. He mentions the good effects of his preaching,

1. On himself and fellow-laborers. It was a constant cause of thankfulness, v. 13. The apostle expresses his thankfulness to God so often on this account, that he seems to think he never could be sufficiently thankful that God had counted him faithful, and put him into the ministry, and made his ministrations successful.

2. On themselves. The Word wrought effectually in them, not only to be examples to others in faith and good works, but also in constancy and patience under sufferings and trials for the sake of the Gospel, v. 14. Note, The cross is the Christian's mark: if we are called to suffer, we are called only to be followers of the churches of God, Mat. 5:12. It is a good effect of the Gospel, when we are enabled to suffer for its sake. The churches in Judea first heard the Gospel, and they first suffered for it: for the Jews were the most bitter enemies Christianity had, and were especially enraged against their countrymen who embraced it. They were the ringleaders of persecution in all places, particularly at Thessalonica, Acts 17:5. The apostle gives their character, v. 16. enough to justify their final rejection, and the ruin of their place, and church, and nation, which was now approaching. Murder and persecution are most hateful to God; and they had an implacable enmity to the Gentiles; they envied them the offers of the Gospel. Nothing provoked them more, than our Savior's speaking to them at any time concerning this matter; and so of Paul, when he told them he was the apostle of the Gentiles, Acts 22:21. Thus did the Jews fill up their sins; and for the sake of these things, wrath is come upon them to the uttermost; it was not many years after this, that Jerusalem was destroyed, and the Jewish nation cut off by the Romans. Note, When the measure of any man's iniquity is full, and he has sinned to the uttermost, then comes wrath, and that to the uttermost.

V. 17—20. In these words, the apostle apologizes for his absence. He and his brethren were involuntarily forced from them, v. 17. He was unwillingly sent away by night, to Berea, Acts 17:10. But though absent in body, yet he was present in heart. He had still a remembrance of them, and great care for them.

Even his bodily absence was but for a short time; (the time of an hour.) All our time on earth is short and uncertain, whether we are present with our friends, or absent from them. It is in heaven that holy souls shall meet, and never part more.

He earnestly desired, and endeavored to see them again, v. 17. So he, at least, intended his absence should be but for a short time. But men of business are not masters of their own time. Paul did his endeavor, and could no more, v. 18.

He tells them, Satan hindered his return, v. 18. that is, either some enemy or enemies, or the great enemy of mankind, who stirred up opposition to Paul, either in his return to Thessalonica, when he intended to return thither, or stirred up such contentions or dissensions in those places whither he went, as made his presence necessary. Note, Satan is a constant enemy to the work of God, and does all he can to obstruct it.

He assures them of his affection and high esteem for them, though not able, as yet, to be with them according to his desire. They were his hope, and joy, and crown of rejoicing; his glory and joy. These are expressions of great and endeared affection and high estimation.

The apostle here puts the Thessalonians in mind, that however it might be with him, yet our Lord Jesus Christ will come, nothing shall hinder that. And further, when He shall come, all must appear in his presence, or before Him; ministers and people; and faithful people will be the glory and joy of faithful ministers in that great and glorious day.

act as if he were unconcerned for their welfare. 2 Cor. 2:12, 13. 7:5—7. he therefore decidedly chose, and submissively acquiesced, to be left alone at Athens, though that must have been very inconvenient to him; and he sent back Timothy to Thessalonica, to establish the Christians of that city in the faith; by suitable instructions, which he was eminently qualified to give them, and to exhort and encourage them to hold fast their profession, whatever opposition they might meet with, by assuring them of peculiar protection, consolation, and reward.—Some would explain what the apostle here speaks concerning persecution, exclusively of himself and the other apostles and evangelists, as if the enemies pleaded this argument against the divine original of Christianity; and as if the danger of the Thessalonians arose, not from any persecutions to which they themselves were exposed, but from the vain reasonings of their heathen neighbors, respecting those which the apostle endured, and his leaving Thessalonica on account of them. But the Thessalonians were themselves exposed to persecution, as all must expect to be 'who live godly in Christ Jesus;' and what they suffered or dreaded would be at least as likely to 'move them,' as any reasonings of their enemies; and such reasonings of philosophical opposers do not appear to have existed at so early a period. By all these terms, the apostle means to hint, that he had supplied his absence by an able substitute.—Establish . . . and comfort.] The most natural sense, and that most agreeable to the adjunct "concerning your faith," is, [444]

II. Paul's end and design in sending Timothy, v. 2. He was desirous they might be confirmed and comforted; confirmed in the choice they had made of the Christian religion, and comforted in the profession and practice of it; concerning the object of their faith, the truths of the Gospel; and particularly that Jesus Christ was the Savior of the world, and so wise and good, so powerful and faithful, that they might rely on Him: concerning the recompense of faith, which was more than sufficient to balance all their losses, and reward all their labors.

III. His motives: a godly fear or jealousy, lest they should be moved from the faith of Christ, v. 3. He apprehended there was danger, and feared the consequence.

1. There was danger, by reason of his afflictions, v. 3. They might possibly stumble at them; also, those who made profession of the Gospel were persecuted, and without doubt these Thessalonians themselves were afflicted.

2. By reason of the tempter's subtlety and malice, v. 5. The devil is subtle and unwearied, seeks opportunity to beguile and destroy, and takes all advantages against us, both in prosperity and adversity; we have reason, therefore, to be jealous over ourselves and others, lest we be ensnared by him.

The consequence the apostle feared, was, lest his labor should be in vain. And thus it would have been, if the tempter had tempted them, and prevailed against them, to move them from the faith. Note, It is the devil's design, to hinder the good fruit and effect of the preaching of the Gospel. Note, also, Faithful ministers are much concerned about the success of their labors; and are loath to spend their strength, and pains, and time, for nought.

To prevent this danger, with its bad consequence, the apostle tells them what care he took in sending Timothy. (1.) To put them in mind of what he had told them before, concerning suffering tribulation, v. 4. It only came to pass according as God had determined; so that they should not think it strange, and, being fore-warned, should be fore-armed. Besides, it might prove a confirmation of their faith, when they perceived, that it only happened to them as was predicted before.

(2.) To know their faith: that so he might inform the apostles, whether they remained steadfast under all their sufferings, whether their faith failed or not. Because, if their faith did not fail, they would be able to stand their ground against the tempter and all his temptations: their faith would be a shield, to defend them against all the fiery darts of the wicked, Eph. 6:16.

V. 6—10. Here we have Paul's great satisfaction, on the return of Timothy with good tidings from the Thessalonians. In which we may observe,

I. The good report Timothy made of them, v. 6. Without question, he was a willing messenger of these good tidings. As to their faith, they were steadfast, not shaken in mind, nor turned aside from the profession of the Gospel. Their love also continued; their love to the Gospel, and the ministers of the Gospel; for they remembered the apostles, constantly, or always, and desired greatly to see them again, and receive some spiritual gift from them; and there was no love lost, for the apostle was as desirous to see them. It is happy where there is such mutual love between minister and people.

II. The great comfort and satisfaction the apostle had in this good report concerning them, v. 7, 8. The apostle thought this sufficient to balance all the troubles he met with. Thus, he was not only comforted, but greatly rejoiced also, v. 8. It would have been a killing thing to the apostles, if the professors of religion had been unsteady, or proved apostates, whereas nothing was more encouraging than their constancy.

III. The effects of this were thankfulness and prayer to God on their behalf.

1. Observe, How thankful the apostle was, v. 9. When we are most cheerful, we should be most thankful. Paul speaks, as if he could not tell how to express his thankfulness to God, or his joy and rejoicing for their sakes. His heart was enlarged with love to them, and with thanksgiving to God.

2. He prayed for them night and day, v. 10. evening and morning, or very frequently; in the midst of the business of the day, or slumber of the night. Thus we should pray always. And Paul's prayer was fervent prayer. He prayed exceedingly, and was earnest in his supplication. There was something still lacking in their faith; Paul desired that this might be perfected, and to see their face in order thereunto. Note, teach, instruct; as in v. 2, 3. and Ac. 15:20. where the two are likewise joined. It may, however, signify both teach and admonish; since the senses are cognate. The Thessalonians had, it seems, been wavering for want of instruction and admonition.

(1.) The best men have something wanting in their faith; in the matter of it, there being some mysteries or doctrines not suffi-

(3.) For yourselves know, &c.] 'I would here compare Job 5:7. and 2 Tim. 3:12. Commentators are not agreed, whether the words are to be referred to the apostles, or extended to the Thessalonians, or to all Christians. It should seem, that they are here meant only of the apostles and Thessalonians, but they are applicable to all Christians, according to the circumstances of the Gospel.' Id.—'The people of God have the same need of affliction as our bodies have of physic; that our trees have of pruning; that gold and silver have of the furnace; that liquors have of straining; that iron hath of the file; and that the child hath of the rod.' PHILIP HENRY.

(5.) 'Here we have a resumption of what was said v. 1, and 2. The best modern commentators have (after Grotius) taken tempted to signify, tempt with effect, successfully to tempt, citing Ga. 6:1. Ja. 1:13.' BL.

V. 6—10. During Timothy's absence, Paul departed from Athens to Corinth, whither Timothy and Silas also returned to him. The tidings which he received from Thessalonica, concerning the faith and love of the brethren in that city, and their affectionate remembrance of him, and earnest reciprocal desire to see him, were so entirely satisfactory, that they not only relieved his mind from anxiety, but abundantly compensated for all his other trials and distresses, and filled his benevolent heart with consolation. Nor could he find language sufficiently energetic to express the gratitude which he owed to God, and the thanks which he was excited to render Him, on their account, and for that overflowing joy, with which this inspired his heart before God.—'Estius observes, from the 9th verse, that both the apostles' joy, and their faith and constancy, were the gift of God; . . . for giving of thanks is not except for benefits received. He might also have observed, the excellent pattern the apostle here gives to all the bishops and pastors of the church, to be continually solicitous to know of the welfare of their flock, incessantly praying for it, blessing God daily for it, and looking upon it as the very felicity of their own lives.' Whitby.

(8.) Live.] 'It is well known that, in the sacred writings, life is put for happiness. Let it be the life of ministers, to see [the flocks of their charge] standing fast in the Lord.' DODDR.

1. Whom he prays to, namely, God and Christ ; to God only ; to God, even the Father and our Father ; and to Christ, even our Lord Jesus Christ. Therefore, Jesus Christ our Lord is God, even as God our Father is God. Prayer is to be offered to God as our Father. So Christ taught his disciples to pray ; and so the Spirit of adoption prompts them to pray, to cry Abba, Father. Prayer is not only to be offered in the name of PRACT. OBS. The love which zealous ministers of Christ bear to their people, and the longing desires after their salvation which they experience, and desire to cherish, cannot wholly be separated from painful solicitude on their account.—In the most peaceful times, every Christian should ‘count his cost,’ and remember that the followers of Christ are ‘appointed to suffer’ affliction : Luke 14:25-33. and ministers should not shun to forewarn their hearers, that they may be prepared for the cross, and meet every trial with watchfulness and prayer ; as in this manner they will best be preserved constant and ‘steadfast in the faith.’ So many indeed, who for a time made a creditable profession of the Gospel, have been overcome in the day of trial, that the experienced minis-

(11.) Now God Himself and our Father, &c. ‘God Himself, even our Father,’ &c. Doddr. and Bloomf.—Direct our way. ‘An elegant way of saying : “May God cause us to come unto you ;” this being a sort of prayer to the Father and the Son. Thus we have here an example of prayer addressed to Christ ; as 2 Thess. 2:16, 17. and 3:5. &c. Benson contends, the prayers are addressed to Christ as Mediator. But I apprehend this to be a mistake, and a most unwarrantable refinement. Prayer, offered up by all Christians, in all places, implies omniscience, omnipresence, and a searching of all hearts in the Being so addressed ; therefore, as this implies Deity, prayers must be offered to Him in that capacity : it were frivolous then to address Him as Mediator.’ Bl.

II. What he prays for, with respect to himself and his fellow-laborers, then on behalf of the Thessalonians.

1. He prays that they might have a prosperous journey to them by the will of God, v. 11. The taking of a journey, one would think, is a thing depending so much on a man’s own will, and lies so much in his own power, that Paul needed not by prayer to go to God about it. But the apostle knew that we depend on God in all our motions and actions, as well as for the continuance of life and being. Our Lord Jesus Christ, in a particular manner, directs the motion of his faithful ministers, those stars which He holds in his right hand. Let us acknowledge God in all our ways, and He will direct our paths.

2. He prays for the prosperity of the Thessalonians, whether he should have an opportunity of coming to them or not : two things he desired for them :

(1.) That they might increase and abound in love, v. 12. love to one another, and love to all men. Love is of God, and the fulfilling of the gospel as well as of the law. Timothy brought good tidings of their faith, and charity, and love, yet the apostle prays that that might increase and abound. Note, We have reason to desire to grow in every grace, have need of the Spirit’s influence in order to it, and the way to obtain that is prayer. And to our prayer we must add endeavor. To excite this in the Thessalonians, the apostle again mentions his love, his abounding love, toward them. The more we are beloved, the more affectionate we should be.

(2.) That they might be established unblamable in holiness, v. 13. This spiritual benefit is mentioned as an effect of increasing and abounding love : to the end that He, the Lord, may establish your hearts. Our desire should be, to have our hearts established in holiness before God, and be preserved safe to the coming of the Lord Jesus Christ ; and that we may be unblamable before God, even the Father, now, and be presented blameless before the throne of his glory, when the Lord Jesus will come with all his saints. Note, The Lord Jesus will certainly come, and come in his glory. When He comes, his saints will come with Him : and then the excellency, as well as the necessity of holiness, will appear ; because, without this, no hearts shall be established at that day, nor shall any one be unblamable, or avoid everlasting condemnation.

CHAP. IV. V. 1-8. Here we have,

I. An exhortation to abound more and more in holiness, v. 1, 2. In which, we may observe, ter will generally feel a degree of anxiety ; and he will not fail to caution the people to be on their guard, ‘lest by any means the tempter should tempt them, and his labor should be in vain.’ But in proportion to these solicitudes will be his rejoicing, when he finds that his beloved children ‘stand fast in the faith,’ and walk in love, and that their remembrance of him, and affection to him, correspond with his feelings towards them. . . .—May the Lord make all, who are called the ministers of Christ, partakers of this faithful, loving, diligent, and disinterested spirit ! May He prosper all their labors and ‘comfort their hearts’ with numbers of converts like these Thessalonians, and may He send forth numbers of such laborers into all the nations of the earth !

Perhaps both may be meant.’ Bl. Unblamable in holiness. ‘Hypocrites long for discoveries, more for the present comfort of them, and from a notion that they are a manifestation of the love of God, than for their sanctifying influence. But neither longings after discoveries, nor for the love of God ; nor desiring to be in heaven, or to die, is so distinguishing a mark of true piety, as earnest desires after holiness of heart and life.’

PRACT. OBS. V. 1—2. The ministers of Christ are bound to instruct their flocks, not only in the great doctrines and promises of the Gospel, but also in every part of their duty, that they may 'know how they ought to walk and to please God;' and Christians should as readily receive these instructions, as they do the most encouraging declarations of saving grace, and everlasting love. They should also take in good part, the earnest, repeated, affectionate, and authoritative exhortations of their pastors, when they 'beseech and charge' them to abound 'more and more' in every good work, according to 'the commandments given them in the name of the Lord Jesus.'—It is a deep disgrace to a rational creature to be a slave to his animal inclinations, and to act contrary to his better judgment, his true interest, or the welfare of his neighbor, for the sake of gratifications, of which the beasts are equally capable; but it is far more dishonorable for a spiritual man, a child of God, a member of Christ, a temple of the Holy Spirit, and an heir of heaven, to have his mind and body polluted, or unfitted for communion with God, by unlawful or inexpedient gratifications, or even by improper thoughts and desires. Yet in many cases this will not be avoided, without very strict watchfulness, and fervent, persevering prayer; without diligence in

V. 6—8. In like manner, the apostle warned the Thessalonians, not to overreach, or defraud, their brethren or neighbors in any transaction, either by taking advantage of their ignorance, necessity, or credulity; by exacting immoderate profits, or by any of those artifices and subterfuges, which selfishness devises to impose upon the unwary, without ruining men's credit, or incurring punishment by human laws. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Ex. 20:15. 1 Cor. 6:7—11.) Such dishonest persons might not be detected, or could not be called to account, by men; but the Lord would not suffer their hypocrisy and injustice to escape with impunity, being Himself 'the Avenger of all' clandestine frauds and impositions, as well as of open injustice and oppression. (Marg. Ref. s.)—The word 'uncleanness,' here used, has led many learned expositors to explain the sixth verse of clandestine adultery. But, if fornication were forbidden, adultery must be of course; for even the Gentiles condemned adultery, while they connived at fornication; nay, in fact, they sanctioned it, when committed only with slaves and courtezans; as it is evident from the writings of Demosthenes, Cicero, and others. This interpretation is far from the most obvious meaning of the passage; dishonesty is as inconsistent with Christianity as licentiousness, and, in this overreaching, fraudulent manner, perhaps even more common; and the word 'uncleanness,' may either be referred to what went before, or be understood as a general word for wickedness, all which is filthiness in the sight of God.—Notwithstanding the excellent state of the Thessalonian church, some might have found admission into it, who would speak of the doctrines and comforts of Christianity, and yet affect to despise and act like heathens; even as the Gentiles who know not God, v. 5. It is not so much to be wondered at, if Gentiles indulge their fleshly appetites and lusts; but Christians should not walk as unconverted Gentiles, in lasciviousness, lusts, excess of wine, revellings, banquetings, &c. 1 Pet. 4:3. for they who are in Christ have crucified the flesh, with its affections and lusts. 4. The sin of uncleanness, especially adultery, is a great injustice, that God will be the Avenger of; so we may understand those words, That no man go beyond or defraud his brother, v. 6. in any matter,—in this matter, namely, the sin of uncleanness. Some understand it, as a further warning and caution against injustice and oppression, all fraud and deceit in our dealings with men, which are certainly criminal and contrary to the Gospel. But the meaning may rather be, to show the injustice and wrong that in many cases are done by the sin of uncleanness. Not only are fornication and other acts of uncleanness sins against his own body who commits them, 1 Cor. 6:18. but sometimes they are very injurious, and, no less than defrauding, acts of injustice to others; particularly to them who are joined together in the marriage-covenant, and to their posterity. And as this sin is of such a heinous nature, so it follows, that God will be the Avenger of it. Heb. 13:4. Rom. 1:18. 5. The sin of uncleanness is contrary to the nature and design of our Christian calling, v. 7. The law of God forbids all impurity, and the gospel requires the greatest purity; it calls us from uncleanness unto holiness. 6. The contempt, therefore, of God's law and gospel, is the contempt of God Himself. He that despises, despises God, not man only. Some might possibly make light of the precepts of purity and holiness, because they heard them from men like themselves; but the apostle lets them know they were God's commands, and to violate them was no less than to despise God. He adds, God hath given Christians his Spirit; intimating, that all sorts of uncleanness especially grieve the Holy Spirit, and provoke Him to withdraw from us; and also the Holy Spirit is given unto us, to arm us against these sins, and to help us to mortify these deeds of the body, that we may live, Rom. 8:13.

V. 9—12. Here we have the great duty,

I. Of brotherly love. This he exhorts them to increase in yet more and more. The exhortation is introduced, not with a compliment, but with a commendation; because they were remarkable in the exercise of it, which made it less needful he should write to them about it, v. 9. Note, we should notice that in others which is good, to their praise, that by so doing we may lay engagements on them to abound therein more and more. Observe, the apostle commends in them, not so much their own virtue as God's grace; yet he notices the evidence they showed of grace, v. 9. All who are savingly taught of God, are taught to love one another. Note, also, The teaching of the Spirit exceeds the teaching of men; none can teach so effectually as He teaches; and men's teaching is vain and useless, unless God teach also. The Thessalonians gave good evidence of their being taught of God, v. 10. They not only loved those of their own city and society, or such as were near them, and just of their own sentiments; but their love was extensive. And a true Christian's is so to all the saints, though distant from him in place, and differing from him in some opinions or practices of less moment.

The exhortation itself is, to increase more and more in this great grace and duty of brotherly love, v. 10. Though these Thessalonians had in some sense no need of an exhortation to brotherly love, as if it were wholly wanting; yet they must be exhorted to pray and labor for more. None on this side heaven are perfect in love.

II. Of quietness and industry in their callings. Observe,

1. The apostle exhorts to these duties, v. 11. It is most desirable to have a calm and quiet temper, and to be of a peaceable and quiet behavior. This tends much to our own and others' happiness, and we should study how to be calm and quiet in our own minds, and toward others; or of a meek, mild, gentle, peaceable disposition, not given to strife, contention, or division.

every mean of grace, and a constant care to shun all temptations and occasions of evil. It is equally inconsistent with the character of a Christian, to 'go beyond or defraud his brother in any matter,' or to injure him in his property, reputation, or connexions. This too calls for the most diligent care, and the most impartial scrutiny into every part of our conduct; for self-love, and the customs of the world, and even former habits will otherwise lead us, without reflection, in some measure, to violate the golden rule of 'doing to others, as we would they should do unto us.' If a believer be led to commit offences of this kind, the Lord will surely chastise him, and thus bring him to repent and forsake them. . . . For the Lord has not called us into a state of peace with Him, that we may go on in the polluting practice of worldly lusts, but that, depending on his promises, 'we may cleanse ourselves from all filthiness of flesh and spirit, perfecting holiness in the fear of God.' (Note, 2 Cor. 7:1.) And let it be remembered, that he who despises such admonitions, does not so much despise him who enforces them from the pulpit or the press, as that God by whose Spirit they were originally dictated; yea, he as really despises God, as that man does, who contemns the message of salvation by the grace of the Gospel. (Note, 1 Sam. 12:9, 10.) Sc.

these practical exhortations, as inconsistent with the grace and liberty of the Gospel; but the apostle reminded them, that in so doing, they did not despise him, or Silvanus, or Timothy, but God Himself, who had given them his Holy Spirit, by whose inspiration these exhortations had been written.—'In this passage, Paul asserts his own inspiration, in the strongest terms, and with the greatest solemnity.' Mackn. Sc.

(6.) Go beyond and defraud, &c.] 'Injuring their neighbor's bed is no doubt included, but I see no reason for limiting the clause to such a sense.' Doddr.—Bloomfield expresses his surpris, that Doddr. should 'mite both senses,' and adds: 'Almost all the Greek fathers and commentators, and, of the Latin ones, Jerome and Hilary, and many modern ones, refer this to adultery; which was formerly my own opinion, and certainly is much countenanced by the context from v. 4. But when we turn to the phraseology, there appears little to countenance the interpretation. It is well remarked by Koppe, that the expression of all, [Avenger of all such, i. e. vices,] intimates, that the apostle was speaking of more than one vice, namely, fornication. And it is worthy of observation, that the apostle elsewhere, as in Eph. 5:5. and Heb. 3:4. associates the vices of fornication and covetousness, as being, we may conceive, the two especially prevalent.' Ed.

V. 11. Do your own business.] 'An exhortation peculiarly proper to the Thessalonians, as there seems to have been a meddling, pragmatical temper prevailing among some of them, 2 Thess. 3:11. which tended much to the reproach of their profession.' Doddr. See excellent considerations on this subject in Wayland's 'Limitation of Human Responsibility.' Ed.

12 That ye may walk honestly toward them that are without, and that ye may have lack of nothing.

13 But I would not have you to be ignorant, brethren, concerning them which are asleep, that ye sorrow not, even as others which have no hope.

14 For if we believe that Jesus died and rose again, even so they also which sleep in Jesus will God bring with him.

15 For this we say unto you by the word of the Lord, that we which are alive, and remain unto the coming of the Lord, shall not prevent them which are asleep.

16 For the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God: and the dead in Christ shall rise first:

17 Then we which are alive and remain, shall be caught up together with them in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air: and so shall we ever be with the Lord.

live comfortably, and have lack of nothing. They are not burdensome to their friends, nor scandalous to strangers. They earn their own bread, and have the greatest pleasure in so doing.

V. 13—18. In these words the apostle comforts the Thessalonians, who mourned for the death of their relations and friends that died in the Lord. His design is, to dissuade them from excessive grief, or inordinate sorrow, on that account. All grief for the death of friends is far from being unlawful; yet we must not be immoderate or excessive in our sorrows; because,

1. This looks as if, like the Gentiles, we had no hope, v. 13. whereas, we Christians have a most sure hope, the hope of eternal life after this, which God, who cannot lie, hath promised us; this hope should more than balance all our griefs on account of any crosses of the present time.

II. This is an effect of ignorance concerning those who are dead, v. 13. Some things we cannot but be ignorant of, concerning them; for the land they are removed to, is a land of darkness. Death is an unknown thing, and the state of the dead, or the state after death, we are much in the dark about; yet some things concerning them, especially, who die in the Lord, we need not, and ought not, to be ignorant of: and if those things are rightly understood and duly considered, they will be sufficient to allay our sorrow concerning them.

1. They sleep in Jesus, v. 13. 1 Cor. 15: 18. Death is but a sleep to them; their rest, an undisturbed rest. They are retired out of this troublesome world, to rest from all their labors and sorrows, and they sleep in Jesus, v. 14. in union with Him, and under his special care and protection; so that they are not lost, nor are they losers, but great gainers, by death, and their removal out of this world is into a better.

2. They shall be raised up from the dead, and awakened out of their sleep, for God will bring them with Him, v. 14. The doctrine of the resurrection, and the second coming of Christ, is a great antidote against the fear of death, and inordinate sorrow for the death of Christian friends; and this doctrine we have a full assurance of, because we believe that Jesus died and rose again, v. 14.

3. Their state and condition shall be glorious and happy at the second coming of Christ. The resurrection of the dead, and future state of blessedness, though a part of the creed of the O. T. saints, yet is much more clearly revealed in and by the Gospel, this Word of the Lord, v. 15.

(1.) The Lord Jesus will come from heaven, v. 16. will descend into this our air, v. 17. The appearance will be with pomp and power, with a shout,—as of a King, and a mighty Conqueror, with the voice of the archangel; an innumerable company of angels will attend Him; perhaps one, as general of those hosts of the Lord, shall give notice of his approach; and the glorious appearance of this great Redeemer and Judge shall be proclaimed and ushered in, by the trump of God. For the trumpet shall sound, and that will wake them that sleep in the dust of the earth, and shall summon all the world to appear. For,

(2.) The dead shall be raised, The dead in Christ first, v. 16. so those who shall then be found alive, shall not prevent them that are asleep, v. 15. The first carc of the Redeemer in that day, will be about his dead saints; He will raise them before the great change passes on them that shall be found alive; so that those who did not sleep in death, will have no greater privilege or joy at that day than those who fell asleep in Jesus.

(3.) They that shall be found alive, will then be changed. They shall be caught up together with them in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air, v. 17. At, or immediately before, this rapture into the clouds, those who are alive will undergo a mighty change, that will be equivalent to dying. This change is so mysterious, that we cannot comprehend it, 1 Cor. 15: 51. Only we know, in the general, this mortal must put on immortality; and these bodies be made fit to inherit the kingdom of God, which flesh and blood, in its present state, are not capable of. This change will be in a moment, 1 Cor. 15: 52. in the very instant, or not long after the raising up of them that sleep in Jesus. And those who are raised, and thus changed, shall meet together in the clouds, and there meet with their Lord, to congratulate Him on his coming, to receive the crown of glory He will then bestow on them, and to be assessors with Him in judgment, approving and applauding the sentence He will then pass on the prince of the power of the air, and all the wicked, who shall be doomed to destruction with the devil and his angels.

(4.) Here is the bliss of the saints at that day; they shall be ever with the Lord, v. 17. It will be some part of their felicity, that they all shall meet together, and remain together for ever: but the principal happiness of heaven is this, to be with the Lord, to see Him, live with Him, and enjoy Him, for ever. This should comfort the saints on the death of their pious friends: that, although death has made a separation, yet

Satan is very busy to disquiet us; and we have that in our own hearts, that disposes us to be unquiet; therefore, let us study to be quiet. It follows, Do your own business; when we go beyond that, we expose ourselves to great inquietude. Those who meddle in other men's matters, generally have but little quiet in their own minds, and cause great disturbances among their neighbors; at least, they seldom mind the other exhortation, to be diligent in their own calling, to work with their own hands: yet this the apostle commanded them, and it is required of us also. Christianity does not discharge us from the work and duty of our particular callings, but teaches us to be diligent therein.

2. The exhortation is enforced with a double argument: namely, (1.) So we shall live creditably, walking honestly, or decently, toward them that are without, v. 12. a great ornament to a religion. (2.) We shall live comfortably, and lack nothing, v. 12. People often by their slothfulness reduce themselves to great straits, when such as are diligent in their own business,

V. 13—18. (Notes, 1 Cor. 15:20—28, 50—54.) Perhaps the apostle heard, that some of the Thessalonian believers had lately died, or suffered martyrdom, and that their relatives and brethren were greatly dejected about them, not duly attending to the consolations suggested by the Gospel.—Some suppose, that the apostle expected to live till the day of judgment, because he spoke in the first person plural, concerning those who should be alive at that time; but he elsewhere spoke of being absent from the body, and of being 'raised up with Jesus.' 2 Cor. 4:14. 5:8. He was one, who remained alive after others had been removed; his faith and hope annihilated, as it were, the intervening space; his love made him consider the cause of the whole multitude as his own, and it is evident that he did not speak it personally of himself; for when the Thessalonians imagined that 'the day of judgment was at hand,' he diligently set himself to rectify that mistake. 2 Thes. 2:1, 2. As the apostle expressly declares, that he spake 'by the word of the Lord,' or by divine inspiration, the consequences of allowing him to be mistaken in what he said, should very seriously be considered. Similar expressions may be found in other parts of Scripture. Ps. 66:6. 81:5. Hos. 12:4. Some suppose, that Christ Himself was meant by 'the archangel,' being 'the ruler of all angels,' but as we must understand the words 'the Lord,' of Him, it seems not natural to explain another term in the same sentence of Him likewise; and many intimations are given of different ranks and orders among the holy angels. (Comp. 2 Pet. 2:11. Jude 9.—Notes, Eph. 1:15—23, v. 21. 3:9—12. 1 Pet. 3:21, 22, v. 21. Jude 9:10.)—The resurrection of believers is exclusively meant, as every attentive reader must perceive; therefore all speculations concerning the bodies with which the wicked shall arise, (a matter on which the Scripture observes a profound silence,) must be wholly foreign to the subject. (Notes, Eph. 1:21. 3:9. 1 Pet. 3:22.) The notions which prevailed among the Gentiles, left them totally destitute of a firm, well-grounded, and animating hope of again meeting their deceased friends, in a state of happiness; and so do the notions on these subjects of merely nominal Christians.—Some expositors have said, that the expression 'So shall we ever be with the Lord,' implies that the souls of believers are not previously, at least not permanently, with Him; but has not the apostle expressly assured us of the contrary? 2 Cor. 5:8. Phil. 1:23, 24. (15) By the word of the Lord.] 1 Kings 13:1.—In the air.] See on Eph. 2:2.—Christ shall 'come in the clouds'; 'the air' here means the same, and, however understood, has no reference to the reality of that kingdom, which his saints shall then inherit. SCOTT.

(15.) The word of the Lord.] 'Express word of the Lord, on the authority of an immediate revelation from Christ Himself.' DODDR.—Remain alive.] 'This has been understood by many, as an intimation, that the apostle expected to be found alive at the day of judgment; and, on that interpretation, some have urged it as an instance of his entertaining, at least for a time, mistaken notions on that head, as if the day of the Lord were nearly approaching. But this is directly contrary to his own explication of the matter, 2 Thes. 2:1, &c. as well as other passages, in which he expresses his expectation of death. Comp. Phil. 1:20. and 1 Cor. 6:14. 2 Cor. 4:14. 2 Tim. 4:6. Others have pleaded this passage in favor of the doctrine of the resurrection of some of the most eminent saints, before the main body of believers, to share with Christ in the glories and felicities of his personal reign on earth. But to me it seems most natural to suppose, Paul here speaks as one of the Christian body, though he was not one of that particular number, concerning whom he directly asserts what is here said.' DODDR.

(16.) The dead in Christ shall rise first.] 'It has generally been inferred hence, that good men shall rise before the wicked, and 1 Cor. 15:23. seems to favor it. But this text only asserts their rising before the saints, who are found alive shall be changed.' DODDR.—'As the best commentators are agreed, nothing is either here, or at 1 Cor. 15. said of the wicked, dead or living; as the description of their case could have been no consolation to Christians under the loss of friends.' BLOOMF.

(17.) Clouds.] 'Clouds sometimes signify great multitudes of people. See Heb. 12:1. According to this sense, the meaning will be, "caught up in great numbers at once."' HEWLETT.

5 Ye are all the children of light, and the children of the day: we are not of the night, nor of darkness.

7 For they that sleep, sleep in the night; and they that be drunken, are drunken in the night.

their souls and bodies will meet again; we, and they, with all the saints, shall meet our Lord, and be with Him for ever. The apostle would have us comfort one another with these words, v. 18. We should endeavor to support one another in times of sorrow, by serious consideration and discourse on the many good lessons to be learned from the doctrine of the resurrection of the dead, the second coming of Christ, and the glory of the saints in that day.

CHAP. V. V. 1-5. In these words, observe,

PRACT. OBS. V. 9-18. All true believers are 'taught of God to love one another,' as brethren in Christ, and from love to his name: 1 Jn. 2:7-11. 3:13-15, 18-24. 4:7, 8. 5:1-3. by practice they acquire habits of kindness, compassion, forbearance, and forgiveness, and they feel an expansive benevolence to all mankind; yet, it is very proper to exhort them to 'increase' in these things 'more and more.'—Christianity does not forbid, grace does not extinguish, our natural affections; but only teaches us to regulate and moderate them. Indeed, inconsolable sorrow, however admired by the world, is rebellion against the appointment of God, and the offspring of unbelief; grief should no more be indulged and cherished, than our anger or other passions. Nor shall such of us, as endure the stroke of death, be eventually less favored and NOTES. CHAP. V. V. 1-3. As the hour of death is the same to each person, which judgment will be to mankind in general, so the same remarks and illustrations equally answer to both cases; and when sinners are flattering themselves with the hope of 'peace and safety,' then sudden destruction will come upon them. As the woman with child, often, when she is thinking of something else, is suddenly seized with her travailing pangs, which will unavoidably increase upon her; so ungodly men have abundant reason to look forward with terror to death and judgment; yet they are employed and amused by so many other matters, that they are suddenly surprised with those solemn events, when they least expect them, and this first astonishment will be followed with increasing misery, from which it will be impossible for them ever to escape. The former ch. ends with a special revelation, concerning the Lord's coming to judgment; and the beginning of this ought certainly to be interpreted of the same grand events. SCOTT.

(1.) 'As the apostle had treated of the second coming of Christ, of the resurrection of the pious dead, of the transformation of the living, and of their being all made happy with Christ; some might inquire, when shall these things be? and what shall be the sign? He, therefore, v. 1-11. endeavors to divert their minds from such an improper inquiry, [443] was useless to inquire about the particular time of Christ's coming, v. 1. The thing is certain, Christ will come, and a certain time is appointed for his coming; but he need not write about that, and therefore had no revelation about it; nor should they or we inquire into this secret, which the Father has reserved in his own power. Of that day and hour knoweth no man. There are times and seasons for us to do our work in; these it is our duty and interest to know and observe; but the time and season when we must give up our account, we know not, nor is it needful we should.

2. He tells them the coming of Christ would be sudden, and a great surprise to most men, v. 2. And this is what they knew perfectly, or might know, because our Lord Himself had so said, Mat. 24:44. So Mark 13:35, 36. And no doubt the apostle had told them, as of the coming of Christ, so also of his coming suddenly, which is the meaning of his coming as a thief in the night, Rev. 16:15. The knowledge of this will be more useful than to know the exact time, because this should awaken us to stand on our watch, that we may be ready whenever He cometh.

3. He tells them how terrible Christ's coming would be to the ungodly, v. 3. The righteous God will bring ruin on his, and his people's enemies; and this, their destruction, as it will be total and final, so it will be sudden, and unavoidable; there will be no means possible for them to avoid the terror or the punishment of that day,—no shelter from the storm, or shadow from the burning heat that shall consume the wicked.

4. He tells them how comfortable this day will be to the righteous, v. 4, 5. They are not in darkness; but are the children of the light, &c. This was the happy condition of the Thessalonians, and is of all true Christians. They were not in a state of sin and ignorance, as the heathen world. They were sometime darkness, but were made light in the Lord. And this was their great advantage, that, on this account, that day should not overtake them as a thief, v. 4. They had fair warning and sufficient helps to provide against that day, and might hope to stand with comfort and confidence before the Son of man. This would be a time of refreshing to them, from the presence of the Lord, who, to them that look for Him, will appear without sin unto their salvation, and will come to them as a friend in the day, not as a thief in the night.

V. 6-10. On what had been said, the apostle grounds seasonable exhortations to several needful duties.

happy than those, who will be 'found alive at the coming of the Lord,' that great event, to which we should continually look forward. For when the incarnate Lord of all worlds shall appear, in 'his own glory, and in that of the Father, with all his holy angels,' at his summons, attended 'with the voice of the archangel, and the trump of God,' 'the dead in Christ shall rise first,' and, being joined by their brethren then living on the earth, 'they shall meet their Lord in the air,' with unutterable joy, and be for ever with Him in the regions of perfect felicity. May we, by realizing faith and hope, continually anticipate that solemn but joyful period, and comfort ourselves and each other with these words of truth and love! P. O. 1 Cor. 15:41-58. SCOTT.

I. To watchfulness and sobriety, v. 6. duties distinct, yet mutually befriending one another. For while we are compassed about with so many temptations to intemperance and excess, we shall not keep sober, unless we be on our guard; and unless we keep sober, we shall not long watch. The generality of men are too careless of their duty, and regardless of their spiritual enemies. Either they do not consider the things of another world at all, because they are asleep; or they do not consider them aright, because they dream. But let us watch, and act like men that are awake, and that stand on their guard.

Let us also be sober, or temperate and moderate. Sobriety is usually opposed to excess in meats and drinks, and here, particularly, it is opposed to drunkenness; but it also extends to all other temporal things. Thus our Savior warned his disciples, Luke 21:34. Our moderation, then, as to all temporal things, should be known to all men, because the Lord is at hand.

Beside this, watchfulness and sobriety are most suitable to the character and privilege of Christians, as being children of the day, v. 7. What! shall Christians, who have the light of the blessed Gospel shining in their faces, be careless about their souls, and unmindful of another world? They who have so many eyes on them, should conduct themselves with peculiar propriety.

II. To be well armed, as well as watchful: to put on the whole armor of God. And this is necessary, in order to such sobriety as becomes us, and will be a preparation for the day of the Lord; because our spiritual enemies are many, mighty, and malicious; draw many to their interest, and keep them in it, by making them careless, secure, and presumptuous, by making them drunk; drunk with pride and passion, and giddy with self-conceit; drunk with the gratifications of sense: so that we have need to arm ourselves against their attempts, by putting on the spiritual breast-plate, to keep the heart, and the spiritual helmet, to secure the head; and this spiritual armor consists of the three great graces of Christians, faith, love, and hope, v. 8. Faith will keep us watchful and sober. If we believe the eye of God is always upon us, that we have spiritual enemies to grapple with, that there is a world of spirits to prepare for, we shall see reason to watch and be sober. Love, also, will be our defence. True and fervent love to God, and the things of God, will keep us watchful and sober, and hinder our apostasy in times of trouble and temptation. And we must make salvation our hope, for

V. 4-11. The apostle judged it needful to give these warnings, for the benefit of those who were negligent in preparing for 'the coming of the Lord;' yet he was well satisfied as to the Christians at Thessalonica in general. SCOTT.

(6.) 'Watching is a point of much importance, and is frequently in Scripture joined with prayer. this good hope, through grace, of eternal life, will be as a helmet to defend the head, and hinder our being intoxicated with the pleasures of sin, which are but for a season.

Having mentioned salvation and the hope of it, the apostle shows what grounds and reasons Christians have, to hope for this salvation ; as to which, observe, he says nothing of their meriting it. But our hopes are to be grounded, 1. On God's appointment, v. 9. if we would trace our salvation to the first cause, that is God's appointment. And the sureness and firmness of the divine appointment are the great support and encouragement of our hope. Were we to obtain salvation by our own merit or power, we could have but little or no hope of it : but seeing we are to obtain it by virtue of God's appointment, which, we are sure, cannot be shaken, on that we build unshaken hope, especially when we consider, 2. Christ's merit and grace, and that salvation is by our Lord Jesus Christ, who died for us. Our salvation, therefore, is owing to, and our hopes of it grounded on, Christ's atonement, as well as God's appointment: and as we should think on God's gracious design and purpose, so also on Christ's death and sufferings, for this end, that whether we wake or sleep, whether we live or die, for death is but a sleep to believers, (as the apostle had before intimated,) we should live together with Christ, live in union and in glory with Him for ever. And, as the salvation Christians hope for, is, to be for ever with the Lord, so one foundation of their hope is, their union with Him.

V. 11—15. In these words the apostle exhorts to several duties.

I. Toward those who were nearly related one to another.

1. They must comfort or exhort themselves and one another ; for the original word may be rendered both these ways. And the way to have comfort ourselves, or to administer comfort to others, is, by compliance with the exhortation of the Word. Note, We should not only be careful about our own comfort and welfare, but to promote the comfort and welfare of others also.

2. They must edify one another, by following after those things whereby one may edify another, Rom. 14:19. We should, every one of us, study what is for the edification of those with whom we converse ; please all men for their real profit, communicate our knowledge and experiences one to another, join in prayer and praise one with another, and set a good example one before another : it is the duty of those especially who live in the same vicinity and family, thus to comfort and edify one another ; and this is the best neighborhood, the best means to answer the end of society. This the Thessalonians did, (which also ye do,) and this is what they are exhorted to continue and increase in doing. Note, Those who do good, need further exhortations to do more good.

II. He shows them their duty toward their ministers, v. 12, 13. Though the apostle himself was driven from them, yet they had others who labored among them, and to whom they owed these duties. The apostle here exhorts them to observe,

1. How the ministers of the Gospel are described by the work of their office. Ministers are those who must labor among their people, labor with diligence, and unto weariness, so the original imports ; labor in the Word and doctrine, 1 Tim. 5:17. labor with their people, to instruct, comfort, and edify them. Ministers are to rule their people, also, so the word is rendered, 1 Tim. 5:17. not with rigor, but with love. They are over the people in the Lord, to distinguish them from civil magistrates, and to denote, also, that they are but ministers under Christ, appointed by Him, and must rule the people by Christ's laws, and not by laws of their own. This may also intimate the end of their office and all their labor ; namely, the service and honor of the Lord. They must also admonish the people, and that not only publicly, but privately, as there may be occasion. They must instruct them to do well, and should reprove them when they do ill.

2. What the duty of the people is toward their ministers. They must know them. As the shepherd should know his flock, so the sheep must know their shepherd. They must know him for their pastor, regard his teaching, ruling, and admonitions. They must esteem their ministers highly in love ; greatly value the office of the ministry, and show all proper esteem and affection for the persons of their ministers, and this for their work's sake, because their business is to promote the honor of Christ, and the welfare of men's souls. Note, The work of the ministry is so far from being a disgrace to them who on other accounts deserve esteem, that it puts an honor on them who are faithful and diligent, which otherwise they could lay no claim to ; and will procure them that esteem and love among good people, which otherwise they could not expect.

III. He gives divers other exhortations touching the duty Christians owe to one another.

1. To be at peace among themselves, v. 13. Some understand this (so some copies) as referring to the people's duty to their ministers, to live peaceably with them ; and ministers and people should avoid everything that tends to alienate their affections one from another. And the people should be at peace among themselves, doing all they can to hinder any differences from rising or continuing among them, and using all proper means to preserve peace and harmony.

2. To warn the unruly, v. 14. There will be in all societies some who walk disorderly, who go out of their rank and station : and it is not only the duty of ministers, but of private Christians also, to warn and admonish them. Such should be put in mind of what they should do, and be reprov'd for doing otherwise.

3. To comfort the feeble-minded, v. 14. By these, are intended the timorous and faint-hearted, or such as are dejected and of a sorrowful spirit : we should not despise them, but comfort them ; and who knows what good a kind and comfortable word may do them ?

4. To support the weak, v. 14. It is the grace of God, indeed, that must strengthen and support such ; but we should tell them of that grace, and endeavor to minister of that grace to them.

5. To be patient towards all men, v. 14. We must bear and forbear. We must be long-suffering, and suppress our anger, if it begins to rise on the apprehension of affronts or injuries ; at least, we must not fail to moderate our anger, and this duty must be exercised towards all men, good and bad, high and low.

6. Not to render evil for evil to any man, v. 15. This we must look to, and be very careful about, that is, we must by all means forbear to avenge ourselves. If others injure us, that will not justify us in doing the same to them. It becomes us to forgive, as those that are, and hope to be forgiven of God.

7. Ever to follow that which is good, v. 15. We must always endeavor to be beneficent, and instrumental to promote the welfare of others, both among ourselves, (in the first place to them that are of the household of PRACT. OBS. V. 1—11. Curious inquiries about 'times and seasons,' are commonly unprofitable and vain. 'Behold, now is the accepted time ; behold, now is the day of salvation ;' the present time we ought to redeem, the present season of obtaining peace with God by faith in Christ, and of doing his will, we ought to embrace ; and then we shall be safe and happy at all events. No man is sure that death and judgment will not surprise him, unless he continually expect and prepare for those approaching events. 'Numbers, at this very hour, are speaking peace and safety to themselves, over whose heads instantaneous destruction is hovering.' Doddr. And how dreadful will be the astonishment and consternation of the scornful infidel, the careless profligate, the proud Pharisee, or the hardened hypocrite, when sudden destruction shall thus seize on him, and no possible method of escape can be found ! As yet we are in the land of light, of hope, of prayer, of forgiveness, though whole frame of a heavenly mind. Keep thy heart. Turn not thine eye away ; let it be constantly fixed on that moving thing within thee. Have the arm of thy resolution near thee, to seize it the moment it attempts to fly. If you were set to keep a bird, unfastened upon the palm of your hand, you would know what is meant by keeping the heart with all diligence.

V. 12—15. It is evident that the apostle, either personally, or by Timothy, Titus, and others of his fellow-laborers, used to 'ordain elders in every city ;' Acts 14:21—23, 20:17—28, 1 Tim. 5:21, 22, 2 Tim. 2:1, 2. Ti. 1:5—9. and, though no mention is made of this, either in the brief history of his labors at Thessalonica, or in the opening of the epistle, there can be no reasonable doubt, that he had appointed elders over the church in that city also. (12.) Are over you.] 'Preside over, or moderate in, your assemblies ; so the word may signify. Many were endowed with miraculous gifts in this church, and there might have been danger of irregularities, as in the church at Corinth, if some had not been appointed to preside over the rest in the time of public exercises. It is evident, ministers, by virtue of their general office, may be said to preside over Christian assemblies, even though there were no such need of their interposition to we might justly, long before this, have been 'cast into outer darkness.' Nor are we enveloped with pagan, Mohammedan, or anti-Christian darkness and delusion ; we have the light of the Gospel, and the Holy Scriptures afforded us, and we have been led to pay some attention to them. If then we be yet so in darkness, 'that the day of the Lord would overtake us as a thief,' our guilt must be peculiarly aggravated. Let us, therefore, seriously inquire, whether we really be 'the children of the light, and of the day,' by divine illumination, and by an obedient faith. Let us seek to render this evident, as well as to act consistently with our profession. Thus our evidence will continually increase, that 'God hath not appointed us to wrath, but to obtain salvation by the Lord Jesus ;' and that 'whether we wake or sleep, we shall' surely 'live together with Him.' 2 Cor. 5:1—8.

faith,) and then, as we have opportunity, unto all men, Gal. 6:10.

V. 16—22. Here we have divers short exhortations.

1. Rejoice evermore, v. 16. This must be understood of spiritual joy: for we must rejoice in creature-comforts as if we rejoiced not, and must not expect to live many years, to rejoice in them; but if we rejoice in God, we may do that evermore. If we are sorrowful on any worldly account, yet still we may always rejoice, 2 Cor. 6:10. Note, A religious life is a pleasant life, a life of constant joy.

2. Pray without ceasing, v. 17. This is in order to rejoicing evermore. We should rejoice more, if we prayed more. We should keep up stated times for prayer, and continue instant in it. We should pray always, and not faint, till we come to that world where PRACT. OBS. V. 12—22. Faithful pastors should be carefully distinguished from slothful, ambitious, or mercenary men, who have the name and garb of ministers; and they are highly culpable, who despise the admonitions, reject the authority, and refuse respect and affection to the persons, of faithful ministers; but such as expect the reputation, esteem, authority, or emolument, of the ministry, without a diligent attention to its various and laborious duties, are even still more criminal. Outward respect may indeed be paid them; but it is impossible for intelligent Christians 'to esteem them very highly in love for their work's sake;' though they will compassionately mourn over and pray moderate or direct the exercise of the gifts of those, who were officiating in public. DODDR.

V. 16—22. Many have explained 'quenching the Spirit,' of restraining the exercise of spiritual gifts, in themselves or others; but doubtless it relates principally to the sanctifying and comforting influences of the Holy Spirit, in the hearts of believers, not excluding his strivings and convictions in the hearts and consciences of sinners. These sacred influences tend to kindle a flame of sacred love in the soul; but they may be quenched, by evil tempers, by procrastination, by worldly cares, by inexpedient indulgences, by trifling company, or by negligence. Thus convictions are often finally extinguished, and the Holy Spirit will 'no more strive with me;' Gen. 6:3. and thus believers often greatly damp the holy ardor of their souls, mar their own comfort, and impede their growth in grace, by not giving themselves up without delay to those spiritual affections, which are excited by the Holy Spirit, and by 'quenching' them in the manner before-mentioned; and this is the direct opposite to 'quenching the fiery darts of the wicked one.'—(19) The Spirit.] 'That is, the afflatus and light of God shining into our minds. But, some one will say, if that he never extinguished in the elect, this is commanded in vain. This, however, I strenuously deny. Nay, for this reason it is not extinguished in the elect, because they cherish it; and they are induced by these exhortations to cherish it. For He, who hath determined never wholly to extinguish his Spirit in the elect, hath also made known by what means He will cherish it, namely, by the progress of his people in piety.' Beza.—(20) Prophesyings.] Those instructions, and intimations of the divine will, which were given by the prophets, either in explaining the Scriptures, or from immediate suggestions of the Spirit. (M. R. c.—Notes, 1 Cor. 14.) The exhortation may also fairly include the more ordinary preaching of God's Word.—Yet, as there would be many false teachers, and erroneous doctrines propagated by them, they must be careful to 'prove,' or try, both the teachers and their instructions, by the Word of God, that they might reject what was spurious, and adhere to what was good and excellent.—No doubt, cases often arise, in which we are required to do those things, that appear evil to misinformed, prejudiced, and unreasonable men, in order to obey the commands of God, and to follow the clear dictates of our own consciences. But these are exceptions to the general rule, which could not be particularized in so compendious an exhortation: and they seem to be the only exceptions. For it is better to avoid what appears evil to others, though lawful in itself, if it can be done with a safe conscience, than, by an uncharitable exercise of our Christian liberty, to cause our weak brother to offend, or to prejudice others against the Gospel.—(21) Prove, &c.] 'The apostle does not here bid the guides of the church try all things, and the people hold fast that which they delivered to them, but gives an injunction common to all Christians, having "their senses exercised to discern good and evil;" to all, who are obliged "to hold fast that which is good," and not to believe false prophets; which is a strong argument for the perspicuity and sufficiency of Holy Scripture for this work, and against the necessity of a living judge. For he that must "try all things," must also try the doctrine of this living judge, and therefore till he hath made this trial, must not admit his doctrine as an article of prayer shall be swallowed up in praise. The meaning is not, that men should do nothing but pray, but that nothing else we do should hinder prayer in its proper season. Prayer will help forward, and not hinder, all other lawful business, and every good work.

3. In everything give thanks, v. 18. If we pray without ceasing, we shall not want matter for thanksgiving, in everything. We should be thankful in every condition; it is never so bad with us, but it might be worse: the apostle says, This is the will of God in Christ Jesus concerning us, that we give thanks, seeing God is reconciled to us in Christ Jesus; in Him, through Him, and for his sake, He allows us to rejoice evermore, and appoints us in everything to give thanks. It is pleasing to God.

4. Quench not the Spirit, v. 19. This Spirit of grace and supplication helpeth our infirmities, and assisteth us in our prayer and thanksgivings. Christians are said to be baptized with the Holy Ghost, and with fire. He worketh as fire, by enlightening, enlivening, and purifying the souls of men. We must be careful not to quench this holy fire. As fire is put out by withdrawing fuel, so we quench the Spirit, if we do not stir up all within us, to comply with the motions of the good Spirit; and as fire is quenched by pouring water, or putting a great quantity of dirt on it, so we must be careful not to quench the Holy Spirit, by indulging carnal lusts and affections, or minding only earthly things.

5. Despise not prophesyings, v. 20. By for them.—Our love of 'peace among ourselves,' should not induce us to confine at sin; but we must 'warn,' reprove, and censure 'the unruly,' as well as tenderly soothe and 'comfort the feeble-minded, and support the weak' in body or soul.—Even when we are injured in the most atrocious manner, we must 'see to it, that' we on no account 'render evil for evil to any man;' but must learn 'to follow,' with persevering constancy, 'that which is good' and friendly, 'both among ourselves, and to all men;' as knowing what patience and mercy we have experienced, and still continually need from God. SCOTT.

Christian faith. For these words plainly teach, that what we must hold fast must first be tried. Hearers, says Basil, who are instructed in the Scriptures, ought to try the things spoken by their teachers; . . . and receive those doctrines which are consonant, and reject those things which are alien from the Holy Scriptures. WHITBY. SCOTT.

(16.) 'If our religion does not make us happy, how do we do our duty? We are commanded to rejoice. It is a part of practical Christianity to be happy. It belongs to a doctrine of the Word. Moreover, how are we to have satisfactory evidence, that we possess true religion, if we have not joy in it? Suppose we had not love, would we be Christians then? No, certainly; for without charity a man is nothing. But why can we not be Christians without love? Because it is the fruit of the Spirit. If love is the first named of the nine, joy is the second. "The fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, &c." Gal. 5:22 and 23. And these are not said to be the fruits;—the plural is not used;—they are not distinct productions;—they are all one cluster,—"the fruit of the Spirit." While there are many things that may and do diminish our joy, they do not annihilate it. There was much to interfere in the case of those to whom Peter wrote. They were in "heaviness through manifold temptations;" nevertheless they rejoiced greatly.' Rev. Dr. NEVINS.—'There is a class of Christians who appear taciturn, unsocial, and even sad. This is inconsistent with the spirit of religion. Christians ought to appear cheerful and happy; to appear to receive with pleasure and gratitude all the lawful enjoyments bestowed by their heavenly Father. A gloomy deportment does not honor religion, but causes those whom we wish to win to the ways of pleasantness and peace, to feel, that religion is a melancholy, unsocial, and forbidding subject. All professors of religion should endeavor to have such views of God, his love, providence, and care, and should so live, as to be cheerful and happy, and appear so. But trifling and levity is quite as inconsistent and injurious as the former. Let the Christian distinguish between cheerfulness and levity.'

Rev. Dr. BEECHER.

(17.) Without ceasing.] 'Incessantly, i. e. at all proper seasons. So the burnt-offering presented every morning and evening is called perpetual. Lev. 6:20. Comp. Luke 24:53. with Acts 2:46, 47. also John 18:20.' DODDR.—'Prayer is living with God; and, if founded on right principles of religion, puts us on searching the heart, leads us to the knowledge of our wants and weakness, and fixes us in dependence on God. Nothing is more easy, as a bare duty or lip service, and nothing more difficult than the performance of it in truth and sincerity.' ADAMS.—'If persons are much engaged in social religion, and but little in that of the closet; and but little moved when alone with God, there is reason to doubt the reality of their religion.' ENWARDS.—'Does any one, not in the habitual and daily practice of secret devotion, pretend to be a Christian? It is but pretence. He may believe the creed of the Christian, he certainly does not pursue the practice, nor possess the spirit of the Christian. Breathing is essential to living, and prayer is the Christian's vital breath. Does he walk with God who never converses with Him? Oh, how an hour in the morning, spent with God, prepares us pleasantly and profitably to pass the other hours of the day with men, and at night, what so composing as communion with God! Has any one become remiss in heart, and integrity of life, will dispose men to receive the truth in the love of it. We should, therefore, abstain from evil, and all appearances of evil: he, who, shy of the appearances, shuns not the occasions of sin, and who avoids not the temptations and approaches to sin, will not long abstain from the actual commission of sin.

PRACT. OBS. V. 23—28. The exhortations above given, show us what we ought to be and to do; but we must remember, that our hearts are naturally opposite to them; nor can any inward and abiding change be wrought in us, save by a divine power. As, therefore, ministers should pray for their people, as well as exhort them, every individual should turn the precepts and promises of God into prayers, for himself and his brethren; and, while he uses every other mean of grace, and vigilantly shuns all hindrances and temptation, he should still beseech 'the God of peace Himself, to sanctify him wholly, and that his spirit, and soul, and body, (22.) 'The very doubtfulness (of propriety) which rests upon so many practical questions of every day occurrence, is an admirable arrangement in the divine economy. It is evidently designed to try men's hearts, and to keep their consciences tender and awake. Could we know precisely, and in all cases, where the line is, there would be little need of caution. It is the danger of treading upon forbidden ground, ere we are aware of it, that makes circumspection so necessary; and who can estimate the value of this habit, in forming a truly virtuous character? Our safety lies in standing off wide from the rocks and quicksands, or in plainer language, in abstaining from all appearance of evil. The text includes two ideas. 1. It requires every person most scrupulously to avoid whatever appears to him sinful, or even of doubtful character. 2. As far as he can to shun whatever may carry the appearance of sin to others, even where the motive is right, and the action, in itself considered, would be entirely unexceptionable.' Rev. Dr. HUMPHREY.

V. 23—28. The apostle subjoined to his exhortations fervent prayers to God, knowing that his efficacious grace alone could produce 'the will and power' to do all the things to which he exhorted them. He besought the 'very God of peace,' 'as, in Christ, reconciling the world unto Himself,' and as actually reconciled to believers, and the Author of all their inward and outward peace; that He would sanctify them wholly, and in respect of their entire nature, as consisting of a rational and immortal soul, an animal life, with its various sensitive appetites, and a material body; that every sense, member, organ, and faculty, might be completely purified, and devoted to the service of God; and that thus they might be preserved blameless till the coming of Christ. (M. R. g—i. —Note, 3:11—13.)—He was confident that the church at Thessalonica consisted in general of true believers; and, as he was assured of the Lord's faithfulness to his promises, and covenant engagements to his people, whom He had called by his grace; so he was satisfied that He would fully grant his prayer for them. (M. R. k—n.—Notes, 1 Cor. 1:4—9. 10:13—17. Phil. 1:3—8.)—Having, therefore, desired them also to pray for him, and solemnly charged them, by the authority of the Lord Jesus, to let this epistle be read to all the holy brethren, the saints that formed their church, he concluded with his usual salutations and benedictions. (M. R. o—t.)—(23) The very God of peace.] Notes, 2 Cor.

The very God of peace. He is the God of grace, from whom, as the Author, those things would best be obtained, which he prays for. What he prays for, is, their sanctification, that God would sanctify them wholly: and their preservation, that they might be preserved blameless: we should pray for, and press toward, complete sanctification. Where the good work of grace is begun, it shall be carried on, be protected and preserved; and all those who are sanctified in Christ Jesus, shall be preserved to the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ.

2. His comfortable assurance that God would hear his prayer, v. 24. The kindness and love of God had appeared to them in calling them to the knowledge of his truth, and the faithfulness of God was their security, that they should persevere to the end; therefore, the apostle assures them, God would do what He desired, would effect what He had promised, would accomplish all the good pleasure of his goodness toward them. Note, Our fidelity to God depends on his faithfulness to us.

3. His request of their prayers, v. 25. We should pray for one another; and brethren should thus express brotherly love. Ministers need their people's prayers; and the more people pray for their ministers, the more good may ministers have from God, and the people receive by their ministry.

4. His salutation, v. 26. from himself, Silvanus, and Timotheus; and he would have them salute each other in their names: thus he would have them signify their mutual love and affection to one another by the kiss of charity, 1 Pet. 5:14. here called a holy kiss, to intimate, how cautious they should be of all impurity in the use of this ceremony, then commonly practiced; as it should not be a treacherous kiss like that of Judas, so not a lascivious kiss like that of the harlot, Prov. 7:13.

5. His solemn charge for the reading of this epistle, v. 27. This is not only an exhortation, but an adjuration by the Lord. And this epistle was to be read to all the holy brethren. It is not only allowed to the common people, to read the Scriptures, and what none should prohibit, but it is their indispensable duty, and what they should be persuaded to do. In order to this, these holy oracles should not be kept concealed in an unknown tongue, but translated into the vulgar languages; that all men, being concerned to know the Scriptures, may be able to read them, and be acquainted with them. The public reading of the law was one part of the worship of the Sabbath among the Jews in their synagogues, and the Scriptures should be read in the public assemblies of Christians also.

6. The apostolical benediction, usual in other epistles, v. 28. We need no more to make us happy, than to know that grace which our Lord Jesus Christ has manifested, be interested in that grace which He has purchased, and partake of that grace which dwells in Him as the Head of the church. This is an ever-flowing and over-flowing fountain of grace, to supply all our wants.

may be preserved blameless, until the coming of our Lord Jesus:—The most eminent servants of Christ want and value the prayers of their weakest brethren.—Let us be thankful that these excellent epistles are reserved for our perusal also; and while we remember, that the apostle 'charged' the Thessalonians, by the authority of the Lord Jesus, to let them be read to all the holy brethren, some of whom might not be able to read them for themselves, we may be sure that an Antichrist alone would forbid the laity to read the Scriptures, lest they should lead them into heresy. SCOTT.

5:18—21. 2 Thess. 3:16. Heb. 13:20, 21.—(27) Charge you, &c.] It seems evident, that this was addressed to the pastors of the church, and not to believers in general; else the persons charged, and they for whose benefit the charge was given, would have been precisely the same.—The original is, 'I adjure you.'—The solemn charge implies, likewise, a most decided claim to divine inspiration; for it evidently places this, and consequently the apostle's other epistles, on the footing of the ancient Scriptures, 'the oracles of God,' (Note, Col. 4:15, 16.) It likewise shows, both that oaths and adjurations are in some cases lawful; and that the subject, concerning which the apostle wrote, was considered by him as peculiarly important. This is worthy of the most serious consideration of all those, even among protestants, who do not make the reading of Scripture a part of the service, when they meet in the worship of God, or who read them in a careless and indistinct manner. The advantage to illiterate people, to the multitude who cannot read, or who can read but imperfectly, of an audible, distinct, and emphatical reading of the Scriptures in public, can scarcely be calculated. It will soon render even the best preaching more fully understood, and it will, in some degree, supply the deficiency in other cases. SCOTT.

(23.) Wholly.] 'In all parts of your nature.—Spirit, soul, and body.' Your whole constitution. It signifies, the whole frame of nature allotted to you. The apostle very evidently refers to a notion which prevailed among the rabbies as well as the philosophers, that the person of a man is constituted of three distinct substances, the rational spirit, the animal soul, and the visible body. He seems to suppose, Heb. 4:12. the two former may be separated; and some have thought he intimates, 1 Cor. 14:14, 15. that one may know what the other does not.' DONDR.

(27.) 'It is probable, that, from the beginning of the Christian dispensation, the Scriptures of the O. T. were read in every assembly for divine worship. Paul, knowing the plenitude of the apostolic commission, now demands, that the same respect should be paid to his writings which had been given to those of the ancient prophets. This, therefore, is a proper direction to be inserted in the first epistle written by him.' T. II. HORNE, in Henry, abr.—'This clause is an evidence of the authenticity of the epistle. If it was read in the church of Thessalonica, during Paul's lifetime, no publication could be more authentic. If not read, the existence of this clause would condemn it as not authentic, and be an invincible impediment to its success. See PALEY.' HENRY, abr.

ADDITIONAL NOTE.—ROMAN MILITARY DISCIPLINE.

Paul was a prisoner under military care, Ac. 28:16. and whether he was at first, or when more closely confined afterwards, in the pretorian camp, (see plan of Rome, at head of Romans, and comp. cut. Ez. : end.) or under military guard in the prison of the palace, he had frequent opportunity to observe the discipline of the soldiers, as is evident from the metaphors he uses, 1 Thess. 5:6, 8. Eph. 6:10—17, and especially 2 Tim. 2:3, 4, 5. The following account of the Roman military discipline, from Gibbon, will illustrate such allusions.

In the purer ages of the commonwealth, the use of arms was reserved for those ranks of citizens who had a country to love, a property to defend, and some share in enacting those laws, which it was their interest, as well as duty to maintain; but in after ages, though the officers were mostly of liberal birth and education, the common soldiers were drawn from the meanest, and very frequently from the most profligate of mankind.—That public virtue, which, among the ancients, was denominated patriotism, is derived from a strong sense of our own interest in the preservation and prosperity of the free government of which we are members. Such a sentiment, which had rendered the legions of the republic almost invincible, could make but a feeble impression on the mercenary servants of a despotic prince; and it became necessary to supply that defect by other motives, of a different, but not less forcible nature; honor and religion. The peasant, or mechanic, imbibed the useful prejudice, that he was advanced to the more dignified profession of arms, in which his rank and reputation would depend on his own valor; and that, although the prowess of a private soldier must often escape the notice of fame, his own behavior might sometimes confer glory or disgrace on the company, the legion, or even the army, to whose honors he was associated. On his first entrance into the service, an oath (annually renewed on the 1st Jan.) was administered to him, with every circumstance of solemnity. He promised never to desert his standard, to submit his own will to the commands of his leaders, [2 Tim. 2:3, 4.] and to sacrifice his life for the safety of the emperor and the empire. The attachment of the Roman troops to their standard, was inspired by the united influence of religion and of honor. The golden eagle, [cut, p. 643 or 646, Vol. III.] which glittered in front of the legion, was the object of their fondest devotion; nor was it esteemed less impious, than it was ignominious, to abandon that sacred ensign in the hour of danger. Tacitus calls the Roman eagles, Bellerum Deos [war-gods]. They were placed in a chapel in the camp, and with the other deities received the religious worship of the troops. [Comp. Deut. 28:49. Mat. 24:28, 15.] (Continued on p. 481.)

OF THE
SECOND EPISTLE OF
PAUL TO THE THESSALONIANS, WITH
PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS AND NOTES.

(Henry's Exposition, completed by Mr. D. Mayo.)

THIS second Epistle was written soon after the former, and seems to be designed to prevent their running into a mistake which might arise from some passages in the former epistle, concerning the second coming of Christ; as if it were near at hand.* The apostle in this epistle is careful to prevent any wrong use which some among them might make of those expressions of his, that were agreeable to the dialect of the prophets of the Old Test.; and informs them, that there were many intermediate counsels yet to be fulfilled before that day of the Lord shall come, though, because it is sure, he had spoken of it as near. There are other things he writes about, for their consolation under sufferings, and exhortation and direction in duty.

This epistle is commonly supposed to have been written from Corinth, not very long after the foregoing, because Silvanus and Timothy still continued with Paul; but the evidence is not very conclusive, and some difficulties attend this opinion. 1:3, 4. It is, however, certain, that it was not sent from Athens, according to the spurious postscript.—Amidst a number of instructive warnings, exhortations, and encouragements, it contains a most remarkable prophecy, 2:3—12. the exact fulfilment of which is a full demonstration of the divine inspiration, by which the apostle wrote his epistles.—‘ Besides the general marks of its genuineness, and divine authority, which it bears in common with the rest of the epistles, it has one peculiar to itself, from the exact representation it contains of the papal power, under the characters of “the man of sin,” and “the mystery of iniquity.” For, considering how directly opposite the principles here described were to the genius of Christianity, it must appear, at the time when this epistle was written, highly improbable, to all human apprehension, that they should ever prevail in the Christian church; and consequently a prediction like this, which answers in every particular so exactly to the event, must be allowed to carry its own evidence with it, and to prove that the author of it wrote under a divine influence.’ Doddridge.

‘This epistle may be regarded as a supplement to the former.’

HENRY.

SCOTT.

BLOOMFIELD.

* On the genuineness of 2 Thess. the Ed. quotes a passage from Paley's Horæ Paulinæ, (a work which should be more common;) to show one specimen of his ingenious method of adding to external and direct testimony, that of undesigned coincidence. ‘From 1 Thess. 4:15, 17. and 5:4. it should seem, that the Thessalonians, or some, however, amongst them, had conceived an opinion (and that not very unreasonably) that the coming of Christ was to take place instantly [hoti enestēken, is at hand, i. e. now, this year]; and that this persuasion had produced, as it well might, much agitation in the church. The apostle, therefore, now writes, amongst other purposes, to quiet this alarm, and to rectify the misconstruction; as 2 Thess. 2:1,2. If he admitted, that this passage in the second epistle relates to the passage in the first, it amounts to a considerable proof of the genuineness of both epistles. I have no conception, because I know of no example, of such a device in a forgery, as first to frame an ambiguous passage in a letter, then to represent the persons to whom the letter is addressed as mistaking the meaning of the passage, and lastly, to write a second letter in order to correct this mistake.’

CHAP. I.

1 Paul certifieth them of the good opinion which he had of their faith, love, and patience: 11 and therewithal useth divers reasons for the comforting of them in persecution, whereof the chiefest is taken from the righteous judgment of God.

PAUL, and Silvanus, and Timothy, unto <sup>a</sup> the church of the Thessalonians in God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ:

2 Grace <sup>b</sup> unto you, and peace, from God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ.

3 We are bound to thank God always for you, brethren, as it is meet, because that your faith groweth exceedingly, and the charity of every one of you all toward each other aboundeth:

4 So that we ourselves glory <sup>c</sup> in you in the churches of God, for your patience and faith in all your persecutions and tribulations that ye <sup>d</sup> endure:

5 Which is <sup>e</sup> a manifest token of the righteous judgment of God, that ye may be counted worthy of the kingdom of God, for which ye also <sup>f</sup> suffer:

CHAP. I. V. 1—4. Here we have the introduction, v. 1, 2. in the same words as in the former epistle, which shows, that ministers ought not so much to regard the variety of expression, and elegance of style, as the truth and usefulness of the doctrines they preach. The high esteem the apostle had for them, is expressed, v. 3, 4. He chooses rather to speak of what was praiseworthy in them, in a way of thanksgiving to God, than by commendation of them; and it is our duty, to be thankful to God for all the good that is found in us or others.

The apostle never flattered, but he took pleasure in commending his friends, and speaking well of them, to the glory of God, and for the excitement and encouragement of others; it all centred here, in the praise and glory of God.

He esteemed them, and thanked God for the increase of their faith, and love, and patience, not only that they were true Christians, but growing Christians. Note, Where there is the truth of grace, there will be increase of it. The path of the just is as a shining light, which shines more and more, unto the perfect day. The matter of the apostle's thanksgiving and glorying on behalf of the Thessalonians, was, 1. That their faith grew exceedingly, v. 3. The growth of their faith appeared by the works of faith; and where faith grows, all other graces grow proportionably. 2. Their charity abounded, v. 3. their love to God and man. There were no such divisions among them as in some other churches. 3. Their patience as well as faith increased, in all their persecutions and tribulations. And then patience has its perfect work, when it extends itself to all trials. Many persecutions the Thessalonians endured for the sake of righteousness, as well as other troubles; yet they endured all these, by faith seeing Him that is invisible, and looking to the recompense of reward; and endured them with patience, not with an insensibility under them, but with patient bearing them, and that from Christian principles, which kept them quiet and submissive, and afforded them inward strength and support.

V. 5—10. Having mentioned the persecutions and tribulations they endured for the cause of Christ, the apostle proceeds to offer several things for their comfort under them: As,

1. He tells them of the present happiness and advantage of their sufferings, v. 5. Their sufferings were a manifest token, that they were worthy, or meet to be accounted Christians indeed, seeing they could suffer for Christianity. Besides, from their patient suffering, it appeared that, according to the righteous judgment of God, they should be counted worthy of the heavenly glory: not that they could merit heaven, but they were made meet for heaven. We cannot by all our sufferings, any more than by our services, merit heaven as a debt; but by NOTES. CHAP. I. V. 3, 4. The apostle, since he wrote the foregoing epistle, had received further accounts concerning the church at Thessalonica, which were so fully satisfactory that he deemed himself bound to return continual thanks to God in their behalf. 1 Thes. 1:1—8.—This [his glorying in them in the churches] may induce a doubt whether the epistle were written from Corinth or not; for, on that supposition, Paul had visited no other churches since he wrote the former epistle, except such as had been planted in that vicinity; and we can hardly suppose, that he only referred to what Timothy or Silvanus had said of them, if indeed they had left him for a season to visit other churches, and then returned. Perhaps the [original] word may further imply, that the sufferings of good men, and the triumphant prosperity of their persecuting enemies, should not only terminate in such a display of divine vengeance, but that these seeming irregularities do even now declare that there shall be such a day of retribution. our patience under our sufferings, we are qualified for the joy promised to patient sufferers in the cause of God.

II. He tells them next of the future recompense that shall be given to persecutors, and persecuted.

1. There will be a punishment inflicted on persecutors, v. 6. Nothing more infallibly marks a man for eternal ruin, than a spirit of persecution, and enmity to the name and people of God : as the faith, patience, and constancy of the saints are to them an earnest of everlasting rest and joy, so the pride, malice, and wickedness of their persecutors are to them an earnest of everlasting misery : for every man carries about with him, and carries out of the world with him, either his heaven or his hell. God will recompense, and has sometimes in this world : witness the dreadful end of many persecutors ; but especially this He will do in the other world, where the portion of the wicked must be weeping and wailing and gnashing of teeth.

2. There is a reward for the persecuted, v. 7. a rest remains for the people of God, a rest from sin and sorrow ; and the future rest will abundantly recompense all their present troubles. The sufferings of this present be just, I know no stronger proof of a righteous judgment to come, than the persecutions of good men, and the present triumphs of the wicked.' BENSON, in Bloomf.—'If we hold this principle of faith, that God is the just Judge of the world, and that it is his office to reward every one according to his work, this other principle must beyond dispute follow, that the present disorder is proof that there will be a judgment, which does not yet appear. God, therefore, to excite us to the hope of a future judgment, now only judges a portion of the world.'

CALVIN, in Henry, abr.

(7.) When the Lord Jesus, &c. 'That the subject here is the final advent of Christ to judgment, appears from a comparison with 1 Thes. 1:10. 3:13. 4:15. seqq. 5:2, and 23. To interpret it, therefore, as some do, of Christ's advent to destroy Jerusalem, seems merely a device resorted to, to avoid the difficulties at ch. 2.'

BLOOMF., with Koppe and Rosenm.

(8.) In flaming fire. 'Commentators are not agreed on what is signified here. The ancients and earlier moderns, as Est., think it means the fire of hell, i. e. the fire of conflagration, which shall usher in the day of judgment. Theoph. and others construe the words with taking vengeance, &c., or with shall be revealed, &c., v. 7. but the latter construction is the more natural. Most recent commentators, from Benson downwards, take it to denote the glory in which our Lord shall be clothed at the great day. Koppe understands it of awful lightning and thunder ; which is very consistent with the former. Ham. understands it of the angels ; and Grot. sinks it into a sort of rhetorical ornament. On the whole, there is no great objection to the interpretation of Bens. and Kop. but I see no sufficient reason to abandon the common one, which is confirmed by the unanimous authority of the ancients.' BL.—'Them that know not, &c.' 'I see no reason to abandon the common opinion, that all non-Christians are meant, of course implying such as have had the means of knowing, and have neglected them, and whose ignorance is voluntary (see Rom 2:16.) ; and by them that obey not, &c., those who, after having embraced the Gospel, do not fulfil its injunctions. It is plain that two sorts of persons are meant.' ID.

(9.) 'It is plain the apostle is speaking of the general judgment, and the punishment of all the wicked, not merely of those who have persecuted Christians.' ID.—'Everlasting destruction.' 'The very nature time are not worthy to be compared with the glory that shall be revealed. The meanest Christian shall rest with the greatest apostle: nay, what is far more, if we suffer for Christ, we shall also reign with Him, 2 Tim. 2:12. Concerning this future recompense, we are further to observe,

(1.) The certainty of it, proved by the righteousness and justice of God, v. 6. The thought should be terrible to wicked men and persecutors, and a great support to the righteous, and such as are persecuted.

(2.) The time when this righteous recompense shall be made, v. 7. When God will judge the world in righteousness by that Man whom He hath appointed, even Jesus Christ, the righteous Judge. The Scripture has made known to us the judgment to come, and we are bound to receive the revelation here given concerning Christ. As,

[1.] That He will in that day appear from heaven. Now the heavens retain Him, they conceal Him ; but then He will be revealed and made manifest. He will come in all the pomp and power of the upper world, from whence we look for the Savior.

[2.] He will be revealed with his mighty angels, v. 7. or the angels of his power : these will attend on Him, to grace the solemnity of that great day of his appearance ; they will be the ministers of his justice and mercy in that day ; they will summon the criminals to his tribunal, and gather in the elect, and be employed in executing his sentence.

[3.] He will come in flaming fire, v. 8. The earth, and all the works that are therein, shall be burnt up, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat. This will be a trying fire, to try every man's works ; a refining fire, to purify the saints ; a consuming fire to the wicked.

[4.] The effects of this appearance will be terrible to some, and joyful to others.

1st. Terrible to some ; He will then take vengeance on the wicked.

1. On those that sinned against the principles of natural religion, and rebelled against the light of nature ; that know not God, v. 8, though the invisible things of Him are manifested in the things that are seen.

2. On those that rebel against the light of revelation, that obey not the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ. And this is the condemnation, that light is come into the world, and men love darkness rather than light.

This is the great crime of multitudes, and to such, the revelation of our Lord Jesus Christ will be terrible, because of their doom, which is mentioned, v. 9. Where, Observe,

(1.) They will then be punished. Though sinners may be long reprieved, yet they will be punished at last.

(2.) Their punishment will be no less than destruction, not of their being, but of their bliss ; not that of the body alone, but both as to body and soul.

(3.) This destruction will be everlasting. They shall be always dying, yet never die. It must needs be so, since the punishment is inflicted by an eternal God, fastening on an immortal soul, set out of the reach of divine mercy and grace.

(4.) This destruction shall come from the presence of the Lord, that is, immediately from God Himself. Here, God punishes sinners by creatures, by instruments ; but then He will take the work into his own hands.

(5.) It shall come from the glory of his power, or from his glorious power. Not only the justice of God, but his almighty power, will be glorified in the destruction of sinners ; and who knows the power of his anger ? He is able to cast into hell.

2dly. It will be a joyful day to some, even to the saints, unto them that believe and obey the Gospel. And then the apostle's testimony concerning this day, will be confirmed and believed, v. 10. In that bright and blessed day,

1. Christ Jesus will be glorified and admired by his saints. They shall behold his glory, admire it with pleasure, sing hallelujahs to Him in that day of his triumph, for their complete victory and happiness.

2. Christ will be glorified and admired in them. His grace and power will then be manifested and magnified, when it shall appear what He has purchased for, and wrought in, and bestowed upon, all those who believe in Him. Note, Christ's dealings with those who believe, will be what the world one day shall wonder at. Now, they are a wonder to many : but how will they be wondered at in this great and glorious day ; or, rather, how will Christ, whose name is Wonderful, be admired, when the mystery of God shall be finished ! Christ will not be so much admired in the glorious esteem of angels that He will bring from heaven with Him ; as in the many saints, the many sons, He will bring to glory.

of the expressive [original] term perdition, suggests the idea of utter and irrecoverable ruin and destruction. As to everlasting, the common device to which the Unitarians and others resort, namely, that of representing the term as meaning no more than ae,—lasting, is only fit for sciolists, and those who wish to be deceived.' BL.—'From the presence of the Lord.' 'The phrase expresses not only that they shall be expelled from that joy and glory which reign in the presence of Christ, but that his presence shall appear active in the infliction of their punishment, so that they shall, as it were, be blasted by the lightning of his eye.' Bp. HOPKINS, in Doddr. Bloomfield, remarks, that no interpretation bears the stamp of truth, but the commonly received one, which is ably supported by Koppe. He adds, that the from signifies, 'far removed from the Lord, and the glorious majesty of his kingdom.' This he confirms by reference to Gen. 4:14. and Is. 2:10, 19. and remarks, 'that the wicked and reprobate will pass their miserable existence in quite another place from the habitations of the accepted, is the perpetual doctrine of Christ and his apostles, as Mat. 25:41.' ED.—'Everlasting destruction is not annihilation ; for their being continues ; and as the destruction is everlasting, it is an eternal continuance, and presence of substantial evil, and absence of all good. The everlasting destruction of the ungodly, is a subject that should be continually placed before men.' A. CLARKE, in Henry, abr.—'Some persons endeavor to convince themselves that the doctrine of everlasting punishment is untrue, (contrary to the express declaration of God's Word,) because they cannot see how on human principles it can be just. "But it is murder in a parent to drown his child ; while it was right in God to drown a wicked world. Lot could not lawfully destroy his sons-in-law ; but God did it in righteousness." These things teach us, not to compare God with ourselves ; nor think that He must be governed by our views and feelings.'

REV. DR. CHURCH.

(10.) 'It is well remarked by Benson, that whilst the saints are despised, insulted, and persecuted, Christ is not glorified in them, nor admired for his regard to them. But, when He shall punish their persecutors, raise his saints from the dead, deliver them out of all their troubles, and make them completely glorious and happy ; then He shall be glorious and admirable in the eyes of the whole world.' BLOOMF.—'He will show Himself wonderful in giving rest, joy, glory, and ever-

<sup>1</sup> He willeth them to continue steadfast in the truth received, <sup>3</sup> sheweth that there shall be a departure from the faith, <sup>9</sup> and a discovery of antichrist, before the day of the Lord come. <sup>15</sup> And thereupon repeateth his former exhortation, and prayeth for them.

NOW we beseech you, brethren, by the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, and by our gathering together unto him,

V. 11, 12. In these verses the apostle again tells the Thessalonians of his earnest and constant prayer for them. They were much on his thoughts, he wished them well, and could not express his good will and good wishes to them better, than in earnest, constant prayer to God for them. Note, The believing thoughts and expectation of the second coming of Christ, should put us upon prayer to God for ourselves and others, Luke 21:36. Observe,

1. What the apostle prayed for, v. 11. (1.) That God would begin his good work of grace in them; so we may understand this expression; That our God would count you (or, as it might be read, make you) worthy of this calling. We are called with a high and holy calling; and if so, our great concern should be, to be worthy of it; and

PRACT. OBS. Those who have already distinguished themselves by 'the work of faith, and the labor of love, and the patience of hope,' are yet capable of 'growing exceedingly' in all these things; for the highest attainments of saints on earth fall far beneath full perfection. Phil. 3:12-14.—The patient sufferings of exemplary Christians, and the prosperity of ungodly men and cruel persecutors, fully demonstrate a future judgment; when all shall 'discern between the righteous and the wicked, between him that serveth God, and him that serveth Him not.' Mal. 3:13-18, v. 18. This assists us in explaining those mysteries of Providence, which would otherwise greatly perplex us; and we perceive, that the devoted worshippers and beloved children of God are proved and purified in the fiery furnace of tribulation, 'that they may be accounted worthy of that kingdom for which they suffer;' and that wicked men are permitted to prosper, that their rancorous enmity against God may be manifested, and the measure of their crimes filled up, and that all may see the glory of that justice, which consigns them to the punishment intended for them. 2 Pet. 2:4-9. It must indeed at length appear evident to all rational creatures, that 'it is righteous in God to recompense tribulation to those who trouble' his people, from hatred to his holy truth and service, and that it is honorable to all his perfections to give 'rest' and felicity to those, who have been troubled for his sake, and for their love to his cause and worship. Faith, anticipating the grand decisive day, is enabled by the light of revelation to read, and, in a measure, to understand the book of Providence, and thus to wait with composure and comfort for the coming of the Lord. That will be indeed 'the day of wrath and of the revelation of the righteous judgment of God;' then the Savior, once 'a Man of sorrows,' and ge-lasting blessedness, to all who love his truth, and believe in Him.' Bp. JEWEL.

V. 11. The good pleasure of his goodness. [This is the shortest and most charming representation anywhere found of that infinite goodness, which surpasses all expression, but was never so happily and properly expressed as here.] BLACKWALL.—'The original seems at once to express that it is sovereign pleasure, and also that He feels, as it were, a sacred complacency in the display of it.' DODDR.

NOTES. CHAP. II. V. 1, 2. It would at least take them off from the duties of their several callings in society, and their conduct, expectations, and disappointment might eventually render them the derision of their unbelieving neighbors. Several learned men would explain this, of our Lord's coming, in providence, to destroy Jerusalem, and terminate the persecutions excited by the Jews; but that coming was very near, and the apostle earnestly warned his readers against supposing, that the coming of which he spake was at hand. If, however, this had not been the case, what could there be, in the near approach of divine judgments on Judea, to excite any extraordinary commotion, among the

because we have no worthiness of our own, but what is owing purely to the grace of God, we should pray that He would make us worthy, and then count us worthy of this calling, or, that He would make us meet to partake of the inheritance of the saints in light, Col. 1:12.

(2.) That God would carry on the good work that is begun, and fulfil all the good pleasure of his goodness. The good pleasure of God, denotes his gracious purposes toward his people, which flow from his goodness, and are full of goodness toward them; and it is from thence that all good comes to us. Several good works of grace are begun in the hearts of God's people, which proceed from this good pleasure of his goodness, and we should desire that they may be completed and perfected. In particular, the apostle prays, that God would fulfil in them the work of faith with power. Note, The fulfilling the work of faith is in order to the fulfilling of every other good work, and it is the power of God, that not only begins, but carries on, and perfects, the work of faith.

2. Why the apostle prayed for these things, v. 12. That the name of the Lord Jesus may be glorified; this end we should aim at in everything we do and desire,—that God and Christ in all things may be glorified. And this is the great end and design of the grace of our God, and the Lord Jesus Christ, which is manifested to us, and wrought in us; our own happiness and that of others should be subordinate to this ultimate end; or thus, it is according to the grace of God and Christ, it is an agreeable thing, considering the grace that is manifested to us, and bestowed on us, by God and Christ, that we direct all we do, to the glory of our Creator and Redeemer.

CHAP. II. V. 1-3. Some among the Thessalonians had mistaken the apostle's meaning in what he had written in his former epistle about the coming of Christ, by thinking that it was near at hand. Or, it may be, some pretended they had knowledge respecting it, by particular revelation from the Spirit: hereupon, he is careful to rectify this mistake, and to prevent the spreading of this error. Observe,

I. How very earnest and solicitous he was, to prevent mistakes, v. 1. He entreats them as brethren, who might have charged them, as a father his children: he shows great kindness and condescension; and insinuates himself into their affections. He obtests, and even conjures them in the most solemn manner, By the coming of Christ, &c. The words are in the form of an oath; and his meaning is, that if they believed Christ would come, and if they desired He would come, and rejoiced in the hope of his coming, they should be careful to avoid the error, and the evil consequence hereof, that he was now cautioning them against. From this form of obtestation used by the apostle, we may observe,

1. It is most certain the Lord Jesus Christ will come to judge the world, that He will come in all the pomp and power of the upper world in the last day, to execute judgment upon all. This has been the faith and hope of all Christians, in all ages of the church; nay, it was the faith and hope of the Old Test. saints, ever since Enoch, the seventh from Adam, who said, Behold, the Lord cometh, &c. Jude v. 14.

2. At the second coming of Christ, all the saints will be gathered together to Him, which shows, that the apostle speaks of Christ's coming to judgment at the last day, and not of his coming to destroy Jerusalem.

(1.) They all shall be gathered together. There will then be a general meeting of all the saints, and none but saints; all the Old Test. saints, and all the New Test. saints, they will all be gathered together.

(2.) They shall be gathered together to Christ. He will be the great Centre of their unity. They shall be gathered together to Him, to be attendants on Him, to be assessors with Him, to be presented by Him to the Father, to be with Him for ever, and altogether happy in his presence to all eternity.

(3.) The doctrine of Christ's coming, and our gathering together to Him, is of erally despised, rejected, and disobeyed, will 'be revealed, with his mighty angels, in flaming fire, taking vengeance,' not only on cruel oppressors, persecutors, and murderers, or on scandalous profligates and depredators, but 'on all who knew not God, and obeyed not the Gospel of his Son,' whether infidels, Pharisees, scoffers, hypocrites, enthusiasts, or antinomians, or however they might otherwise be denominated or distinguished. The majesty of that countenance, which was once defiled with blood and spitting, and the glory of his power, who was once crucified in apparent weakness, shall be intolerable to all the multitudes of the wicked, and they will be wholly incapable of making the least resistance, when with tremendous frown He shall say to them, 'Depart, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels!' But, at that awful season, He will come especially 'to be glorified in his saints,' who have here believed the testimony of God by his apostles concerning Him, and thus learned to trust, love, obey, and rejoice in Him whom they have not yet seen; and to know and worship God the Father in and through Him. (Notes, John 20:24-29, vv. 28, 29. 1 Pet. 1:3, 9.) No words can possibly express the admiring and adoring gratitude and love, which will unite with the exulting joy and triumph of that happy period. All hopes and imaginations must fall immensely beneath those unutterable glories, and the holy affections with which they will be contemplated and adored. May we diligently seek to obtain and possess the full assurance, that this shall be our felicity; and may we now do all in our power to promote and recommend the Gospel, and to do good to our fellow-sinners and fellow-Christians. For thus glorifying Him on earth, we may be sure of being for ever glorified with Him in heaven! SEOTT.

great importance to Christians; otherwise, it would not be the proper matter of the apostle's obtestation. We ought therefore not only to believe these things, but highly to account of them also, and look upon them as things we are greatly concerned in, and should be much affected with.

II. The thing itself the apostle cautions the Thessalonians against, is, that they should not be deceived about the time of Christ's coming, and so be shaken in mind, or be troubled. Note, Errors weaken our faith, and cause us trouble; and the weak in faith are often deceived, and fall a prey to seducers.

PRACT. OBS. V. 1—4. It is peculiarly incumbent on ministers, to caution men against expectations not warranted by Scripture; but grounded on impressions, pretended revelations, and perversions of the Word of God; for Satan makes immense use of these delusions, not only to unsettle men's minds, and fill them with needless apprehensions, but even to shake the foundations of their faith and hope, to draw them off from their duty, and to expose the Gospel itself to ridicule and contempt, from scoffers of all descriptions.—But let us observe, that Satan

V. 3, 4. Doubtless many apostasies occurred, in the primitive ages, under different heresiarchs; but all the circumstances of this prediction were never verified, except in that departure from the faith, and that usurpation and spiritual tyranny connected with it, which took place by means of the church of Rome; and the manifest absurdity of all other interpretations, as clearly shown in the controversies of those who contend for one or another of them against their opponents, abundantly proves this. No apostasy of equal magnitude and duration, no delusions equally pernicious and abominable, have taken place, since the apostle's days. The imposture of Mohammed alone can be at all compared with it, and this could not be here intended; for that impostor and his successors were not placed 'in the temple of God,' the visible church, Rev. 11:1, 2. but without it, and, in direct opposition to the very name of Christianity, they propagated their delusions mainly by the sword, and not by 'lying miracles;' 8—12. and indeed the impieties of Mohammed never equalled the blasphemies here predicted.—In connexion with this apostasy 'the man of sin would be revealed.' In the language of prophecy, a king generally signifies a succession of monarchs, of the same family or dynasty, carrying on the same design. Dan. 7:15—27. Thus 'the man of sin' does not mean a single person, but a succession of men, impious in themselves, and conducting the same wicked design of corrupting Christianity, in doctrine, worship, and practice; establishing an intolerable tyranny on religious pretences, and using all kinds of seduction, iniquity, and cruel persecution, to induce mankind to adopt the antichristian system.—(Marg. Ref. i.—Notes, Rev. 13.) This 'man of sin' would be 'the son of perdition,' John 17:12. a genuine descendant of Judas, the apostle and the traitor, who sold his Lord for money, and betrayed Him with a kiss; a peculiar factor and agent of Satan, in destroying the souls of men, and finally sinking himself into perdition as his inheritance. Rev. 17:7—14. It is manifest, that no succession of men have yet appeared on earth, to whom this description fully accords, except that of the Roman pontiffs, as in succession the visible head of the popish church.—This deceiver would 'oppose and exalt himself above all that is called God, or is worshipped,' either by Christians or Pagans; thus the Roman pontiffs have opposed the truths, commandments, and disciples of Christ, in every age and by every mean; they have opposed the prophetic office of Christ, by teaching human inventions; his priestly office, by the doctrine of human merits and created intercessors, and his kingly office, by changing and dispensing with his laws. Dan. 11:34—45. 1 Tim. 4:1—5. 1 John 2:18, 19.—They have 'exalted themselves above all that is called God, and is worshipped,' by claiming authority to forgive sins, even in those who manifestly continue impenitent, by granting indulgences to men to break the commandments of God, by dispensing with his laws, and placing their own decrees above them, as if of superior validity, and by presuming to give meaning and authority to the Scriptures themselves; which must not be understood in any other sense, than what they impose on them. (Marg. Ref. k—m.)—Moreover, this 'man of sin' 'sits as God in the temple of God,' and we must therefore look for him within the visible church; there he blasphemously usurps the throne of God, showing himself to be God. Many Roman emperors affected divine honors and demanded adoration; but there was no antecedent 'apostasy,' from Christianity or the worship of JEHOVAH, and they might rather be said to sit in the temple of have many ways of deceiving, we have reason, therefore, to be cautious, and stand on our guard. Some will pretend new revelations, others misinterpret Scripture, and others be guilty of gross forgeries; divers means and artifices of deceit, men will use; but we must be careful that no man deceive us by any means. The particular matter in which the apostle cautions them not to be deceived, is about the near approach of Christ's coming, as if it was to have been in the apostle's days; and harmless as this error might have seemed to many, yet, because it was indeed an error, it would have proved of bad consequence to many persons. Therefore,

2. He warns them, and would not have them soon shaken in mind, or be troubled.

(1.) He would not have their faith weakened. There was danger lest the Thessalonians, if they apprehended the coming of Christ was just at hand, on finding they, or others, whom they too much regarded, were mistaken as to the time, should thereupon question the truth or certainty of the thing itself; whereas, they ought not to waver in their minds, as to this great thing, which is the faith and hope of all the saints. Then,

(2.) He would not have their comforts lessened, that they should not be troubled, or affrighted with false alarms. It is probable the coming of Christ was represented in so much terror, as to trouble many; though in itself matter of the believer's hope and joy; or many might be troubled with the thought, how surprising this day would be, or with the fear of their unpreparedness, or reflection on their mistake about the time of Christ's coming: we should always watch and pray, but must not be discouraged, or uncomfortable at the thought of Christ's coming.

V. 3—12. Here the apostle confutes the error he had cautioned them against, and gives the reasons why they should not expect the coming of Christ as just at hand. There were several events previous to the second coming of Christ; in particular, he tells them,

I. There would be a general apostasy, a falling away first, v. 3. understand a defection from sound doctrine, instituted worship, and church government, and a holy life. The apostle speaks of some very great apostasy, such as should be very general, though gradual, and should give occasion to the revelation or rise of antichrist, that man of sin. This, he says, v. 5. he had told them of when with them, with design, no doubt, that they should not take offence or be stumbled at it. And, observe, no sooner was Christianity planted and rooted, than there began to be a defection in the Christian church. It was so in the Old Testament church; soon after the promise, there was revolting; soon after men began to call on the name of the Lord, all flesh corrupted their way; soon after the covenant with Noah, the Babel-builders bade defiance to heaven; soon after the covenant with Abraham, his seed degenerated in Egypt; soon after the Israelites were planted in Canaan, when the first generation was worn off, they forsook God, and served Baal; soon after does most mischief by those, who, like Judas, profess themselves disciples and apostles, and sell Christ for money; these are emphatically 'sons of perdition,' and 'men of sin.' (Notes, Is. 56:9—12. P. O. 9—14. Mat. 21:12, 13. P. O. 12—16. Rev. 18:11—19. P. O. 9—19.)—Avarice, pride, and ambition are always hateful, but they are most diabolical, when employed about spiritual things; and there have indeed been many antichrists; yet no one has been so mischievous, as he 'who seated himself in the temple of God.'

Jupiter or Mars, than in that of God, whose temple must be considered to be among his professed worshippers, and not among avowed heathens. But the Roman pontiff, claiming to be the universal head of the whole church of God, called by his flatterers 'Vice-God,' 'a God upon earth,' arrogating the title of 'his Holiness,' boasting of 'infallibility,' claiming a right to depose kings, and bestow kingdoms on whom he pleases, with those impious claims before mentioned, answers so exactly to the description here given, that we cannot reasonably doubt for whom it was designed. While the Roman pontiff opposes the worship of God, by enjoining the worship of images, and of saints and angels, and the authority of his laws, to enforce subjection to his own edicts, he himself may be called the great idol, as well as the great tyrant, of the Romish church: Rev. 13:13—17. as he demands the most abject submission, and prostration from all men, both in body and soul, and pours contempt on all authority human and divine. But particulars cannot here be more fully insisted on. It suffices to show, that the Roman pontiffs answered, and still do answer to this description, as the person intended is the archetype of an excellent portrait, and we may venture to assert, that no other succession of men ever did thus accord to it, perhaps no single individual within the visible church.—The apostles, at least after the Gospel was preached to the Gentiles, never spoke of the temple at Jerusalem as the temple of God, but the Christian church in general, or believers in particular, are always denoted by that phrase.—The striking coincidence of this extraordinary prediction, with many parts of the prophecy of Daniel, and of the revelation of John, may be seen to advantage, by consulting the marginal references, and, as far as the author's views of them are concerned, by examining the notes on the passages referred to in those prophecies.—(4) Who opposeth, &c. 'That adversary.' 'Opposed to Christ diametrically.' Bullinger. 'By a determined, perpetual purpose "he opposeth God."' Grotius.—(3) A falling away. 'The apostasy.' Acts 21:21. Not elsewhere. 'Neither do I see the necessity for denying, that the article has here its proper force; since apostasy, however long-continued, might fitly be called the apostasy, the several acts marking its progress being considered as one whole.' Bp. Middleton.

(4) Who opposeth, &c. 'There seems to be an allusion to him who is called antichrist in the apocalypse.—How closely this [his being called God] corresponds to the Roman pontiffs, every attentive reader of history, ecclesiastical or civil, must perceive.' BLOOMER.—Above all that is called God. 'If these words are not applicable to the usurpation of papacy in divine things, it is difficult to say who there ever has been or can be to whom they should belong.'

V. 5—7. The Roman empire, united under one potent government, and extremely jealous of all other power and authority, prevented the establishment of that spiritual tyranny and usurpation, by which Satan was attempting to make his grand effort against Christianity; but it would not have been prudent for the apostle explicitly to mention it, in an epistle for general perusal; nor would it have accorded to the style of prophecy; however, most of the fathers so far understood him, as to declare, that Antichrist would not come, till after the downfall of the Roman empire. Had it not been for this obstacle, the evil would have broken out much sooner; for even when this was written, 'the mystery of iniquity did already work.' But the Roman empire, which then

7 For the mystery of iniquity doth already <sup>g</sup> work: only he who now letteth, will let, until he be taken out of the way.

8 And then shall that Wicked be revealed, whom the Lord shall <sup>h</sup> consume with the spirit <sup>i</sup> of his mouth, and shall destroy <sup>j</sup> with the brightness of his coming.

9 Even him, whose coming is after the working of Satan, with all power and signs and lying wonders,

10 And with all deceivableness of <sup>k</sup> unrighteousness in them that perish; because they received not the love <sup>l</sup> of the truth, that they might be saved.

God's covenant with David, his seed revolted, and served other gods; soon after the return out of captivity there was a general decay of piety, as appears by the story of Ezra and Nehemiah; therefore, it was no strange thing, that after the planting of Christianity, there should [from the selfishness of our nature] come a falling away.

II. There would be a revelation of that man of sin, v. 3. antichrist would take his rise from this general apostasy. He afterward speaks of the revelation of that wicked one, v. 8. intimating the discovery which should be made of his wickedness, in order to his ruin: here he seems to speak of his rise, which should be occasioned by the general apostasy he had mentioned; and to intimate, that all sorts of false doctrines and corruptions should centre in him. Great disputes have been, who or what is intended by this man of sin and son of perdition;

'letted' or hindered its full effect, by keeping the church under persecution, and curbing all authority but its own, would continue to retard this event, until it should be removed out of the way. The conversion of the Roman emperors to Christianity, in the beginning of the fourth century, tended greatly to prepare things for this apostasy, by giving scope to the ambition and avarice of the ecclesiastics, and by multiplying exceedingly merely nominal Christians; but it was not till the subversion of the western empire by the northern nations, and the division of it into ten kingdoms, that way was made for the full establishment of the papal usurpation at Rome, the capital city of the empire. Rev. 8:11—14.

(5.) I told you. Benson remarks on the propriety with which the apostle here uses the singular number; since this was doubtless revealed to him only, and not to Silvanus and Timothy. BLOOMF.—Paley shows, that this reference to a conversation the apostle had held with the Thessalonians, but the purport of which is not here explained, is a strong proof of the authenticity of the epistle. HENRY, abr.

V. 8—12. The obstacle above mentioned, having been taken out of the way, 'that wicked,' or lawless one, would be revealed, and would display the deformity of his character without disguise, by endeavoring to exalt himself above all laws, human and divine. But though this great usurper would 'practise and prosper,' yet the Lord would at length consume him by 'the spirit,' or the breath, of his mouth. (Marg. Ref. u—y.—Notes, Job 4:7—11. Is. 11:2—5. Rev. 19:11—16.) According to the predictions of his Word, and by the preaching of his Gospel, attested by the influences of his Spirit. He would gradually waste and consume this antichristian tyranny, and terminate all his corruptions of the Gospel. This He has been accomplishing, during the space of above three hundred years, since the first dawns of the Reformation; He will shortly destroy the whole papal authority, and all obstinately attached to it, 'by the brightness of his coming' to spread the Gospel through the nations; (Notes, Rev. 18:—20:1—6.) and He will finally condemn, and punish with everlasting destruction, all the actors in this grand delusion, when He shall come to Judge the world. (Note, Rev. 20:11—15.) Such will certainly be the doom of this 'lawless one,' this 'man of sin,' this 'son of perdition,' whose coming would be attended, and whose success obtained, not by open force, but by the deep subtlety and peculiar 'energy of Satan.' It implied, that God would act in this matter, according to the general rule, of giving up those who obstinately hated the truth through love of sin, to be blinded by Satan; and that there would be a remnant, even under the deepest darkness of this impostor's reign, of another character and description.—Nothing can more exactly coincide with the system of popery, as it prevailed in the Roman church, and under the Roman pontiff for many ages, than this passage does. Even their boasted pretensions to miraculous powers, and the imposture or ambiguity of every instance, is the grand proof of all, that they were marked out by the Holy Spirit. And the adherence of the church of Rome, even to the present day, to the gross worship of and if it is not certain that the papal power and tyranny are principally, or only intended, yet this is plain: what is here said does very exactly agree thereto. For, observe,

1. The names of this person, or rather the state and power here spoken of. He is called the man of sin, to denote his egregious wickedness; not only he practices wickedness himself, but he also promotes, countenances, and commands it in others; and he is the son of perdition, because he himself is devoted to certain destruction, and is the instrument of destroying many others, both in soul and body. These names may properly be applied, for these reasons, to the papal state; and thereto agree also,

2. The characters here given, v. 4.

Thus have the bishops of Rome not only opposed God's authority, and that of the civil magistrate, who are called gods, but have exalted themselves above God, and earthly governors, in demanding greater regard to their commands than to the commands of God or the magistrate. Also, as God was in the temple of old, and worshipped there, and is in and with his church now; so the antichrist, here mentioned, is some usurper of God's authority in the Christian church, who claims divine honors; and to whom can this better apply than to the bishops of Rome, to whom the most blasphemous titles have been given, as, Our Lord God the Pope; Another God on earth; The dominion of God and the Pope is the same?

3. His rise is mentioned, v. 6, 7. of which, observe two things:

(1.) Something hindered, or withheld, or let, until it was taken away. This is supposed to be the power of the Roman empire, which the apostle did not think fit to mention more plainly at that time; and it is notorious, that, while this power continued, it prevented the advances of the bishops of Rome to that height of tyranny, which soon afterward they arrived to.

(2.) This mystery of iniquity was gradually to arrive at its height; and so it was in effect in the Romish church; and thus the mystery of iniquity did the more easily, and almost insensibly, prevail. The apostle justly calls it a mystery of iniquity, because wicked designs and actions were concealed under false shows and pretences, at least they were concealed from the common view and observation. By pretended devotion, superstition and idolatry were advanced; and by a pretended zeal for God and his glory, bigotry and persecution were promoted. And he tells us, This mystery of iniquity did even then begin, or did already work; while the apostles were yet living, there were then the deeds of the Nicolaitans, persons who pretended zeal for Christ, but really opposed Him. [Selfishness and its forms of] pride, ambition, and worldly interest of church-pastors and church-rulers, as in Diotrefes, and others, were the early working of the mystery of iniquity, which, by degrees, came to the prodigious height visible in the church of Rome.

4. The fall or ruin of the antichristian state is declared, v. 8. The head is called that wicked one, or that lawless person who sets up a human power in competition with, and contradiction to, the divine dominion and power of the Lord Jesus Christ: but as he would thus manifest himself to be the man of sin, so the revelation or discovery of this to the world would be the sure presage and the means of his ruin. The consuming of him precedes his final destruction, and that is by the pure Word of God, accompanied with the Spirit of God: this will discover the mystery of iniquity, and make the power of antichrist to consume and waste away; and in due time it shall be totally and finally destroyed, and this will be by the brightness of Christ's coming. Note, The coming of Christ to destroy the wicked will be with peculiar glory, and eminent lustre and brightness.

5. The apostle further describes the reign and rule of this man of sin. Where, observe,

(1.) The manner of his coming or ruling, and working: in general, that it is after the images, saints, and angels, and to the doctrine of authoritative absolutions, dispensations, penances, purgatory, transubstantiation, and the merit of good works, proves that 'the man of sin,' though consuming by the Spirit and the word of Christ, is yet very far from being destroyed 'by the brightness of his coming.'—It is very wonderful, that any reflecting persons should ever think this prophecy applicable to the antichristian delusions of modern infidels or atheists, who have apostatized from a profession of Christianity; when the single expression, 'signs and lying wonders,' demonstrates that they could not be meant. Antichrist, indeed, has made strenuous efforts as an unmasked infidel; yet these short-lived appearances must not be compared with the permanent and wide-spread mischiefs of one thousand three hundred years. The original words may mean, either false and lying pretences to the power of working miracles, and the impostures by which they are rendered plausible, or they may relate to things really supernatural, when performed in support of false doctrine, and claims to a divine authority, in propagating it. (Notes, Ex. 7:11, 12. Deut. 13:1—5. 2 Tim. 3:6—9.) —(12) Damned.] The original is judged, as in several other places, and, in such awful declarations, a needless and ungrounded asperity of language, in the translation, only gives occasion to objections, and so weakens the general effect. Yet, in this place the meaning is unequivocal, and judging such characters, as are here described, at the coming of the Lord, must terminate in their eternal condemnation. But this is not always the case, when the same word is used. (Note, 1 Cor. 11:29—34.)

(2.) 'The apostle's principal design, v. 3—12, is, not to give a description of things then existing, but a prediction of some remarkable future events. When the obstructing power is taken away, then it shall no longer be a mystery of iniquity, or operate secretly; but then shall that wicked one be openly and publicly revealed.' BENSON, in Bloomf.

(3.) Even him.] 'I. e. that wicked, v. 8.' BLOOMF.—With all power, &c.] 'Nothing seems so natural as to refer the whole to the fictional miracles of the church of Rome, which have grown to such a degree of extravagance and effrontery, as even to make their own popes ashamed.' DODDR.

(10.) 'Amidst all the variety of shapes which infidelity assumes, that of our times is peculiar. It is not the open, gross, unmasked, and daring infidelity of Voltaire and his day. It is now subtle, and refined,—clothed in all the attractions of taste and eloquence; it even comes to us clothed in the garb of religion and virtue, and is therefore the more to be feared. Some of the most popular novelists, and other writers of the day, sanction profanity, adultery, duelling, revelling, and other vices, not openly and directly, but under peculiar circumstances; yet in such a manner as to break down all the barriers of religion and virtue. What guilt are those men accumulating, who, as booksellers and publishers, are deluging the community with such works,—who are, in effect, bartering the souls of their fellow-men for money!'

example of Satan, the grand enemy of souls, the great adversary of God and man. More particularly, it is with satanic power and deceit : a divine power is pretended for the support of this kingdom, but it is only after the working of Satan ; signs and wonders, visions and miracles, are pretended ; by these the papal kingdom was first set up, and has all along been kept up, but they have false signs to support false doctrines ; and lying wonders, or only pretended miracles that have served their cause, things false in act, and fraudulently managed, to impose on the people : and the diabolical deceits with which the antichristian state has been supported are notorious. The apostle calls it all deceivableness of unrighteousness, v. 10. Others may call them pious frauds, but the apostle called them unrighteous and wicked frauds ; and, indeed, all fraud, being contrary to truth, is an impious thing. Many are the subtle artifices the man of sin has used, and various are the plausible pretences by which he has beguiled unwary and unstable souls to embrace false doctrines, and submit to his usurped dominion. [Comp. a terrible instance, Col. : end.]

(2.) The persons are described, who are his willing subjects, or most likely to become such, v. 10. They are such as love not the truth, that they may be saved. They could not bear sound doctrine, and therefore easily imbibed false doctrines ; had they loved the truth, they would have persevered in it, and been preserved by it ; but no wonder if they easily parted with what they never had any love to [ : true faith includes the heart]. And of these persons it is said, that they perish, or are lost : are in a lost condition, in danger to be lost for ever. For,

6. We have the sin and ruin of the subjects of antichrist's kingdom declared, v. 11, 12.

(1.) Their sin is, They believed not the truth, but had pleasure in unrighteousness, did not love the truth, and therefore they did not believe it ; and because they did not believe it, therefore they had pleasure in unrighteousness, or in wicked actions, and were pleased with false notions. Note, An erroneous mind and vicious life often go together, and help forward one another.

(2.) Their ruin is thus expressed ; God shall send them strong delusions, to believe a lie. Thus He will punish men, for their unbelief and dislike of the truth, and love to sin and wickedness ; not that God is the author of sin, but in righteousness He sometimes withdraws his grace from such sinners as are here mentioned, and leaves them to themselves ; and then sin will follow of course, yea, the worst of wickedness, that shall end at last in eternal damnation. God is just when He inflicts spiritual judgments here, and eternal punishments hereafter, on those who have no love to the truths of the Gospel, who will not believe them, or live suitably to them, but indulge false doctrines in their minds, and wicked practices in their lives and conversations.

V. 13—15. Here observe,

1. The consolation the Thessalonians might take against the terrors of this apostasy, v. 13, 14. They were chosen to salvation, and called to obtain glory. The apostle reckoned himself bound in duty to be thankful to God on this account ; we are bound to give thanks to God always for you. This preservation of the saints is owing,

(1.) To the stability of the election of grace, v. 13. God had chosen them from the beginning, had loved them with an everlasting love. His election was eternal in its date,—from the beginning ; not of the Gospel, but of the world, before the foundation of the world, Eph. 1:4. The end to which they were chosen was salvation, complete and eternal, from sin and misery, and the full fruition of all good. The means in order to obtaining this end,—sanctification of the Spirit, and belief of the truth. The decree of election therefore connects the end and the means, and these must not be separated. We are not elected of God, because we were holy, but that we might be holy. Sanctification is by the operation of the Holy Spirit as the Author, and by faith on our part. There must be the belief of the truth, without which there can be no true sanctification, or perseverance in grace, or obtaining of salvation. Faith and holiness must be joined together, as well as holiness and happiness ; therefore, our Savior prayed for Peter, that his faith might not fail, Luke 22:32. and for his disciples, John 17:17.

(2.) To the efficacy of the gospel-call, v. 14. As they were chosen to salvation, so they were called therunto by the Gospel, Rom. 8:30. The outward call of God is by the Gospel ; and this is rendered effectual by the inward operation of the Spirit. It is a call to honor and happiness, even the glory of our Lord Jesus Christ, the glory He has purchased, and is possessed of, a glory to be communicated unto them who believe in Him, and obey his Gospel : such shall be with Christ, to behold his glory, and they shall be glorified with Christ, and partake of his glory. Hereupon, there follows,

2. An exhortation to steadfastness and perseverance, v. 15. Observe, he does not say, 'Ye are chosen to salvation, and therefore ye may be careless and secure ;' but therefore stand fast. So the apostle John, having told those whom he wrote to, that they had received the anointing which should abide in them, and that they should abide in Him, (in Christ,) subjoins this exhortation, Now abide in Him, 1 John 2:27, 28. The Thessalonians are exhorted to steadfastness in their Christian profession, or to hold fast the traditions they had been taught, the doctrine of the Gospel, which had been delivered by the apostle, by word or epistle. As yet, the canon of Scripture was not complete ; therefore, some things were delivered by the apostles, in their preaching, under the guidance of the infallible Spirit, which Christians were bound to observe as coming from God ; other things were afterward by them committed to writing, as the apostle had written a former epistle to these Thessalonians ; and these epistles were written, as the writers were moved by the Holy Ghost. Note, There is no argument from hence for regarding oral traditions in our days, now that the canon of Scripture is complete, as of equal authority with the sacred writings. Such doctrines and duties as were taught by the inspired apostles, we must steadfastly adhere to ; but we have no certain evidence of anything delivered by

PRACT. OBS. V. 5—12. Every event takes place in the appointed season, and, after all the mysterious devices of iniquity which Satan or wicked men can frame, 'the counsel of God shall stand, and He will do all his pleasure,' nay, one antichristian power has often been employed, far besides his purpose, to stop the progress of another. still more pestiferous.—It will at last appear that none were deceived by any 'energy of delusion,' who were not, at heart, enemies to the truth and will of God, and who continued to 'take pleasure in unrighteousness ;' He is constantly permitting the devil to seduce persons of this character into the belief of some lie, by which they are held, as with fetters of iron, till MACKN.—'The whole system of falsehood, promulgated by the man of sin and his adherents ; though it is true, transubstantiation is the fundamental "lie," from which have proceeded most others of the church of Rome.' BLOOMF.

(12.) Had pleasure in unrighteousness.] Doddr. thinks, this 'refers to many of the priests and others in the Romish church, who impose on the people known delusions, merely out of regard to secular interest ;' yet Bloomfield suggests, that 'to others also the words of Peter respecting Balaam may be too applicable: "He loved the wages of unrighteousness." Church-worldliness is not confined to Rome.' ED.

V. 13, 14. Some contend, that the apostle meant, the beginning of the Gospel being preached to them, but he plainly distinguished this choice of them, from their calling, and spoke of the latter as the effect of the former.—The doctrine of election has been repeatedly considered. (Marz. Ref. m—p.—Notes. Rom. 8:28—31. 9:10—14. Eph. 1:3—12) We may here add, that if the 'calling' of the Thessalonians, was the effect of any preceding choice of them, it comes to the same thing, whether that choice was made the preceding day, or from 'before the foundation of the world,' or from eternity, except as the immutable perfections and purposes of God and his absolutely perfect prescience are they receive their merited condemnation. To avoid this fatal doom, men should take heed not to repress their convictions from love of sin, but to reverence the dictates and admonitions of conscience, by which God speaks to them emphatically, and with special application. They should pray earnestly for 'the love of the truth,' and for saving faith as inseparably connected with it ; for many fall away and perish, who have 'the knowledge of the truth,' but 'the love of the truth,' 'accompanies salvation,' and never fails.—They should also use every means of obtaining that humble and spiritual mind, which is the best and the only security against every fatal delusion. concerned. Otherwise, if He acted wisely and righteously in choosing them, rather than their companions in idolatry and vice, it was equally wise and righteous to choose them from eternity, as at the very hour or moment preceding their regeneration.—How wisely and happily does the apostle mingle the views of the grace of God and the duties of men ! while he represents our choice to salvation in a light so worthy of God, since this salvation is still to be obtained, "through sanctification of the Spirit, and belief of the truth." Doddr.

(13.) Hath chosen.] 'The only interpretation that has the stamp of truth is that of the ancients, and almost all the early moderns, who refer it to the eternal purposes of God, in the election and calling of the Thessalonians to the Christian faith.' BLOOMF.

V. 15. Doubtless the apostle's oral 'traditions' were worthy of reverence and obedience, but how should we, at this day, know anything of them, except as they were written for our benefit ? It is therefore a singular instance of the 'deceivableness of unrighteousness' in 'the man of sin,' to attempt the support of his corrupt system, by a single word in that very ch., which most fully exposes his devices. For oral traditions, of equal authority to the written Word, being the rule of its interpretation, and committed to the keeping of the church, (that is, to the Romish clergy,) has been the grand support of popery for ages ; and of this fundamental principle they have no better scriptural proof, than this single word, and one or two more of similar import ! Mat. 15:1—20. SCOTT.

them, more than what we find contained in the Holy Scriptures.

V. 16, 17. Here we have the apostle's earnest prayer for them, to our Lord Jesus Christ Himself, and God, even our Father. We may, and should, direct our prayers, not only to God the Father, through the mediation of our Lord Jesus Christ, but also to our Lord Jesus Christ Himself ; and should pray in his name unto God, not only as his Father, but as our Father in and through Him.

He takes encouragement in his prayer,—from the consideration of what God had already done for him and them, v. 16. Where, observe, The love of God is the spring and fountain of all the good we have or hope for ; our election, vocation, justification, and salvation. From this fountain in particular all our consolation flows. And the consolation of saints is an everlasting consolation, founded on the hope of eternal life, that good hope, which is grounded on the love and promise of God, and the experience they have had of the power, goodness, and faithfulness of God ; and it is good hope through grace, the free grace and mercy of God, and not through any worth or merit of their own.

PRACT. OBS. V. 13—17. Many can well remember the time, when they despised or hated the doctrines of Scripture, and preferred soothing errors, nay, some of us seemed awfully to provoke God 'to send us strong delusion to believe a lie,' and we should certainly have held it fast, if we had been left to ourselves. If then it be now otherwise, we may thankfully ascribe it to the love of God, to his special unmerited mercy and grace, who from the 'beginning chose us unto salvation, through sanctification of the Spirit, and belief of the truth.' But let none conclude themselves chosen and called, who are strangers to the 'sanctification of the Spirit unto obedience, and sprinkling of the blood of Jesus.' (Notes, 2 Tim. 1:9. 1 Pet. 1:1, 2.) Let none place saving

V. 16, 17. 'From its simplicity, the Gospel derives advantages in consolation. Grief, whether in the learned or illiterate, is always simple. A man bowed down under calamity, has no relish for investigation. His powers relax. He leans upon his Comforter ; his support must be without toil, or his spirit faints. Conformably to these reflections, we see, on the one hand, that the unlearned compose the bulk of Christians ; the life of whose souls is in the substantial doctrines of the cross,—and on the other, that, in the time of affliction, even the careless lend their ear to the voice of revelation. Precious at all times to the believer, it is doubly so in the hour of trial. These things prove, not only that the Gospel, when understood, gives a peculiar relief in trouble, but that it is readily apprehended ; being most acceptable when we are least inclined to critical research.'

Rev. Dr. J. M. MASON.
NOTES. CHAP. III. V. 1—5. Unreasonable, &c.] Perverse and wicked men, such as the Jewish zealots were ; the blind devotees of the pagan idolatry, whom the Jews stirred up to aid their persecutions, may also be intended. Notwithstanding the abundance of miracles, and

He asks of God for them,—that He would comfort their hearts, and establish them in every good word and work, v. 17. It is observable how comfort and establishment are here joined together. Note, Comfort is a mean of establishment ; and our establishment in the ways of God is a likely mean in order to comfort ; whereas, if we are wavering in faith, and of a doubtful mind, or if we are halting and faltering in our duty, no wonder if we are strangers to the pleasures and joys of religion. We must be established in every good word and work, in the word of truth and the work of righteousness: Christ must be honored by our good works and good words ; and they who are sincere will endeavor to do both ; and in so doing they may hope for comfort and establishment, till at length their holiness and happiness be completed.

CHAP. III. V. 1—5. In these words, observe,

1. The apostle desires the prayers of his friends, v. 1. He always remembered them, and would not have them forget him and his fellow-laborers. Note, This is one way the communion of saints is kept up, by their praying with one another, and for one another, when absent one from another : they who are at a great distance, may meet together at the throne of grace ; and they who are not capable of doing or receiving any other kindness, may yet, this way, do and receive real and very great kindness. People should pray for their ministers ; and ministers should desire the prayers of their people, after the humble, engaging example of this great apostle. Observe, what he desires and directs them to pray for.

1. For the success of the gospel-ministry, v. 1. This was the great thing blessed Paul was most solicitous about. All the forces of hell were then, and still are, more or less, raised and mustered to oppose the Word of the Lord ; we should pray, therefore, that oppositions may be removed, that so the Gospel may have free course to the ears, the hearts, and the consciences of men, that it may be glorified in the conviction and conversion of sinners, the confutation of gainsayers, and the holy conversation of the saints. Paul was now at Athens, or, as some think, at Corinth, and would have the Thessalonians pray that he might have as good success there, as he had at Thessalonica, that it might be as well with others even as it was with them.

2. For the safety of gospel-ministers. He asks their prayers, not for preferment, but for preservation, v. 2. Note, They who are enemies to the preaching of the Gospel, and persecutors of the faithful preachers of it, are unreasonable and wicked men. They act against all the rules and laws of reason and religion, and are guilty of the greatest absurdity and impiety. Faithful ministers need protection as well as assistance ; for standard-bearers are most struck at ; therefore, all who wish well to the interest of Christ in the world, should pray for them. For all men have not faith ; many do not believe the Gospel ; will not embrace it, and are restless and malicious in their endeavors to oppose it, decry the ministry, and disgrace the ministers of the Word : and too many have not common faith or honesty ; we can safely put no confidence in them ; from such we should pray to be delivered. We may sometimes be in as much or more danger from false and pretended friends, as from open and avowed enemies.

II. He encourages them to trust in God. We should not only pray to God for his grace, but also trust and confide in his grace, and humbly expect what we pray for. Observe,

1. The best Christians need establishment and preservation from evil. This the apostle had prayed for on their behalf, ch. 2:17. and now he encourages them to expect this favor : we as much need the grace of God for our perseverance to the end, as for the beginning of the good work.

2. What encouragement we have to depend on the grace of God ; The Lord is faithful. When once the promise is made, performance is sure and certain. He is a faithful God, a faithful Friend ; we may depend on his filling up all the relations He stands in to his people. Let it be our care to be true and faithful in our promises, and to the relations we stand in to this faithful God. He adds,

3. A further ground of hope that God would do this for them, seeing they did and would do the things they were commanded, v. 4. The apostle had this confidence in them, and that was founded on his confidence in God ; for there is otherwise no confidence in man : and it is one ground to hope, that whatsoever we ask of God, we shall receive of Him, because we keep his commandments, and do those things that are pleasing in his sight, 1 John 3:22.

III. He makes a short prayer for them, v. 5. a prayer for spiritual blessings. Two things of the greatest importance he prays for : 1. That their hearts might be brought into the love of God, as the most excellent and amiable Being, which is not only most reasonable and necessary in order to our happiness, but is our happiness itself ; and this we never can attain, unless God, by his grace, direct our hearts aright, for our love is apt to go astray after other things. Note, We sustain great damage by misplacing our affections on wrong objects. If faith in anything, but real, efficacious 'belief of the truth,' as revealed in Scripture. This 'belief of the truth' brings the sinner to rely on Christ, and thus to love and obey Him ; it is sealed by the Holy Spirit on his heart, and it prepares him for the glory of our Lord Jesus Christ in heaven. Let us then stand fast in this doctrine of the apostles, and reject all spurious additions from every quarter ; let us not hesitate to pray 'to our Lord Jesus Himself,' as well as to our loving 'God and Father,' that our interest in his 'everlasting consolation, and good hope through grace,' may be proved, not only by his 'comforting our hearts,' but by his 'establishing us in every good word and work.' SCOTT.

the fulfilment of prophecies, which evinced the truth of the Gospel, 'all men had not faith' to believe it, that being the effect of a divine power on the heart, which overcame the carnal pride, obstinacy, and enmity of fallen nature. Probably, some Judaizing Christians secretly concurred with more open enemies, in attempting the life of the apostle ; and these false brethren, having no real faith in Christ, were also destitute of faithfulness, in their professed friendship to him and his fellow-laborers, so that no confidence could be placed in them. As it is the work of the Holy Spirit, to direct and lead the soul into these holy tempers, and a consistent conduct ; and as 'the Lord' is here mentioned, distinct from God, and from Christ, it has been supposed, with some probability, that the apostle addressed this prayer personally to the Holy Spirit, 'the Lord the Spirit,' the third person in the adorable Trinity. PRACT. OBS. V. 1—5. The success of the Gospel is as really promoted by fervent prayer, as by faithful preaching. — Our whole dependence must be on the faithfulness of God to his promises, who will surely establish those who humbly rely on Him by obedient faith, and preserve them from every fatal snare, to his heavenly kingdom. V. 6—9. The church at Thessalonica was in general deserving of high commendation; but the apostle had occasion to speak with authority and implied reproof, in one particular, of which he had before given some intimation. 1 Thess. 4:9—12.—(6) Withdraw. 'It is taken from sailors, who, by a banded course, avoid a rock. To refrain from that to which the eagerness of the mind carries one forward.' ERAMUS. Thus Joseph, while his heart was full of love to his brethren, refrained himself, and spake roughly to them, for their good.

(9.) Follow us. 'Imitate us in a frugal and industrious life.' DODDR. V. 10—12. Perhaps the apostle had perceived a disposition, in some persons at Thessalonica, to make religion a pretence for indolence, and for subsisting on the hospitality and liberality of their brethren, without working at their own trades or occupations.—How they might fall into this evil is easy to conceive. Persons all alive to God and his Christ, and knowing little of the deceitfulness of the heart, and the crafts of Satan, might find it irksome to attend to the concerns of this life. It was a fault indeed, and very dangerous if persisted in, but as it was soon corrected, in all probability, and in part occasioned by the strength of heavenly affections, one cannot be very severe in censuring it. . . . It may be worth while for those, who feel themselves much irritated against similar evils, attending on the outpouring of the Holy Spirit in our days, to consider, whether they do not exercise more candor toward the Thessalonians, and respect them as real Christians, while they scorn those, who walk in their steps, as enthusiasts.' JOS. MINOR, Ec. History.—The apostle, however, being fully aware of the consequences, had when he was with them commanded them, not to maintain in idleness such as could work and would not, either by private or public charity: that, being left to endure the pinchings of hunger and want, they might be compelled to attend to their proper duty.—God gives everything to man in the way of labor; and, in fact, in all cases, the industrious part of every community maintains the stolthful. (M. R. c. d.) The words may indeed signify, 'If any man refuse to work, he ought by all means to live without food; but, if that be impossible, let him thence learn to consider how unreasonable and iniquitous idleness is;' by which a man, who cannot but consume, does nothing to replenish the stores, which are thus exhausted. The expression was for substance a proverb among the Jews.—'They state it wrong, who render it, Let him not eat who does not work; for none are more deserving of relief from others, than they, who, through some just and necessary impediment, cannot labor though

God direct our love aright on Himself, the rest of the affections will thereby be rectified. 2. That a patient waiting for Christ might be joined with this love of God. Waiting for Christ supposes our faith in Him, that we believe He came once in flesh, and will come again in glory: and this we must expect, and be careful to get ready for, enduring with courage and constancy all that we may meet with in the mean time: and we have need of patience, need of divine grace, to exercise Christian patience, the patience of Christ, (so some,) patience for Christ's sake, and after Christ's example.

V. 6—15. The apostle, having commended their obedience for the time past, and mentioned his confidence in it for the time to come, proceeds to command and direct some who were faulty. Observe, The best society may have faulty persons in it: but evil manners beget good laws; the disorders Paul heard of as existing among the Thessalonians, occasioned the good laws we find in these vs., which are of constant use to us, and all others whom they may concern. Observe,

I. What was amiss among the Thessalonians, v. 6. Some were guilty of disorderly walking; not living regularly, or agreeably to their profession of religion. In particular, some were idle,—busy-bodies, v. 11. This the apostle was so credibly informed of, that he had sufficient reason to command and direct, with relation to such, how they ought to behave, and how the church should act toward them.

It does not appear, that they were gluttons or drunkards, but idle, and therefore disorderly. Probably, they had a notion (by misunderstanding some passages in the former epistle) of the near approach of Christ's coming, which served them for a pretence to leave their callings, and live in idleness. Note, It is an abuse of religion, to make it a cloak for idleness, or any other sin. If we were sure the day of judgment were ever so near, we must, notwithstanding, do the work of the day in its day, that when our Lord comes, He may find us so doing. Or, it may be, these disorderly persons pretended, that the liberty wherewith Christ had made them free, discharged them from the services and business of their particular callings and employments in the world: whereas, they were to abide in the same calling wherein they were called of God, and therein abide with God, 1 Cor. 7: 20, 24. Industry in our particular callings as men, is a duty required of us by our general calling as Christians. Or, perhaps, the general charity that was then among Christians to their poor brethren, encouraged some to live in idleness, as knowing the church would maintain them: whatever was the cause, they were much to blame.

It may seem a contradiction, that the same persons who were idle, were busy-bodies also; but most commonly persons who have no business of their own, or who neglect that, busy themselves in other men's matters. If we are idle, the devil and a corrupt heart will soon find us somewhat to do. The mind of man is a busy thing; if it be not employed in doing good, it will be doing evil. Note, Busy-bodies are disorderly walkers, curious, and impertinent, meddling with things that do not concern them, and troubling themselves and others with other men's matters. The apostle warns Timothy, 1 Tim. 5: 13. to beware of such.

II. The good laws occasioned by these evil manners. Concerning which we may notice,

1. Whose laws they are: viz. those of the apostles of our Lord, given in the name of their Lord and ours, v. 6, 12. The apostle uses words of authority and entreaty; and where disorders are to be rectified or prevented, there is need of both. The authority of Christ should awe our minds to incline and enable us, perseveringly, and without reserve, to obey all his commands, and that 'the Lord the Spirit' may 'direct our hearts into the love of God, and the patience of Christ,' and persevering diligence in every good work. Jude 20, 21. SCOTT.

they greatly desire it.' BEZA.—This venerable reformer here takes occasion to expose the mendicant monks and friars, as exactly answering the character described by St. Paul.—How far relieving vagrant beggars, of whose character or incapacity for labor, we know nothing, can consist with this rule, is worthy of inquiry. Certainly the money might be almost always better employed. Luke 13: 35—43.—Whatever rank men sustain, they are mere drones in the hive, unless they fill up the duties of their station for the common benefit. Christians, therefore, should not countenance such evident injustice, especially as this has always been one of the slanders raised against the professed worshippers of God. Ex. 5: 8, 9, 15—23. P. O. 1—9.—The kindness required from believers, and to which they are propense, as under the influence of holy love, often gives stoltful persons an opportunity, on various pretences, to seek exemption from labor, by which they become useless and mischievous; they and their families are often reduced to great distress; debts are contracted which they cannot pay; and that bounty is diverted into a wrong channel, which should encourage the industrious poor, and support the sick and afflicted. The apostle therefore reminded his beloved children at Thessalonica of this rule, because he heard, that there were some of these 'disorderly' persons among them, who did not work at their own trades or callings, but expected to be maintained in idleness by their brethren. These would naturally contract a sauntering, gossiping habit, and would indulge a talkative, curious, and conceited temper, and, having much leisure, they would intermeddle with other men's concerns, to the disturbance of families, by exciting suspicions and jealousies among neighbors; and to the injury of men's characters. But the apostle commanded, and charged them, in the name of Christ, and as they would stand accepted before his tribunal, to cease from this officiousness, and to attend to their own labor, with humility, modesty, contentment, and peaceable industry; that, thus subsisting on their own earnings, they might 'eat their own bread,' and not consume what properly belonged to others. Ex. 20: 15. Mat. 6: 11. The difficulty, which modern missionaries, in most parts of the world, find, in bringing those among whom they labor to habits of regular industry, the absolute necessity of doing this in order to any permanent success, and the very great impediments which indolence, as to regular daily employment, places in their way, well illustrates the necessity and importance of the apostle's charge in this particular. In all places, where missions have permanently succeeded, the converts, however indolent in mind or body before, have become industrious in some regular employment. SCOTT.

2. What the good laws and rules are. The apostle commands and directs the whole church how they should behave towards disorderly persons, v. 6. We must be very cautious in church-censures and church-discipline. We must Note that man ; that is, have sufficient proof of his fault before we proceed further. Next, we must Admonish him, in a friendly manner, and this privately, Mat. 18:15. Then, if he will not hear, we must Withdraw from him, and not keep company with him; that is, we must avoid his familiar converse and society ; for two reasons, namely, that we may not learn his evil ways ; and may shame, and so reform him. Love should be the motive of our withdrawing ; for if those who are under the censures of the church, be reclaimed and reformed thereby, they will recover their credit and comfort, and right to church-privileges as brethren. The general con-

PRACT. OBS. V. 6—18. Pious men are often betrayed into a disregard to this rule, through humility and tenderness ; by which means the misconduct of one professed believer turns to the scandal of his profession, and he himself is soothed into carnal security, by an ill-judged and unkind lenity.—When difficulties occur respecting public discipline, believers of every denomination might agree, in separating from disorderly walkers, with proper admonitions and exhortations ; that thus being ' put to shame ' they might be brought to repentance.—It is peculiarly incumbent on ministers, to show the tendency of their doctrine in their own conduct, that the people may perceive ' how they ought to imitate them.' It is not, indeed, required, or generally expected, that they should ' labor and toil, night and day, to avoid being chargeable ' to the people. Yet they should be very careful to avoid every appearance of selfishness, indolence, or an encroaching spirit ; and they must eth to the gallows, and causeth the bewailing of so many untimely deaths ? What causeth so many diseases in the body ? Whereof rise mutterings in the city against magistrates ? Whereof rise rebellions in kingdoms ? You can give no greater cause thereof than idleness. ' Behold (saith the Lord, Ez. 16:49.), this was the iniquity of thy sister Sodom, pride, fulness of bread, and abundance of idleness.' This called for fire from heaven, and wasted so many cities into ashes. If we shall make account for our idle words, (Mat. 12.) what shall we do for our idle hands, for our idle feet, for our idle body, for our idle soul ? What account for all our idleness, shall we make at the day of judgment ? ' If any will not work, the same shall not eat,' is a hard saying. Yet, saith Paul, I have kept it. He doth not say, If any be sick, or weak, or impotent, and cannot work ; but if any be idle, and froward, and will not work, to such an one give not to eat ; that so he may see the danger of idleness, [and feeling God's punishment for its transgression, may learn his law of labor,] and ' work with his hands, that he may give him that needeth.' (Eph. 4.)—But you will say, kings, and counsellors, bishops, preachers, and all other sorts of learned men, neither plough, nor sow, nor hedge, nor ditch, nor use such painful labor of the body ; they sit at rest and live idly. They that so think are deceived : the toil which princes take, and the great cares wherewith they are occupied, pass all other cares. . . . If a bishop, or minister, study the Scriptures, preach the Gospel, catechize the children, and take a care of the souls of God's people ; if he sow the Lord's field, feed the Lord's flock, thresh the Lord's corn, and walk before the people carefully ; if he have the care of the churches, and can say with the apostle (2 Cor 11.), ' Who is weak, and I am not weak ? who is offended, and I hurt not ? ' any offence that is given to my brother, is to me as a fire, or as a torment : if he be instant in season and out of season ; if he do the work of an evangelist, and make his ministry fully known, he shall find himself occupied. . . . The master of the ship seemeth to be idle, to sit still and do nothing ; he stirreth not the pump, he driveth not the oars, he soundeth not the deep, he rideth not the ropes, he scaleth not the shrouds, he runneth not hither and thither, forward and backward, under the hatches or above ; he duct and behavior of the church, should accord with the good example which the apostle, and those who were with him, had given them, v. 7. particularly in diligence, so different from the disorderly walkers. He took pains in his ministry to get his own living, v. 8. He might justly have demanded a maintenance, because they who preach the Gospel may of right expect to live by the Gospel, v. 9. but he waived his right from affection to them, and for the sake of the Gospel, and that he might be an example for them, v. 9. that they might learn how to fill up time, and always be employed in somewhat that would turn to good account.

He commands and directs those that lived idle lives, to reform, and set themselves to their business, v. 10. It was a proverbial speech among the Jews, He who does not labor, does not deserve to eat. It is the will of God, that every man should have a calling, and make his business of it, and not live like a useless drone in the world. It was not the mere humor of the apostle, but the command of Jesus Christ, that with quietness we work, and eat our own bread, v. 12. Men ought, some way or other, to earn their own living, otherwise they do not eat their own bread. Observe, There must be work or labor, in opposition to idleness ; and quietness, in opposition to being busy-bodies in other men's matters. We must study to be quiet, and do our own business. This is an excellent but rare composition, to be of an active, yet quiet spirit ; active in our own business, yet quiet as to other people's. He exhorts those that did well, not to be weary in well-doing, v. 13. ' Go on and prosper. The Lord is with you while you are with Him. See that whatever you do, that is good, you persevere in. You must never give over, or tire in your work. It will be time enough to rest when you come to heaven, that everlasting rest which remains for the people of God.'

V. 16—18. In this conclusion of the epistle we have the apostle's benediction and prayers for these Thessalonians. Let often give up their own interest, indulgence, and inclination, to make themselves an example to the people, and to give energy to their instructions.—It would indeed be deemed rigorous, should we enforce the apostle's rule, ' that if any willet not to work, neither shall he eat ; ' yet, in fact, it is founded in equity and love. It is injustice to the indigent, the weak, and the industrious, when the bounty of their brethren is wasted on the indolent and extravagant. The greatest kindness, which can be shown to the latter, is to constrain them, if possible, ' to labor, working with their own hands the thing which is good ; ' this alone can preserve them from mischief, temptation, and misery. Eph. 4:28. Persons of this description ought, therefore, to be discountenanced, rebuked, ' commanded from the Lord Jesus, with quietness to labor and eat their own bread,' and, if they refuse, censured, noted, [starved,] and shunned by all believers, till brought to repentance. SCOTT.

sitteth still, holdeth his peace, and looketh upon the loadstar, and in appearance doth nothing. But his labor passeth all the rest ; without it all the pains the other mariners take were lost. Even so fareth it in the state of princes and their counsellors. . . . Bp. JEWELL.

V. 13. As the bad use, which some individuals made of the liberality and hospitality of their brethren, tended to damp the ardor of Christian charity, the apostle thought it necessary to caution them against ' growing weary in well doing,' in this or in any other instance. Gal. 6:6—10. SC. (13.) Not weary, &c. ' Diodati gives this an excellent turn : though some may abuse your liberality, be not deterred thereby from works of charity.' DODD.

V. 14, 15. (14) By this epistle, note that man. ' Signify that man by an epistle.' The article before epistle seems to exclude this construction. ' Set a mark or brand of disgrace on him, that all may know and avoid him,' as the Roman censors used to brand ignominious citizens.—Have no company. See on 1 Cor. 5:9.—That he may be ashamed. Tit. 2:2. See on Mat. 21:37.—(15) Admonish him as a brother. 1 Thes. 5:12, 14. See on Acts 20:31.—1. These exhortations are evidently addressed to all the brethren in general. . . . 2. The apostle exhorts them to own them as Christian brethren, (which they at present did not,) who by excommunication are excluded from the church. Whit. It indeed is probable, that excommunication was not meant ; but such tokens of general disapprobation, as came short of that solemn exclusion, which was reserved for the public censure of the church by its ministers on more scandalous offenders.—Thus the Corinthians were charged to excommunicate the incestuous person, and him only, though there were others, with whom they were forbidden even to eat. 1 Cor. 5:1—5, 9—13. SCOTT.

(15.) ' Few admonitory precepts better speak the mild, gentle, and forgiving spirit of the Gospel than this.' HEWL.—' The end of excommunication is, not to drive from the church such as have fallen, but to win them to the church by amendment. Bishop's Bible, in HENAY, abr.

OF THE
PAUL TO TIMOTHY,
WITH
PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS AND NOTES.

(Henry's Exposition, completed by Mr. Atkinson.)

HITHERTO Paul's epistles were directed to churches; now follow some to particular persons; as Timothy, Titus, and Philemon; all three ministers. Timothy and Titus were evangelists, an inferior order to the apostles, as appears by Eph. 4:11. Their commission and work was much the same with that of the apostles, to plant and water churches; accordingly they were itinerants. Timothy was first converted by Paul, Acts 16:3. therefore Paul calls him his own son in the faith.

The scope of these two epistles, is, to direct Timothy how to discharge his office as an evangelist at Ephesus, where he now was, and where Paul ordered him for some time to reside, to perfect the good work he had begun there. As for the ordinary pastoral charge of that church, he had very solemnly committed it to the Presbytery, as appears from Acts 20:28. where he charges the presbyters to feed the flock of God, which He had purchased with his own blood. HENRY.

The time, when this epistle was written, constitutes the principal difficulty respecting it. * It was long the general opinion, that the apostle wrote it soon after he was driven from Ephesus, on account of the tumult excited by Demetrius and his craftsmen. Acts 19:21—40. 20:1. As the difficulties of this ancient opinion seem far less than those of the other, (see note †), I adhere, though with diffidence, to it, and shall comment on the epistle accordingly.—The history, in the Acts of the Apostles, implies, that Timothy continued with the apostle, during his progress through Macedonia, and his abode at Corinth; and that he returned with him through Macedonia into Asia. But Timothy is not afterwards mentioned, as accompanying the apostle, either to Jerusalem, or in his subsequent imprisonment at Cesarea, or in his voyage to Rome; and it is probable, that he abode in Asia; and, accompanying the elders of Ephesus, when they parted from the apostles, he settled at that city for some years, according to the ancient records of the church concerning him.—But, when four years or nearly had passed, it seems that he went to the apostle at Rome, and was imprisoned with him, but was soon set at liberty, and sent to Philippi. (Phil. 2:19. Heb. 13:23.)—In respect to Timothy, it is sufficient to refer to the account before given of his appointment to be Paul's companion in travel. (Notes, Acts 16:1—5.) Having been trained up under the apostle's immediate care, he imbibed, in an extraordinary degree, his spirit and principles, and was peculiarly beloved by him. The apostle, when suddenly driven from Ephesus, had left Timothy behind him to settle the concerns of that church, in the best manner he could; and wrote this epistle to him for his direction in so doing.—Whether the above conjecture (for we have no authentic records to direct us), of Timothy's return to Ephesus, and residence there, be well grounded, or not, these directions would not be in vain; for the substance of them would be equally applicable in any other church, to which he might be sent, or in which he might have resided.—Indeed, it does not appear, that the apostle intended to give Timothy instructions exclusively, or even principally, respecting the Ephesian church; but rather general counsels for his conduct in the churches of Christ; and for that of all others, when called to act in similar circumstances.—'Having done the work for which he was bid to stay at Ephesus, he might go on to other places, doing the work of an evangelist, and settling ordinary church-governors, bishops, presbyters, and deacons, where they were wanting, and doing all other things mentioned in this epistle, as things to be performed in the church of God.' Whit.—The epistle contains cautions against false teachers; directions concerning the worship of God, and behavior of believers; the character and conduct to be required in bishops and deacons, and their families; exhortations to Timothy, concerning his private and public behavior, especially in ordaining ministers, censuring offenders, and settling the other affairs of the church; admonitions against several sins and temptations; solemn charges to faithfulness, and various doctrinal and practical counsels and instructions interwoven with them. This, and the two following epistles, are peculiarly replete with instruction to ministers, and should be continually studied and meditated on, by all who bear that sacred character, or are preparing for the good work of the ministry.—The postscript dates the epistle from Laodicea; but it is almost certain the apostle had never visited that city when he wrote this epistle. Col. 2:1. SCOTT.

* Respecting its date, Doddr., after Athanasius, Theod., Baronius, Capellus, Blondel, Ham., Grot., Salmassius, Light., and Beason, inclines to the earlier, i. e. 56 or 58; and Mackn., after Le Clerc, L'Enfant, Cave, Fabricius, Mill, Whitby, and others, to the later, i. e. 64 or 65: in which also accords Ros., and Horne, whom see; as also Supplement. Ep.

† But several very learned and respectable men have, in moderate times, started objections against this opinion, which they think insurmountable.—There is no reasonable doubt, that the Second Epistle to the Corinthians was written, during the apostle's abode in Macedonia, after he came thither from Ephesus. But it is evident that Timothy was with him when he wrote that epistle; for his name is inserted in the superscription. (2 Cor. 1:1. Note, 2 Cor. 2:12, 12.)—How then, say they, could he have been left at Ephesus, and entreated to abide there? (1:3.)—And as to the only solution of the difficulty, which can be thought of, viz. that Timothy might follow . . . so soon after as to be with the apostle in Macedonia, when he wrote his epistle to the Corinthians, that supposition is inconsistent with the tenor and tenor of the epistle throughout. For the writer speaks uniformly of his intention to return to Timothy at Ephesus; and not of his expecting Timothy to come to him in Macedonia. (3:14, 15. 4:13.)—Therefore I concur with Bp. Pearson, in placing the date of the epistle, and the history referred to in it, at a period subsequent to Paul's first imprisonment, and consequently subsequent to the era, up to which the Acts of the Apostles bring his history. Paley. This is a fair statement of the main objection; though some things of inferior moment will require a little attention. It may, however, be questioned, whether the conclusion here deduced, does not lie open to still more insuperable objections. Some regard may be due to the total silence of the Scripture, as to any subsequent visit of the apostle to Ephesus, and his departure thence to Macedonia.—It is, indeed, allowed, that during his imprisonment at Rome, he mentions, in his epistles, a purpose of visiting several places in the eastern regions. (Phil. 2:24. Philem. 22. Heb. 13:19, 23.) And in 2 Tim., it appears, that he had been at several places in the neighborhood of Ephesus. Still, however, there is no intimation that he visited Ephesus. He observes, in the close of this epistle, that he had sent Tychicus to Ephesus; which may imply, he had not gone thither himself.—Indeed, whether it be allowed, according to historical records, which are not very satisfactory, that he hastened from Crete to Rome, hearing accounts which induced him to think his presence there necessary; or whether his persecutors seized on him, and conveyed him to Rome, in an unexpected manner; it seems evident, that he was hurried out of these regions, before he had time to accomplish his purposes, in the manner he wished. (Notes, 2 Tim. 4:12—20.) It might also be brought as an objection to this opinion, that Timothy, after the conclusion of Paul's first imprisonment at Rome, must, on any computation, have been above 39 years of age; and though, at that time of life, the exhortation to flee youthful lusts might not be unseasonable; (2 Tim. 2:22.) yet the caution, 'Let no man despise thy youth,' (4:12.) seems not so consistent.—But the grand difficulty arises from the words of the apostle to the Ephesian elders at Miletus; 'And now, behold, I know that ye all, among whom I have gone preaching the kingdom of God, shall see my face no more.' It is evident, that the persons present understood this, not as a conjecture, or as a 'desponding inference,' but as a prediction. When the apostle perceived the overwhelming sorrow it had excited in them, he neither retracted nor qualified it; and it seems unquestionable that the historian records it as a prophecy. (Notes, Acts 20:25—27, 36—38.) The words 'Ye all, &c.' confine the interpretation to the persons present; the prediction, therefore, would be exactly fulfilled, though the apostle visited many places in that neighborhood; nay, though he purposed (which is not likely) to visit Ephesus, provided he did not actually go thither, or meet any of the elders to whom he gave the charge at Miletus.—It can hardly be supposed, that after an absence of perhaps rather more than ten years, the apostle, revisiting Ephesus, found, that all the elders whom he addressed at Miletus were dead. But, except on this very improbable supposition, or on that of the words before adduced being a mere conjecture, in which the event proved the apostle to have been mistaken; we must adhere to the old opinion, that this epistle was written immediately after the apostle had left Ephesus to go into Macedonia; because it is, on every other supposition, almost, if not absolutely certain, he never after left Ephesus to go into Macedonia. But let us next consider, whether the objections above so cogently stated, against the ancient opinion, may not be satisfactorily answered.—The apostle must have spent some considerable time in Macedonia, after he left Ephesus, and before he went to Corinth, for 'he went over those parts, and gave them much exhortation.' (Acts 20:2.) Now, it is not in the least improbable, that unforeseen circumstances might induce Timothy to leave Ephesus, sooner than either he or the apostle had intended. The violence of the persecutors might drive him thence, or he might need some counsel and instruction, in respect of the false teachers, or on some special points, which had occurred to him concerning the state of the church.—Various circumstances, indeed, might render it inexpedient for him to continue at Ephesus, according to the plan at first formed. On the other hand, it is probable, the apostle wrote this epistle as soon as he arrived in Macedonia, and at that time he might fully purpose, and confidently hope, to go to Timothy at Ephesus, and yet be disappointed.—Thus, he had 'once and again' purposed to return to Thessalonica; 'but Satan hindered him.' (1 Thes. 2:18.) Thus he had seen cause, to alter his plan, in respect of going to Corinth, even after giving some intimations of it. (Notes, 2 Cor. 1:15—20.)—It may not improbably be conjectured, that when he left Ephesus, he expected Timothy would abide there, till he had accomplished his business in Macedonia and Achaia, and should go to him at Ephesus, as he took his voyage to Jerusalem with the contributions of the churches; but, having been induced, by the malicious designs of the Jews, to go from Corinth through Macedonia, so much time had elapsed, that he found it necessary to sail past Ephesus, lest he should not arrive at Jerusalem by the feast of Pentecost. This might derange one part of his plan, and Timothy's departure from Ephesus would defeat another. (Acts 20:1—6, 13—16.) SCOTT.

NOTES. CHAP. I. V. 1, 2. In this address, Paul called himself 'an apostle of Jesus Christ, by the commandment of God our Savior,' by which, in this connexion, the Person of the Father seems intended, as purposing salvation for sinners, forming the plan of it, and giving his own Son to be in human nature their Savior; but the Lord Jesus was joined in granting this commission, as being one with the Father, in essence, authority, and counsel. The apostle called 'the Lord Jesus our Hope,' as all his hope of salvation and eternal happiness was fixed on the Person, righteousness, atonement, and mediation of Christ.—From the exuberance of his love to Timothy, he added the word 'mercy' to his usual salutation, or perhaps because his peculiar trials and services would require peculiar consolations, from the compassion and mercy of the Lord towards him. (Marg. Ref. e—g.)—(1) God our Savior. 'The Father saves us, as reconciled to Him in the Son, and the Son saves us, as reconciled in his flesh.' Beza.

(2.) My own son. Ros. thinks, from 2 Tim. 3:10. that Timothy had been from his earliest years committed to Paul, to be trained up after his example, which Bl. seems to favor, and regards it as an evidence that Timothy was his convert; but Doddr. says, it is not certain, from the history, that Timothy was first converted by Paul, and suggests, that he calls him his son, chiefly to express the parental affection he had for him, and the complacency he found in that assistance he had received from him in the work of the ministry, and in the filial reverence and affection which he expressed to the apostle. Ep.

V. 3, 4. The apostle left Timothy at Ephesus, when he went thence into Macedonia; (Pref.) that he might solemnly and constantly charge certain persons to teach no other doctrines, than what he had done. (Note, Gal. 1:6—10.) The Judaizers would be sure to take the opportunity of Paul's absence to propagate their tenets; and he knew them to be zealous for the traditions and fabulous pretences of the elders and Pharisees, as well as for the Mosaic law. But the Ephesians must be warned not to notice such fables, or their genealogies, relating to their descent from Abraham, or the patriarchs, or from Aaron, or David, by which they imagined themselves entitled to peculiar privileges.—Some imagine, that 'endless genealogies' denote the extravagant and indeed unintelligible notions of the Gnostics and other heretics, [see on the Gospel of John, in Supplement.] about the origin of the world, and various fictions and vain imaginations, Til. 3:9. but the context seems to determine in favor of the interpretation before given, and it may well be questioned, whether any of these heretics had, at so early a period, openly propagated their incoherent and profane jargon. Scott.

(4.) Fables. Both Jews and Gentiles abounded with fabulous peace, from God our Father. Some have observed, that whereas, in all the epistles to the churches, the apostolical benediction is grace and peace; in these two to Timothy, and that of Titus, it is grace, mercy, and peace: as if ministers had more need of God's mercy than other men: and if Timothy, so eminent a minister, must be indebted to the mercy of God, and needed the increase and continuance of it, how much more do we ministers, in these times, who have so little of his excellent spirit!

3. Paul tells Timothy what was the end of his appointing him to this office; I besought thee to abide at Ephesus. Timothy had a mind to go with Paul, was loath to go from him; but Paul would have it so, it was necessary for the public service; I besought thee, says he. His business was, to fix both the ministers and people of that church.

Ministers must not only be charged to preach the true doctrine of the Gospel, but charged to preach no other doctrine, Gal. 1:8.

In the times of the apostles there were attempts made to corrupt Christianity, 2 Cor. 2:17. otherwise this charge to Timothy might have been spared.

He must not only see to it, that he did not preach any other doctrine, but he must charge others that they might not add anything of their own to the Gospel, or take anything from it, but that they preach it pure and uncorrupt. As among the Jews there were some who brought Judaism into Christianity; so among the Gentiles there were some who brought Paganism into Christianity. These he must guard against. What ministers questions, is not for edifying; what gives occasion for doubtful disputes, pulls down the church rather than builds it up. And I think everything that ministers questions rather than godly edifying, should be disclaimed and disregarded by us, such as an uninterrupted succession in the ministry from the apostles down to these times, the necessity of episcopal ordination, and the intention of the minister to the efficacy and validity of the sacraments he administers. These are as bad as Jewish fables and endless genealogies, for they involve us in inextricable difficulties, and tend only to shake the foundations of a Christian's hope, and to fill his mind with perplexing doubts and fears: whereas, godly edifying is the end ministers should aim at in all their discourses, that Christians may improve in godliness, and grow up to a greater likeness to the blessed God. Observe, further, Godly edifying must be in faith: we build on the Gospel; it is by faith we come to God at first, Heb. 11:6. and in the same way, and by the same principle, we must be edified. Again, Ministers should avoid, as much as may be, what will occasion disputes; and would do well to insist on the great and practical points of religion, about which there can be no disputes; * for even disputes about great and necessary truths draw off the mind from the main design of Christianity, and eat out the vitals of religion, which consist in practice and obedience, as well as in faith, that we may not hold the truth in unrighteousness, but may keep the mystery of the faith in a pure conscience.

V. 5—11. Here the apostle instructs Timothy how to guard against the judaizing teachers, or others who mingled fables and endless genealogies with the Gospel. He shows the use of the law, and glory of the gospel.

1. The end of the law is to promote love, Rom. 13:8, 10. The main scope and drift of the divine law are, to engage us to the love of God, and one another; and surely the gospel, which obliges us to love our enemies, to do good to them that hate us, Mat. 5:44. does not design to lay aside or supersede a commandment, the end whereof is love; so far from it, that, on the other hand, we are told, that though we had all advantages, and wanted charity, we are but as sounding brass and a tinkling cymbal, 1 Cor. 13:1. John 13:35. Those, therefore, who boasted of their knowledge of the law, but used it only as a color to disturb the preaching of the gospel, under pretence of zeal for the law, dividing the church, and distracting it; defeated the very end of the commandment, love out of a pure heart, a heart purified by faith, purified from corrupt affections. Those who are careful to keep a good conscience, from a real belief of the truth of the Word of God, which enjoins it, here called, a faith unfeigned; those answer the end of the commandment.

tales, connected with their several superstitions.' WILLIAMS.—'These mythoi relate to the interpretations of the rabbies.' BL.—Genealogies. 'Not sons, as some understand, but tables of lineal descent, by which the Jews endeavored to prove their right as priests and Levites, or their alliance to the house of David.' Doddr.—So Bloomf. with Schoettg. Wets. understands it of Timothy's own genealogy; and others still, of cabalistical fables. Ed.

V. 5. The word rendered 'commandment,' is by some explained of the moral law, the scope and substance of which is 'charity,' or 'love,' towards God and man. Others understand it to mean, the revelation of God to men, by the gospel, the end of which is to restore fallen sinners to the love required by the law; and this latter suits the context. But others explain it of 'the charge' given to Timothy by the apostle, and this seems to be the right interpretation, for thus it had reference both to the law as the rule of duty, and to the grand design of the gospel.—The several characteristics of love, here given, admirably distinguish it from the spurious charity which is, in modern time, the favorite virtue of the world. Scott.

(5.) The commandment. 'The Gospel declaration.' Doddr.

V. 6, 7. From this love, and purity, and conscientiousness, some professed Christians had swerved, or deviated, out of zeal for external distinctions, legal observances, and human traditions. Thus they turned aside from the faith also, and got engaged in vain janglings, and angry controversies, about doubtful points of small consequence. For they were desirous of being 'teachers or doctors of the law,' and to exercise that office among Christians, in order to acquire a reputation for learning, and to be called Rabbi. (Notes, Mat. 23:5—10.) but they 'neither understood what they said, nor whereof they affirmed,' with full and unqualified confidence. They declaimed, in a perplexed and inconclusive manner, on general topics; not understanding the spiritual nature and uses of the moral law, which they attempted to explain, nor the typical import of those abrogated ceremonies, which they enforced. (Notes, 8—11. Ex. 20:1. John 1:17.) Scott.

(7.) Teachers of the law. 'They could not be the Gnostics, who declared an aversion to the law; not to insist on the argument of Irenæus, Clement, and Jerome, in placing Valentinus, Carpocrates, Basilides, the founders of that sect, much lower.' Doddr.—Ros. thinks, they were judaizing teachers; and takes to be, in the sense of desiring to be thought to be, or affecting to be. Bloomf. suggests, further, that Christian teachers who united instruction in the law to that of the gospel, may be meant; and the old term be used, because such teachers were 'likely to cling to it.' Ed.

8 But we know that the law is good, if a man use it lawfully ;

9 Knowing this, that the law is not made for a righteous man, but for the lawless and disobedient, for the ungodly and for sinners, for unholy and profane, for murderers of fathers and murderers of mothers, for manslayers,

10 For whoremongers, for them that defile themselves with mankind, for men-stealers, for liars, for perjured persons, and if there be any other thing that is contrary to sound doctrine ;

11 According to the glorious gospel of the blessed God, which was committed to my trust.

[Practical Observations.]

12 And I thank Christ Jesus our Lord, who hath enabled me, for that he counted me faithful, putting me into the ministry :

13 Who was before a blasphemer, and a persecutor, and injurious : but I obtained mercy, because I did it ignorantly in unbelief.

Here we have the concomitants of that excellent grace, charity ; a pure heart, a good conscience, Acts 24:16. and faith unfeigned. Some swerved from the very end of the commandment : they set up for dis-

PRACT. OBS. V. 1—11. Apostles themselves, as well as the most eminent ministers in every age, who have evidently been commissioned by 'God our Savior, and the Lord Jesus Christ,' have had no other ground of hope, as to the salvation of their own souls, than what they possessed in common with their meanest brethren. He, however, who appointed them, has always been ready to uphold and help them, and his strength is perfected in their weakness.—The design of the Gospel is not answered by speculation, and solving abstract questions, or 'giving heed to fables and endless' disputation ; but when sinners, through 'repentance towards God, and faith towards Christ Jesus,' are brought to the habitual exercise of holy 'love, out of a pure heart, a good conscience, and faith unfeigned.'—But alas ! in how many ways do men swerve from this plain and simple statement of the truth, and 'turn aside unto vain jangling !' Many, called Christian ministers, 'desire to be teachers of the law, knowing neither what they say, nor whereof they affirm ;' and thus a few fragments of morality are substituted, in the place of the holy Law, and the blessed 'Gospel of God our Savior !' Others know not, or acknowledge not, that the 'law is good when used

V. 8—11. As believers were righteous persons in God's appointed way, both as to their justified state and obedient conduct, the law was not enacted against them. Indeed, laws in general were not made to coerce the well-disposed subject, but the ill-affected ; and the case was the same in respect of the divine law. 'The law is not made against the righteous.' This seems a fair translation, and certainly is the meaning of the words.—'If a man use it lawfully,' 'that is,' says Theodoret, 'if he comply with the scope of it, which is to bring him to Christ. . . The law was not made to condemn the just man ; for against such there is no law condemning them, Gal. 5:23. but it lies against the lawless to condemn them.' Whitby.—After the general terms of 'lawless and disobedient,' which relate to the disregard and contempt of God's commandments, as manifested in the outward conduct, the apostle mentions the 'ungodly and sinners,' or those who neglect their duties to God and their neighbors, and 'unholy and profane,' which may refer to the gross sensuality and debauchery of multitudes, and that daring impiety commonly connected with it. He then enumerates some particular crimes of the most atrocious nature. Doubtless numerous instances of each were found among the Gentiles, and some perhaps among the bigoted Jews, who depended on the law, or on some law, and yet scandalously broke their own rule of conduct. (Rom. 2:12—20.) 'Men stealers' are inserted among these daring criminals, against whom the law of God directed its awful curses. (Note. Ex. 21:15—17.) These were persons who kidnapped men to sell them for slaves ; and this practice seems inseparable from the other iniquities and oppressions of slavery, nor can a slave-dealer by any means keep free from this atrocious criminality, if indeed 'the receiver be as bad as the thief.'—'They who make war for the inhuman purpose of selling the vanquished for slaves, as is the practice among African princes, are really man-stealers. And they who, like African traders, encourage their unchristian traffic, by purchasing that which they know to be thus unjustly acquired, are partakers in their crimes.' Mackn.—The clause should have been, 'know, or have reason to suspect.' This is the only species of theft which is punishable with death, by the law of God. Ex. 21:16.—The apostle did not mean, that none but persons of so infamous a character lay under 'the curse of the law,' but that it was directed against all other practices, which were 'contrary to sound doctrine,' or the salutary nature and tendency of the Christian revelation. (M. R. p.—Note, Tit. 2:1,2.) According puters, but their disputes proved vain jangling ; set up for teachers, but they pretended to teach others what they themselves did not understand. Observe, men intrude into the ministry while they are yet very ignorant of those things about which they are to speak ; they understand neither what they say, nor whereof they affirm, and are profitless teachers. The law was good, but the Jews used it as an engine to divide the church, a veil to the malicious opposition they made to the gospel of Christ ; they set it up for justification, and so used it unlawfully. We must not therefore think to set it aside, but use it lawfully, for the restraint of sin : when a divine appointment has been abused, call it back to its right use ; the law is still very useful as a rule of life, to teach us what is sin and what is duty. It is not made for a righteous man, it is not made for those who observe it, but for wicked persons, to restrain and check them, and stop vice and profaneness. It is the grace of God that changes men's hearts ; but the terrors of the law may be of use, to tie their hands and restrain their tongues. A righteous man does not want those restraints which are necessary for the wicked ; or at least the law is not made primarily and principally for the righteous, but for sinners of all sorts, whether in a greater or less measure, v. 9, 10. In this black roll of sinners, he particularly mentions breaches of the second table duties ; and then he closes his account with this, and if there be any other thing that is contrary to sound doctrine. Some understand this as an institution of a power in the civil magistrate to make laws against such notorious sinners as are specified, and to see those laws put in execution.

2. He shows the glory and grace of the lawfully,' and they declaim in so general a manner against the law and good works, that many conclude the commandments of God to be evil, or void of obligation in themselves, or of authority as the rule of a believer's conduct !—It is allowed, that few, in comparison, have been guilty of actual murder, parricide, men-stealing, or perjury ; that many are free from the guilt of adultery, and other still baser practices, and even of fornication. Yet the same corrupt nature is in us all ; and our enmity against God, and ingratitude to Him ; our disposition to disobey and despise parental authority, to hate and quarrel with our neighbors, to please ourselves, regardless of their good and the glory of God, and a variety of polluted thoughts and affections, lying and other vain words, and very many other things 'contrary to sound doctrine,' would expose us to the wrath of God, and justify Him in our final condemnation. Unless, therefore, we are 'made righteous by faith in Christ,' and truly repent, and forsake every sin, we are yet 'under the curse of the law,' even 'according to the gospel of the blessed God,' preached by Paul, and at the same time we are unmeet to share the holy felicity of heaven. SCOTT.

to this, every impenitent sinner, every man who allowed himself in the practice of any known transgression, remained under the covenant and curse of the law. This accorded to 'the gospel of the glory of the blessed God,' (Notes, 2 Cor. 4:5—6) as entrusted to the apostle, by which He displayed all his perfections in the most honorable and harmonious manner, by saving believers from their sins, as well as from wrath ; (Note, Rom. 2:12—16.) for, being 'the blessed God,' the Perfection and Source of felicity, as well as of holiness, He had devised to render fallen men partakers of his happiness, by renewing them to the participation of his holiness. Ps. 119:12. Heb. 12:9—11. SCOTT.

(9.) 'The thought seems evidently to be this : that a law (for there is no article to determine or confine it to the Jews) is chiefly intended to restrain men from actions injurious to the public. What it says, therefore, relates chiefly to crimes and their punishments.' DODD.

(10.) Horsley shows, that the word rendered "men-stealers" means a person who deals in men, literally, "a slave-trader." He maintains, that this text condemns and prohibits the slave-trade, in all its modes. It ranks the slave-trade next after parricide and homicide. BLOOMF. says, that all the crimes here mentioned are of the worst kind, and this seems as put for robbery, of the worst sort. 'Let, then, the slave-traders of our times tremble ; for all who any way participate in that abominable traffic, uphold a system which perpetually engenders man-stealing.' HENRY, abr.

V. 12—14. This was, in all respects, most astonishing grace.—His ignorance and unbelief, indeed, amidst such abundant means of information and conviction, were the result of a self-sufficient, obstinate, and contemptuous prejudice against the truth ; but there were others, who were hurried on by malice, ambition, and selfishness, to act in direct opposition to the dictates of their own consciences, and thus to 'sin against the Holy Spirit,' by maliciously ascribing his undeniable operations to human imposture, or satanical influence. Mat. 12:31,32. Heb. 6:4—6. 10:26—31. 1 John 5:16—18. It is remarkable, that many persons have supposed Paul's proud and wilful ignorance, and his consequent unbelief, (two sins, in themselves deserving of divine wrath, though in his circumstances they just preserved him from the unpardonable sin,) to have been a kind of meritorious cause of his obtaining mercy, especially when joined with his sincerity in opposing the Gospel ! 2 Cor. 1:12—14, v. 12. They imagine that, in some manner or measure, 14 And the grace of our Lord was exceeding abundant, with faith and love which is in Christ Jesus.

15 This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptation, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners; of whom I am chief.

16 Howbeit for this cause I obtained mercy, that in me first Jesus Christ might shew forth all long-suffering, for a pattern to them which should hereafter believe on him to life everlasting.

17 Now unto the King eternal, immortal, invisible, the only wise God, be honor and glory for ever and ever. Amen.

for which those who are so called ought to give thanks to Jesus Christ. Now, the more to magnify the grace of Christ in putting him into the ministry, he gives an account of his conversion.

1. What he was before his conversion,—a blasphemer, a persecutor, and injurious, Acts 9:1. S:3. Frequently those who are designed for great and eminent services, are left to themselves before their conversion, to fall into great wickednesses; that the mercy of God may be the more glorified in their remission, and the grace of God in their regeneration.

he deserved mercy more than any who are left to perish. This they must mean, if they mean anything to the purpose; for, though his guilt might be less than that of some Jews, who, sinning against clearer light and with more deliberate malice, were given up to final obduracy, yet, those who maintain the doctrine of salvation by grace suppose, that many perish in their sins, whose criminality is far less than his was, that he might most justly have thus been left to perish, and that no reason can by us be assigned for his salvation in preference to others, who had not committed the sin against the Holy Spirit, except the sovereign grace of God, 'who hath mercy on whom He will have mercy, and whom He will He hardeneth,' and the other reason, which the apostle himself next assigns, namely, 'the praise of the glory of his grace.' Rom. 9:20, 21. 9:15—23. Eph. 1:3—8. For he evidently confesses, that he should have righteously perished, if the Lord had dealt with him according to strict justice, nay, if his grace and mercy had not been 'exceedingly abundant,' beyond all expectation, estimation, or conception, not only, in that He was ready to forgive, bless, and employ him, when he repented, believed, and was prepared for obedience, but, 'in quickening him when dead in sin,' and so working faith and love to Jesus Christ in his heart, that he might be 'found in Him, and be partaker of his righteousness.' "Faith and love," which, by the influence of his Spirit, were implanted in my heart.' Doddr.—(13) A blasphemer.] See on Mat. 12:31. Acts 26:11. 'The word ought to have been rendered defamer.' Campbell. But whom did Saul defame? Did he not speak of Jesus as a deceiver? Did he not do all that he could to induce others to do the same? And is not Jesus 'God manifest in the flesh?' This crime therefore was 'blasphemy,' though not against the Holy Ghost. Sc.

(12.) 'It was not as an apostle, but as a believer, that Paul cherished so triumphant a hope, and sung so sweet a song, in the house of his pilgrimage.'

(13.) Did it ignorantly.] 'I did not therein contradict the sentiments of my conscience: whereas, if I had knowingly opposed what I apprehended to be truth, out of regard to secular [or selfish] interest, I should doubtless have been left to perish under a judicial blindness of mind, and hardness of heart.' Doddr.—'It implies, that, had he done it knowingly, his would have been the unpardonable sin.' WILLIAMS.

V. 15, 16. The conversion, justification, and reconciliation of so virulent a persecutor, might be considered as a most striking illustration of the nature of the Gospel, and of the abundant riches of the mercy of God in Christ Jesus. It is indeed 'a faithful saying,' authenticated by every evidence which proves Christianity to be 'the Word of God, who cannot lie,' and it was 'worthy to be received,' with humble and thankful faith and cordial affection, by men of all nations and descriptions, as all are sinners, and none can be saved in any other way, and as none are excluded from salvation who seek it in this way, John 6:36—40. Acts 4:5—12, v. 12. 'that Jesus,' Emmanuel, the Son of God, the Messiah, 'came into the world to save sinners,' voluntarily, with this express design, and for this single purpose. (Marg. Ref. g—i.) 'The Word,' who 'was God, and was with God,' the Creator and Upholder of all worlds, the Lord of all creatures, 'became flesh,' that He might be 'the second Adam,' the Surety of the new covenant, to 'fulfil all righteousness,' and to offer an infinitely valuable atonement for sin, in order that, being risen and ascended, He might be an Advocate and High-

Observe here, (1.) Blasphemy, persecution, and injuriousness, are very great and heinous sins, and those who are guilty of them are sinners before God exceedingly. (2.) True penitents, to serve a good purpose, will not be backward to own their former condition, before they were brought home to God; this good apostle often confessed what his former life had been, as Acts 22:4. 26:10, 11.

2. See the great favor of God to him; But I obtained mercy. This was a blessed, but, indeed, a great favor, that so notorious a rebel should find mercy with his Prince. Note,

(1.) Ignorance, in some cases, will extenuate a crime, though it do not take it away, Luke 12:40. [For no man can say he has used to the utmost every mean of knowledge which has or might have been in his power; and men are accountable for the state and habits of their conscience.] (2.) Unbelief is at the bottom of what sinners do ignorantly: they do not believe God's threatenings, otherwise they could not do as they do. (3.) For these reasons Paul obtained mercy.

Here he notices the abundant grace of Jesus Christ, v. 14. The conversion and salvation of great sinners are owing to the grace of Christ, his exceeding abundant grace, even that grace of Christ which appears in his glorious Gospel, v. 15. Here we have the sum of the whole Gospel,—that Jesus Christ came into the world, John 1:14. came not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance, Mat. 9:13. His errand into the world was to seek and find, and so save them that were lost, Lu. 19:10. The ratification of this is, that it is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptation. In the close of the verse Paul applies it to himself; Of whom I am chief. Paul was a sinner of the first rank; so he acknowledges himself to have been; chief, that is, of pardoned sinners. It is an expression of his great humility; he that elsewhere calls himself the least of all saints, Eph. 3:8. here calls himself the chief of sinners. Observe, The mercy Paul found with God, notwithstanding his great wickedness before his conversion, he speaks of,

[1.] For the encouragement of others to repent and believe, v. 16: It was an instance of the long-suffering of Christ, that He would bear so much with one who had been so very provoking; and it was designed for a pattern to all others, that the greatest sinners might not despair of mercy with God. Note, Those who obtain mercy, believe on the Lord Jesus Christ; for without faith it is impossible to please God, Heb. 11:6.

[2.] He mentions it to the glory of God: having spoken of the mercy he had found with God, he could not go on with his letter without inserting a thankful acknowledgment of God's goodness to him, v. 17. Observe, The grace we have the comfort of, God must have the glory of. When we have found God good, we must not forget to pronounce Him great; and his kind thoughts of us must not at all abate our high thoughts of Him, but rather increase them. He is supreme, eternal, without beginning of days, or end of life, or change of time; the Ancient of days, Dan. 7:9. He is immortal, and the Original of immortality, 1 Tim. 6:16. for He cannot die. He is invisible, dwelling in the light which no man can approach unto, whom no man hath seen or can see. He is, 1 Tim. 6:16. the only wise God, Jude 25. He only is infinitely wise, and the Fountain of all wisdom. 'To Him be glory for ever and ever.' Let me be for ever employed in giving honor and glory to Him, as the thousands of thousands do, Rev. 5:12, 13.

V. 18—20. Here is his charge to Timothy, v. 18. Observe, The Gospel is a charge committed to the ministers of it; committed to their trust, to see that it be duly applied according to the intent and meaning of it, and the design of its great Author. It seems priest, and reign over all worlds for the benefit of his church and of mankind. 'To save sinners,' of every people and character, from condemnation, sin, Satan, the world, and death, even all, without exception, who came to Him by faith for this salvation, to 'the praise of the glory of God,' was, and is the only end proposed in this grand and most wonderful transaction. Of these sinners, Paul judged himself 'the chief,' the greatest enemy of Christ, and the most deserving of divine vengeance, of all who ever were, or would be saved by Him. (Marg. Ref. k.)—This seems the purport of the expression; but, it is not impossible, that he supposed his actual crimes to be so numerous and enormous, that his guilt even exceeded that of those, who had sinned more entirely against their own convictions, and so had been given up to final impenitency. Instead of imagining, that there was something meritorious in his blind and obstinate sincerity, (as some have maintained, in direct opposition to his own statement) he considered himself as one selected on purpose, because he was more guilty than any other person in the world, (those only excepted, who had committed the unpardonable sin, if even they were excepted,) 'that in him first,' or the chief sinner, 'Jesus Christ might exhibit,' with the greatest luster imaginable, that degree, in which He can bear with and pardon his most violent and enraged enemies, and the most atrociously criminal of mankind. That so it might stand on record to the end of time, for the encouragement of all others, in every age and nation, who believe in Christ, and rely on his merits and grace, for the pardon of their sins, and the gift of eternal life, to prevent their being bowed down in discouragement by a retrospective view of the number, nature, and heinousness of their crimes. (16) Pattern.] 2 Tim. 1:13. Not elsewhere.—It is an information, or demonstration of any thing or doctrine, so clear, so evident, as if it were exhibited by the pencil or colors. V. 17. Some expositors suppose this doxology to be addressed personally to Christ as God, because the apostle had before been speaking of Him, but it seems rather to be addressed to the Godhead, without distinction of persons, 'The Father,' and the Son, and the Holy Spirit,' three Persons in the Unity of the Godhead, 'the God of Salvation,' constitute the Object of all our worship, which Person soever we immediately address. To God, as 'the King eternal,' in every age and under every dispensation, the universal, and everlasting, invisible Sovereign, the inexhaustible Source of all wisdom, he ascribed all the glory of his conversion, salvation, endowments for service, faithfulness, and usefulness; and he desired earnestly, that God might be honored, in all his perfections and wonderful works, by all rational creatures, for ever and ever, Amen.

(17.) Now unto the King eternal, &c.] 'The true construction is, to the eternal King, the immortal invisible, only wise God.' So Bp. Middleton. En.—'When repeating over this passage, Pres. Edwards experienced that birth of which the Savior speaks, Jn. 3:3.' WILLIAMS.

there had been prophecies that he should prove eminent in the work. Observe,

The ministry is a warfare, a good warfare against sin and Satan ; in this the Lord Jesus is the Captain, Heb. 2:10. and in his cause, and against his enemies, ministers are in particular engaged. They must, too, execute their office diligently and courageously, notwithstanding oppositions and discouragements. Moreover, the good hopes others have entertained concerning us, should excite us to our duty ; that thou, by them, mightest war a good warfare.

V. 19.  Holding faith and a good conscience ; those that put away a good conscience, will soon make shipwreck of faith. A renewed, enlightened conscience, a conscience not debauched by any vice or sin, will be a mean of preserving us sound in the faith ; and the mystery of the faith must be held in a pure conscience, ch. 3:9. Two, who had made a profession of the Christian religion, had quitted that profession ; and Paul had declared them to belong to the kingdom of Satan ; and, as some think, had, by an extraordinary power, delivered them to be terrified or tormented by Satan, that they might learn not to blaspheme, not to contradict or revile the doctrine of Christ, and the good ways of the Lord. Observe, The primary design of the highest censures in the primitive church was, to prevent further sin, and to reclaim the sinner. In this case it was for the destruction of the flesh, that the spirit might be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus, 1 Cor. 5:5. Observe,

Those who love the service and work of Satan, are justly delivered over to the power of Satan ; whom I have delivered to Satan. God can, if He pleases, work by contraries: Hymeneus and Alexander are delivered to Satan, that they may learn not to blaspheme, when one would rather think they would learn of Satan to blaspheme the more. Those who have put away a good conscience, and made a shipwreck of faith, will not stick at anything, blasphemy not excepted. Therefore let us hold faith and a good conscience, if we would keep clear of blasphemy ; for if we once let go our hold of these, we do not know where we shall stop.

CHAP. II. V. 1—8. Here is,

I. A charge given to Christians, to pray for all men in general, and particularly for all in authority. Timothy must take care that this was done. Paul does not send him any prescribed form of prayer, as we have reason to think he would, if he had intended ministers should be tied to that way of praying ; but, in general, that they should make supplications, prayers, intercessions, and giving of thanks ; supplications, for the averting of evil ; prayers, for the obtaining of good ; intercessions, for others ; and thanksgivings, for mercies already received. Paul thought it enough to give them general heads ; they having the Scripture to direct them in prayer, and the Spirit of prayer poured out on them, needed not any further directions. Observe, the design of the Christian religion is to promote prayer ; and the disciples of Christ must be praying people, Eph. 6:18. we must pray for ourselves ; this is implied ; we must also pray for all men. See how far the Christian religion was from being a sect, when it taught men this diffusive charity. Pray for kings, v. 2. The kings, at this time, were heathens, enemies to Christianity, and persecutors of Christians ; yet they must be prayed for, because it is for the public good that there should be civil government, and proper persons intrusted with the administration of it, whom therefore we ought to pray for, yea, though we ourselves suffer under them. For kings, and all that are in authority, that is, inferior magistrates ; that we may lead a quiet and peaceable life in all godliness and honesty. Here see what we must desire for kings,—that God will so turn their hearts, and direct them, and make use of them, that we, under them, may lead a quiet and peaceable life. He does not say, PRACT. OBS. V. 12—20. It is peculiarly encouraging, to recollect what manner of persons have been converted, pardoned, 'counted faithful, put into the ministry,' eminently qualified for that sacred service, and made instruments of great good to mankind. These, in their day, bare witness to that 'faithful saying,' which we now would earnestly recommend to universal acceptance, even 'that Jesus Christ came into the world to save sinners.' And it always has been greatly encouraging to trembling penitents, when the preachers of this rich grace were themselves evident and affecting illustrations of their own doctrine, 'chief sinners,' yet pardoned and changed, sent to declare to others the long-suffering and mercy of Christ to them, 'as a pattern to all who should believe on Him to everlasting life.' Indeed, no man, with Paul's example before his eyes, can reasonably question the love and power of Christ to save him, whatever his sins have been, if he really desire and endeavor to trust in Him, as the incarnate Son of God, who once died on the cross, and now reigns on the throne of glory, in order to save 'all who come to God through Him.' Heb. 7:23—25. Let us then seek and hope for this salvation ; and, in humble consciousness of our unworthiness, let us admire and praise the grace of 'God our Savior,' and ascribe to 'the King eternal, immortal, invisible, the only wise God, all honor and glory for ever and ever. Amen.' SCOTT.

apostle, he 'had committed to his son Timothy.' Hymeneus and Alexander, with whom Timothy had doubtless been acquainted, the apostle had found it needful openly to excommunicate, and cast out of the church, into the visible kingdom of Satan ; that they might be instructed by this discipline, 'not to blaspheme' Christ, or disgrace his Gospel by their impious tenets. It does not appear, that either of them were recovered.—It has often been justly observed, that these severe censures, which the apostle inflicted on those, who had once been professors or ministers of Christianity, and publicly recorded with their names annexed, constitute a most conclusive proof, that he had no dread lest they should be provoked to disclose any secret, or give information of evil practices, which they had witnessed among Christians. His conduct implied a public challenge to them, in this respect, and was the genuine expression of conscious integrity, and the courage which springs from it.—Some think, that Timothy was chosen to the ministry, by the prophecies respecting him (18) ; and that this was the way, in which the pastors and teachers, in the newly planted churches, were usually selected ; but this opinion, as to the general plan, does not appear to be supported by sufficient proof (20) They may learn. 'Be taught, or disciplined by correction and instruction, as boys are educated.' See on Luke 23:16. SCOTT.

(18.) Prophecies. The most approved commentators understand it, in the natural sense, of predictions of holy men, who knew Timothy in younger life, and were inspired to foretell his future usefulness as a Christian minister. May it not argue his early piety, and that of his mother and grand-mother, even before they, any of them, embraced the Gospel ? ED.

NOTES. CHAP. II. V. 1. The litany of the church of England accordingly beseeches God 'to have mercy upon all men ;' yet even this scriptural petition has been censured as inconsistent with submission to the sovereignty of God ! But whatever Paul understood by 'all men,' that we understand by 'all men ;' if we pray in respect of them at all ; and we must pray God 'to have mercy on them,' unless we mean to impetrate vengeance on them. The command, to 'love our neighbor as ourselves,' is our rule of conduct, and should dictate our prayers. God will hear our supplications for temporal benefits, or eternal salvation, in behalf of those on whom He sees good in his sovereign wisdom to bestow them ; and in other cases, our 'prayer will return into our own bosom' [by the spiritual benefit attendant on the habitual feeling which gave rise to the prayer]. But how can we pray for enemies and persecutors, (whom we cannot possibly know to belong to 'the election of grace,') without equally appearing to interfere with God's sovereignty ? How can we pray for our children, relatives, or neighbors, or, indeed, for any unconverted person, or for those whom we are not sure are converted, without violating the same imaginary rule ? The malignity of an apostate, indeed, may be so excessive, that it would not be proper to pray for him ; (Notes, 2 Tim. 4:14, 15. 1 John 5:16—18.) but such exceedingly rare exceptions, to a general rule, in no way interfere with our praying even for the salvation of all men, that now are or ever shall live on earth. This is no more than the Lord's prayer teaches us, Mat. 6:9, 10. and if there be any individual, for whom we cannot pray, that 'the Lord would have mercy on him,' and convert him, the inability must arise from sin, even the sin of not 'loving our neighbors as ourselves.' Nothing can tend more to perplex theological subjects, to prejudice men's minds against the doctrines of grace, nay, to bring them into odium and contempt ; nothing can more narrow and harden the heart against the human species in general ; than this method of making the secret decrees of God, in any degree or way, our rule of conduct, instead of adhering to his revealed will. We know not, and cannot know, who are elect, and who are not ; we are bound to love all men, to pray for them, and to do them good, and then leave it to God to govern the universe in his sovereign wisdom, justice, and mercy, as He sees good. De. 29:29. Sc.

(1.) Supplications be made. 'That any man should ever have supposed Timothy charged here to compose a liturgy for the use of the clergy and people of Ephesus, as Bp. Bull has done, is very surprising, and an instance of weak and pitiable attachment to party prejudices.' DODDR.

(1, 2.) Supplications (i. e. deprecations of impending judgments) ; prayers (petitions for temporal and spiritual good things) ; intercessions (that God would defend and support the faithful, or convert and save their enemies) ; clothed with authority (all that are in office, legislative, executive, judicial, civil, or military).—'The early Christians felt this law to be continually binding, and, therefore, scrupulously prayed for all in authority, whether Pagan, Arian, or Christian. The custom is mentioned by many of the fathers ; is mentioned in the early liturgies ; and was referred to by the early apologists, as a proof of loyalty.—Praying for all in authority will contribute to preserve us from sinning against them. In this country there are peculiar temptations to disrespect and insubordination. Here the ruler comes not forward with all the venerableness of hereditary honors. Elections are frequent. Yesterday the ruler was himself a subject among us,—to-day he "is the minister of God." The press is licentious, and he comes into office covered with party scandal, and scarce an object of respect. Christians have their political connexions and choice, and are insensibly involved in the feelings of those around them. But let their feelings be constantly drawn forth in prayer to God, in behalf of all rulers, and they will be more sensible of improprieties ; more on their guard against temptation ; and their submission will be more conscientious, cheerful, and exemplary.—Prayer for all in authority will render Christians more punctual and conscientious in the discharge of the elective franchise. In this country there is less danger of the incapacity than the sins of rulers. When the Christian has abused his privilege, and retires to pray for the atheist, idolater of this world, or the profane swearer, or the duellist, he feels his inconsistency and presumption.—The discharge of this duty will tend to moderate the spirit of party.—It would also promote in the public mind

'get preferments, grow rich, and be in honor and power under them ;' no, the top of the ambition of a good Christian is, to lead a quiet and peaceable life, to get through the world unmolested, in a low, private station. We should desire that we and others may lead a peaceable life, in all godliness and honesty ; implying that we cannot expect to be kept quiet and peaceable, unless we keep in all godliness and honesty. Here we have our duty as Christians summed up in two words ; godliness, i. e. the right worshipping of God ; and honesty, i. e. a good conduct toward all men.

Here, observe, Christians are to be men much given to prayer. In our prayers we are to have a generous concern for others as a favorable impression towards Christianity.—When Christians pray to Christ, as King of kings, in behalf of all in authority, they contemplate earthly powers as subordinate, and Christ as Supreme. While the Christian prays thus, he arrests the atheism and disloyalty of a revolted world. Let this spirit pervade the church, and the prayer for all in authority go up from her ten thousand altars, and she will then be indeed the light of the world.

V. 2. It was a proper expression of benevolence, for Christians to pray for all orders and conditions of men ; and to interest themselves in the calamities and deliverances of their neighbors, of the community, and of the human species. This would soften the prejudices, and conciliate the favor of those around them, especially when they persevered in such supplications and thanksgivings, notwithstanding the persecutions which they endured. It would likewise conduce very much to silence the accusations of those, who charged them with disaffection to the civil government, and with being troublers of the city, if they not only behaved with quiet subjection to the laws, in all things consistent with their duty, and conscientiously paid tribute and custom ; but were also known to pray for 'kings, and all in authority' over them, for their preservation, and success in all their lawful undertakings, for the protection and peace of the community, and for all blessings upon their persons and families, and that they opposed no other weapons than these to the injuries which they suffered.—The Ephesians, and others among whom Timothy was called to 'do the work of an evangelist,' were under the Roman emperor, who was a monster of tyranny and cruelty ; the apostle, however, used the word 'kings,' in the plural number, whence we learn, that the Holy Spirit intended this direction for other places and ages, according to the different governments established in Providence. 1 Pet. 2:13—17. All the kings and rulers on earth were at that time strangers or enemies to Christianity ; so that no distinction or exception, in this case, could possibly be intended.—These prayers were to be made ; in order that Christians might 'lead a quiet and peaceable life, in all godliness and honesty,' conscientiously attending on all their duties to God and man, without being molested either by public calamities or by persecutions. This object they were to aim at, and with this 'quietness and security' to be satisfied. This differs widely from desiring and praying for the success of those enterprises, which [seem to] serve to aggrandize one country, by the depression and miseries of other countries, [a principle as false in political economy as in morals.] These, indeed, are not lawful undertakings, and we may pray for the peace and welfare of our governors and country, without so much as appearing to favor these measures. The disposition to lead a quiet, peaceable, and pious life, submitting to human authority, as far as consistent with godliness, tends to procure favor to the true worshippers of God, and it may be expected that He will answer their prayers, (so far as good for them,) by inclining their rulers to tolerate, protect, and countenance them. See.

V. 3, 4. As God has provided for the salvation of mankind, without distinction of rank, or nation, or even previous character, and can honorably, and will certainly, save every individual, who comes to Him in his appointed way ; in this sense, He 'willeth that all men should be saved ;' Ez. 18:23. 33:11. 2 Pet. 3:9 and it is his good pleasure, nay, his express and repeated command, that we should do all in our power to bring them 'to the knowledge of the truth.' The Gospel should be 'preached to every creature ;' we are required to assure all whom we can address, that the Lord is able and willing to save any sinner who believes.—But as all men do not in fact 'come to the knowledge of the truth,' which God wills in the same sense as 'that all men should be saved ;' so the difficulty, if there be any, presses equally on Calvinists and Arminians, so called, and even on such as deduce universal, actual salvation, from this text and a few similar ones, for they cannot say, 'that all men,' without exception, actually do 'come to the knowledge of the truth.' If the clause, therefore, be explained to mean anything well as for ourselves. Prayer consists of various parts,—of supplications, intercessions, and thanksgivings. All men, yea kings themselves, and those who are in authority, are to be prayed for : they need our prayers, for they have many difficulties to encounter, many snares to which their exalted stations expose them. In praying for our governors, we take the most likely course to lead a peaceable and quiet life. The Jews at Babylon were commanded to seek the peace of the city, whither the Lord had caused them to be carried captives, and to pray to the Lord for it ; for in the peace thereof they should have peace, Jer. 29:7. If we would lead a peaceable and quiet life, we must live in all godliness and honesty ; we must do our duty to God and man, 1 Pet. 3:10, 11.

Now the reason he gives for this is, because this is good in the sight of God our Savior ; the Gospel of Christ requires this. That which is acceptable in the sight of God our Savior, we should do, and should abound in.

II. As a reason why we should, in our prayers, concern ourselves for all men, he shows God's love to mankind in general, v. 4.

1. One reason why all men are to be prayed for is, because there is one God, and that God bears a good will to all mankind. This one God will have all men to be saved, v. 5. Ez. 33:11. Not that He has decreed the salvation of all, far then all would be saved ; but He has a good will to the salvation of all, and none perish but by their own fault, Mat. 23:37. He will have all to be saved, and to come to the knowledge of the truth ; to be saved in the way He has appointed, and not otherwise. It concerns us to get the knowledge of the truth, because that is the way to be saved ; Christ is the Way, and the Truth, and so He is the Life.

2. There is one Mediator, and that Mediator gave Himself a Ransom for all. As the mercy of God extends itself to all his works, so the mediation of Christ extends itself thus far to all the children of men, that He paid a price sufficient for the salvation of all men : He gave Himself a Ransom. Observe, The death of Christ was a ransom, a counter-price ; He gave Himself a Ransom voluntarily, a Ransom for all ; so that all men are put in a better condition than that of devils. A mediator supposes a controversy. Sin had made a quarrel between us and God ; Jesus Christ is a Mediator who undertakes to make peace, to bring God and man together, in the nature of an Umpire or Arbitrator, Job 9:33. He is a Ransom that was to be testified in due time ; i. e. in the O. T. times, his sufferings, and the glory that should follow, were spoken of as things to be revealed in the last times, 1 Pet. 1:10, 11. And they are accordingly revealed, Paul himself having been ordained a preacher and an apostle, to publish to the Gentiles the glad tidings of redemption and salvation by Jesus Christ, Mk. 16:15. Besides his general call to the apostleship, he was commissioned particularly to preach to the Gentiles, in faith and truth, faithfully and truly.

It is observable, that the unity of God is asserted, and joined with the unity of the Mediator ; and the church of Rome might as well maintain a plurality of Gods as a more, than the willingness of God to save all, of every description, who truly believe ; and his command, that we should preach to all men, and pray for all men, without distinction ; it must follow, that He wills, or purposes, what He does not effect.—It is, however, equally improper to say, with many expositors, that 'all men,' signifies 'some of all sorts,' because it is obvious to answer, that it may with equal propriety be said, 'He willeth that all men should be damned ;' for, doubtless, some of all nations, ranks, and orders will be left to perish in their sins, 'whereunto also they were appointed.' Jn. 1:29. 3:6. 1 Jn. 2:1, 2. SCOTT.

(4.) 'The meaning seems to be, that God has made sufficient provision for the salvation of all, and that it is to be considered as the general declaration of his will, that all who know the truth themselves should publish it to all around them, so far as their influence can extend.'

DODDR.

V. 5—7. The apostle designed to excite Christians to intercessory prayers ; and he draws one argument for this, from the relation which God Himself, and the great Mediator, bear to those, in behalf of whom these supplications should be offered.—'One God,' in this passage does not denote the Person of the Father exclusively, but the Deity ; the manhood, therefore, of Christ intervenes between a just and holy God and us sinners ; but this Manhood is essentially and inseparably united to the Godhead, in the Person of the Son, who thus mediates between God his Father, and men his brethren.—This provision and appointment has been made and revealed, for the common benefit of the human race, both Jews and Gentiles of every nation, that all who are willing may come, in this way, to the mercy-seat of a pardoning God, to seek reconciliation to Him. 3:16. Is. 55:1—3. Jn. 4:10—15. 7:37—39. Rev. 22:16, 17.—No pious and considerate man will assert, that Christ so gave Himself a ransom for all, as actually to intend the salvation of all those who never believe in Him ; and that He thus failed of his purpose, and suffered in vain. On the other hand, there are but few, even of those who limit such expressions to 'some of all sorts,' who do not allow the all-sufficiency of Christ's atonement, and admit that all men should be invited and commanded to believe in Him, and that all who do believe will be saved by Him. It is, therefore, important, far beyond the importance of 'doubtful disputations,' to observe carefully, that none will be saved by the ransom of Christ without true faith ; that true faith is 'the gift of God,' and the effect of regeneration, Jn. 1:10—13, v. 13. Eph. 2:4—10. that 'known unto God are all his works, from before the foundation of the world ;' and that all will certainly be saved, who were 'given unto Christ,' and whom He specially intended to save, when He became the Saviour of his people. Jn. 6:36—40. These propositions are capable of clear, scriptural proof ; and when they are established, we may safely leave such expressions, as that here used, to bear their most obvious import. Indeed, divine wisdom and love are peculiarly shown, in this general way of stating the truths of Christianity, as far more suitable to inquirers and unestablished persons, than a systematical arrangement would be.—(6) A ransom.] Here only.—Grotius observes, that the preposition anti, even in composition, always signifies either opposition or commutation. As there can be no opposition, when Christ is said to have given 'Himself for us,' antidolon, it must necessarily signify commutation, or compensation. When we read ophthalmon anti ophthalmou, no one doubts the meaning.—Why, therefore, may we not conclude that Christ was crucified in our place and stead, when He said, that 'He came to give his life,' lutron anti pollon ? Arrowsmith, Tactica sacra. SCOTT.

(6.) Who gave Himself.] Comp. Mat. 20:28. This shows the mode in which the mediation was effected. BLOOMF.—The Man, Christ Jesus.] 'Though the union of the divine nature with the human, qualified Christ for the office of Mediator, yet this plainly shows, that it is in his human nature, we are to consider Him as discharging it.' DODDR.—From this v. it plainly appears, that the principal notion of Mediator, as applied to Christ, is that of atonement.'

plurality of Mediators. He that is a Mediator in the New Testament sense, gave Himself a Ransom. Vain then is the pretence of the Romanists, that there is but one Mediator of satisfaction, but many of intercession; for, according to Paul, Christ's giving Himself a Ransom, was a necessary part of the Mediator's office; and, indeed, this lays the foundation for his intercession. Paul was ordained a minister, to declare this to the Gentiles, that Christ is the one Mediator between God and men, who gave Himself a Ransom for all. This is the substance of which all ministers are to preach, to the end of the world; and Paul magnifies his office, as he was the apostle of the Gentiles, Rom. 11:13.

III. A direction how to pray, v. 8.

1. Under the Gospel, prayer is not to be confined to any one particular house of prayer, but men must pray everywhere: no one place is more acceptable to God than another, John 4:21. Pray everywhere. We must pray in our closets, in our families, at our meals, when on journeys, and in the solemn assemblies, whether more public or private.

2. It is the will of God, that in prayer we should lift up holy or pure hands, pure from the pollution of sin, washed in the fountain opened for sin and uncleanness, Ps. 26:6.

3. We must pray in charity; without wrath, or malice, or anger at any person.

4. We must pray in faith, without doubting, Jam. 1:6. or, as some read it, without disputing; and then it falls under the head of charity.

V. 9—15. He charges women, who profess the Christian religion, to be modest, sober, silent, and submissive, as becomes their place.

1. They must be very modest in their apparel, not affecting gaudiness, gayety, or costliness; (you may read the vanity of a person's mind in the gayety and gaudiness of their habit;) because they have better ornaments with which they should adorn themselves, as becomes women professing god- liness, with good works. Note, Good works are the best ornaments; these are, in the sight of God, of great price. Those that profess godliness should, in their dress, as well as other things, act as becomes their profession; instead of laying out their money on fine clothes, they must lay it out in works of piety and charity, which are properly called good works.

2. Women must learn,—learn the principles of their religion, learn Christ, learn the Scriptures; they must not think that their sex excuses them from that learning which is necessary to salvation.

3. They must be silent, submissive, and subject, and not usurp authority. The reason given is, because Adam was first formed, then Eve out of him, to denote her subordination to him, and dependence on him; and that she was made for him, to be a help meet for him. And Adam was not deceived, i. e. not first; the serpent did not immediately set on him, but the woman was first in the transgression, 2 Cor. 11:3. and it was part of the sentence, Thy desire shall be to thy husband, and he shall rule over thee, Gen. 3:16.

But it is a word of comfort, v. 15. that they who continue in sobriety, shall be saved in child-bearing, or with child-bearing. The Messiah, who was born of a woman, should break the serpent's head, Gen. 3:15. or, the sentence they are under for sin, shall be no bar to their acceptance with Christ, if they continue in faith, and charity, and holiness with sobriety.

Here observe, The extensiveness of the rules of Christianity; they reach not only to men, but to women, not only to their persons, but also to their dress, and outward deportment. Women are to profess godliness as well as men; and, to their honor be PRACT. OBS. V. 1—8. It is a most important, though much neglected duty, for Christians to pray and return thanks 'for all men,' according to the different relations, in which they stand to them, and as their circumstances require. Thus they may show their love to those whom they cannot otherwise serve, and do them a most important benefit, and also evince, that they interest themselves in the happiness of mankind in general.—In proportion as we learn thus to 'worship in

V. 8—10. (Notes, 1—4.) The expression may indeed include prayers in the closet, in the family, and in social meetings; but the chapter especially relates to the manner of conducting public assemblies, in what place soever these were held; for 'Where two or three are met together, there,' says our Savior, 'I am in the midst of you.' Mat. 18:19, 20. 28:19, 20, verse 20. Heb. 10:23—25. 'As the apostle is speaking of public prayer, his meaning, I suppose, is, that the men, and not the women, were to lead the devotion of the assembly (9).' Mackn. The antithesis between the men and the women (9), the word itself, the article, and the connexion, 'in like manner,' combine in establishing this observation.—The Gentiles had priestesses, as well as priests, not only to their goddesses, but to their gods also; but the Israelites were not allowed to conform to this practice. 'In like manner,' women must not be ministers, or preachers, under the Christian dispensation.—In order that men might perform the office allotted to them, with acceptance, they must in reverent adoration 'lift up holy hands;' not satisfied with washing their hands before they worshipped, according to the custom of the Jews, and indeed that of many Gentiles; but taking care to keep them pure from all injustice, and the practice of every sin.—In order to this proper regulation of religious assemblies, as well as the general conduct of Christians, the apostle furthermore enjoined, in the most decided manner, that 'the women should adorn themselves with modest apparel,' suited to their station in life, and becoming that 'bashfulness and sobriety' of manners, which would be expected from them; not copying the vain fashions of those women, whose attire was intended to render their persons attractive to beholders, and was, at once, an indication of the levity of their own minds, and suited to excite the passions of others. He required, therefore, that they should not adorn themselves with broided hair, gold, pearls, or expensive garments. The appearance of women in the places of worship, is especially intended, and the exhortation implied, that whatever garments they wore, they must consider 'good works,' as their peculiar ornament, as 'it became women professing godliness.' (Marg. Refer. k, l.) Yet it doubtless was meant as a general rule, that Christian women should refuse conformity to the foolish fashions of a vain world, in this respect; that they should choose to appear more plain and simple in their attire, than others of their rank; that they should not waste time, or run into needless expense, in these empty decorations, but employ both their time and money in adorning themselves with good works; (Note and P. O. Acts 9:36—43.) that decency, modesty, and sobriety should be consulted in their garments and appearance, rather than elegance and fashion; and finally, that ministers ought to teach these things to their congregations, as of great importance to the honor of the Gospel. (Note, 1 Pet. 3:1—6.)—It has been well observed, that foppery and extravagance, as to dress, in men, are most emphatically condemned by the apostle's silence on the subject, for this intimated, that surely they could be under no temptation to such a childish vanity!—It is worthy to be noted by the women, that this precept ought not to be slighted by them, as of little spirit and truth,' with awful reverence, Holy love, pure zeal, and lively faith, (John 4:21—24.) we shall find our minds freed from narrow prejudices and resentment, and our benevolence towards all men greatly enlarged, and we shall more fervently and intelligently pray to our heavenly Father, saying, 'Hallowed be thy name, thy kingdom come, thy will be done in earth as it is in heaven;' 'for thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory, for ever and ever. 'Ancient medals and statues [comp. the cuts of Comy and Supplement] show the costume of those times with respect to the hair, the expensive ornaments then used, and the labored forms in which female tresses were arranged.' HENRY, abr.—Adorn, &c.] The apostles both [referring to Pet. 3:3.] mean to admonish Christian women to pay far less attention to external adorning than to internal, and to make virtue their special ornament. And upon the whole it appears the direction is intended chiefly (and so Scott) to apply to their dress at the religious assemblies; though it may be extended to their apparel at other times.' BLOOMF. The En., however, sees no restriction in the original.—'Esting very justly observes, that this discourse concludes with yet stronger force against foppery in men.' DODR.—How many dollars are spent for finery, where one is spent for Christ!—The argument some Christians use for disobeying the apostle is, that the poor live by the extravagancies of the rich! But those who get their living by making such things as depend for their value upon the caprices of fashion, are liable at every change of fashion to be thrown out of employment, and being un instructed to make what is permanently and always useful and valuable, they often suffer. Whereas, had their industry been directed to what is of constant demand, it would, according to God's laws, have brought a certain living, and saved them from the immoralities and bad influences to which a precarious living exposes. See also Wayland's Polit. Economy for other reasons Ed.

V. 11—14. It has been observed, that this rule admitted of an exception, in the case of those, who spoke by the Spirit of prophecy. (M. R. m.—Note, 1 Cor. 14:34, 35.) and it may here be added, that it related to public teaching exclusively, and not to any kind of private instruction, by which no 'authority over the man' is implied. The women were required to 'be silent with all subjection,' in the religious assemblies, for the apostle, as Christ's representative, and declaring his will, would not 'suffer women to teach,' for that would be like 'usurping authority over the man,' and therefore their willing subjection was to be shown, by silently receiving instruction. This humbling consideration [being first in the transgression] was suited to convince the women, that they ought not to affect authority, or presume to be public teachers. Sc.

(14.) Adam was not deceived.] I. e. not by the serpent, but by the woman. So Bloomf., and he adds from Theoph. "Eve was brought over by desire; Adam, by the persuasions of his wife." PRACT. OBS. V. 9—15. Whatever renders the Gospel respected in the minds and hearts of those who are without, contributes to its success; and the modest, decent, and sober apparel of 'women professing godliness,' must therefore have this tendency in no ordinary degree. But alas! in this trifling and expensive age, when almost all vie with their superiors in apparel, till distinction of rank itself is nearly lost, we too often find those, who come to the places where the Word of God is preached, decorated as much beyond what they can properly afford, and in as unbecoming a manner, as they who frequent the theatre! It would be well, if the more decided professors of godliness were wholly exempt from this disgraceful vanity; or if they always spent as many hours in visiting the sick and poor, and in labors for their relief, and as much money in relieving their distresses, as they do in uselessly decorating themselves, and their children, after a manner unsuitable to their rank in life, and inconsistent with their profession. These are by no

V. 15. The sorrows and pains attendant on child-bearing, were a peculiar mark of the divine displeasure, against the transgression of the first woman, and suited to bring it to the remembrance of her daughters in every age; yet those who professed the Gospel of Christ might be comforted, by the hope of being supported and preserved, through that trying season, and even of deriving benefit from all their sufferings; at least they might be sure, that there was no curse or wrath in it, provided they continued steadfast in the faith, and in love to Christ and his people, with holiness, purity, sobriety, and modesty. (M. R.)—Some suppose, the apostle to have meant, that, as sin first entered by the woman, whence all the pains and sorrows of child-bearing originated, so, through those sorrows, One had come into the world, 'born of a woman,' by miraculous conception, without man, by whom all those would be saved, who continued in the faith; and indeed the original may well bear that interpretation, which is also very ancient.—Eve, whom the apostle had just before mentioned, was thus addressed by her offended Creator; 'I will greatly multiply thy sorrow and thy conception, in sorrow shalt thou bring forth children;' yet the preceding verse implied a promise of salvation through 'the Seed of the woman,' for all believers, both men and women. Gen. 3:14—16. Eve, herself, is generally supposed to have been saved 'through child-bearing,' or, by One descended from her; though the anguish of bearing children was denounced on her, as a peculiar punishment of her atrocious guilt, and thus her sorrow was turned into joy, her curse into a blessing. In like manner, her daughters, though involved with her in the sentence of bringing forth children with sorrow, would also share with her in the same salvation, joy, and blessing, through the promised Seed, if they copied her example of faith and obedience. In child-bearing.] 5:14. The article favors the latter interpretation. SCOTT.

(15.) 'It was promised, that the seed of the woman, and not of the man, should bruise the serpent's head, and therefore through her Progeny it is, that both the female and the male sex shall eventually be saved, if they live in faith and Christian love, and holiness, and sobriety.' SAURFLEWORTH, in Henry, abr.—Pocock understands it, of being carried safely through child-bearing; not as an absolute promise, but as a general intimation; which sense, Br. says, seems to be the least objectionable, though it lies open to the objection of not being confined to Christian or even virtuous women, and is not satisfactory. But R. Hull, in Henry, abr. says, 'there is no reason to doubt, that the true meaning is, "by the child-bearing," referring not to the pains of parturition, but to the extraordinary event of the birth of our Savior in a miraculous manner. . . . The apostle is not adverting to any temporal circumstance; he is speaking of the entrance of sin, by means of the woman, and it is natural to throw in a compensatory circumstance, reminding us, that as the inferior sex had been the source of human perversion, so it had the honor, in compensation, of being the immediate instrument of the production of the Messiah, by whom our recovery was effected. And the condition which follows, "if they continue in faith, and charity, and holiness with sobriety," puts this interpretation beyond doubt; as there is the greatest connexion between faith and virtue, without which our faith is vain, but none between perseverance in holiness and exemption from the pains of child-birth.' Yet if the race should obey the laws of conjugal sobriety, and other of God's laws, doubtless, in the course of generations, these pains would mitigate. Gill says: 'The words may be rendered impersonally thus; "Notwithstanding there is salvation through the birth of a Son;" (or child-bearing;) and the sense is, that, notwithstanding the fall of man by the means of the woman, yet there is salvation for both men and women, through the birth of Immanuel, the Child born and Son given.'

are good works. According to Paul, women must be learners, not public teachers, not usurp authority over the man, but be in silence; notwithstanding, good women may and ought to teach their children at home the principles of religion; so Timothy was taught by his mother and grandmother; 2 Tim. 3:15. Aquila and his wife Priscilla expounded unto Apollos the way of God more perfectly; but privately; they took him unto them; Acts 18:26. The reasons here for the man's authority over the woman, and her subjection to the man, v. 13, 14. 1 Cor. 11:9. are very good; and though the difficulties and dangers of child-bearing are many and great, as they are part of the punishment inflicted on the sex for Eve's transgression, yet here is much for woman's support and encouragement, v. 15. and women under the circumstance of child-bearing should by faith lay hold on this promise for their support in the needful time.

CHAP. III. V. 1—7. The two epistles to Timothy, and that to Titus, contain a scripture-plan of church-government, or a direction to ministers. Timothy, we suppose, was an evangelist, left at Ephesus, to take care of those whom the Holy Ghost had made bishops there, i. e. the presbyters, as appears by Acts 20:28. where the care of the church was committed to the presbyters, and they were called bishops. It seems, they were very loath to part with Paul, Acts 20:38. their church was but newly planted, they were afraid of undertaking the care of it, therefore Paul left Timothy with them to set them in order.

And here we have the character of a gospel-minister, whose office it is, as a bishop, to preside in a particular congregation of Christians, v. 1. The ministry is a work. However the office of a bishop may be now thought a good preferment, then it was thought a good work. Observe,

(1.) The office of a scripture-bishop is an office of divine appointment, not of human invention; the office of the ministry was in the church before the magistrate countenanced Christianity, for this office is one of the great gifts Christ has bestowed on the church, Ephes. 4:8, 11. (2.) It is a means trifles, or pharisaical impositions, as some affect to call them, but apostolical injunctions; and it should be considered, that, as raiment was only made needful by sin, so it is peculiarly unsuitable for those, who profess to believe the Bible, to be proud and vain of the very badge of their disgrace.—The original creation of the man, and then the woman, and the entrance of sin by the woman, who 'being deceived was first in the transgression,' concur in showing the reasonableness of that subjection, humility, and teachableness, prescribed in Scripture to the woman, and the impropriety of her usurping authority over the man. But, as the Gospel gives special encouragements to the woman, in respect of those sorrows, which the entrance of sin has entailed on her, provided she continue in faith and love, 'with holiness and sobriety;' so the consideration of those manifold sorrows, to which the female sex is subjected, should teach men to exercise their authority with the utmost gentleness, tenderness, and affection. SCOTT.

NOTES. CHAP. III. V. 1. It has already been shown, that the word rendered 'bishop,' was at this time of the same import with that translated 'elder,' or 'presbyter,' (Note, Acts 20:17.) for the charge, given by Paul to the Ephesian elders, is here supposed to have been subsequent to the writing of this epistle. The same is also proved, by the silence of the apostle, concerning any other order than bishops and deacons. (Note, Phil. 1:1.) Indeed, it is evident, that the selection or appointment of an individual, to be overseer of the elders or pastors, though very ancient, and probably apostolical, was not at this time in general use. Rev. 2:1. SCOTT.

(1.) Bishop.] 'Whether bishops be understood as prelates, presidents, or pastors, most certainly moral character in either, and to all, is of the first importance.' WILLIAMS.

V. 2. It is manifest, that Timothy was supposed to be principally concerned in the choice of the bishops, being the apostle's deputy and representative, and, accordingly, instructions are here given him, how to fulfil this arduous charge in the proper manner; instructions, no doubt, intended to be useful in the highest degree, if duly regarded, to all others in every age and place, on whom the same most important trust should devolve.—The apostle therefore showed, very particularly, what manner of persons these 'bishops,' or elders ought to be, in order that mercenary, ambitious, and other improper desires after the sacred service might be repressed, and likewise, that those who had been appointed to it might know how to behave in it. Whatever natural abilities, learning, elocution, or spiritual gifts, any man might possess, he must be considered as ineligible to this office, if not of a 'blameless' character, and if he had not avoided scandalous vices, at least since his professed conversion to Christianity.—He ought also to be 'the husband of one wife.' Christ and the apostles expressly condemned polygamy, as well as divorces, except for adultery. (Notes, Mat. 19:3—9. Mark 10:2—12. 1 Cor. 7:1—5.) Yet there was no direct command for a man, who had previously taken more wives than one, to put the others away when he embraced the Gospel, and such a requisition might, in some instances, have produced very bad consequences in domestic life, and increased the opposition of the civil powers to the preaching of Christianity. But the rule, that no man, however qualified in other respects, should be admitted into the pastoral office, who had more than one wife, or who had put away one to take another, tended to show the unlawfulness of polygamy, and divorces on frivolous pretences, and their inconsistency with the Christian dispensation; and concurred with other things to bring them into total disuse in the Christian church, yet without violence and confusion.—To argue hence, as it has been done, that polygamy was lawful for other Christians, else it would not have been needful to restrict pastors from it, would prove, (if it proved anything,) that it was also lawful and common, for them to be drunkards, covetous, brawlers, or strikers.—Some have inferred from this text, that stated pastors ought to be married, as a pre-requisite to their office; but this seems to be a mistake of a general permission, connected with a restriction, for an express command. It is, however, abundantly sufficient to prove, that marriage is entirely consistent with the most sacred functions, and the most exemplary holiness, and to subvert the very basis of the anti-christian prohibition of marriage to the clergy, with all its concurrent, and consequent, and incalculable mischiefs. (Notes, 4:1—5. Heb. 13:4.)—Yet some have even endeavored to infer a part of that system from this clause itself, and have supposed that the apostle meant to prohibit second marriages to the clergy! But this is contrary to the whole tenor of Scripture; it is by no means contained in the meaning of the words, and would certainly bring in a part of those evils, which long experience has proved inseparable from the general work, requiring diligence and application; the apostle represents it under the notion and character of a work. It is a good work, a work of the greatest importance, and designed for the greatest good; to illustrate the divine perfections in bringing many sons into glory. There ought to be an earnest desire of the office, in those who would be put into it; and this is the question proposed to those who offer themselves to the ministry of the church of England; 'Do you think you are moved by the Holy Ghost to take upon you this office?'

In order to the discharge of this office, the doing of this work, the workman must be duly qualified.

1. A minister must be blameless; not lie under any scandal; give as little occasion for blame as can be, because that will prejudice his ministry, and reflect reproach on his office.

2. He must be the husband of one wife; not having given a bill of divorce to one, and then taking another, or not having many wives at once, as at that time was too common, both among Jews and Gentiles, especially Gentiles.

3. He must be vigilant, watchful against Satan, over himself, and the souls of those committed to his charge, of whom having taken the oversight, he must improve all opportunities of doing them good.

4. He must be sober, temperate, moderate in all his actions, and in the use of all creature-comforts. Be sober, be vigilant.

5. He must be of good behavior, composed and solid, and not light, vain, and frothy.

6. He must be given to hospitality; open-handed to strangers, and ready to entertain them according to his ability, as one who does not set his heart on the wealth of the world, and who is a true lover of his brethren.

7. Apt to teach. Therefore this is a preaching bishop whom Paul describes, one who is both able and willing to communicate to others the knowledge God has given him; one who is fit to teach, and ready to take all opportunities of giving instruction; who is himself well instructed in the things of the kingdom of heaven, and is communicative of what he knows to others.

8. No drunkard: not given to wine. The priests were not to drink wine when they went in to minister, Lev. 10:8, 9.

9. No striker; one who is not quarrelsome, or apt to use violence to any, but does everything with mildness, love, and gentleness. The servant of the Lord must not strive, but be gentle towards all, &c. 2 Tim. 2:24.

10. One who is not greedy of filthy lucre; who does not make his ministry to truckle to any secular design or interest; who uses no mean, base, sordid ways of getting money; who is dead to the wealth of this world, lives above it, and makes it appear he is so.

11. He must be patient, and not a brawler; of a mild disposition. Christ, the great Shepherd and Bishop of souls, is so. Not apt to be angry or quarrelsome, not a brawler with his tongue; for how shall men teach others to govern their tongues, who do not make conscience of keeping them under good government themselves?

12. Not covetous. Covetousness is bad in any, but worst in a minister, whose calling leads him to converse so much with another world.

13. He must be one who keeps his family in good order, that he may set a good example to other masters of families, to do so too; and that he may thereby give a proof of his ability to take care of the church of God; the families of ministers ought to be examples of good to all other families. Ministers must have their children in subjection; then it is the duty of ministers' children to submit to the instructions that are given them. With all gravity. The best way to keep inferiors in subjection, is, to be grave with them. Not having his children in subjection with all austerity, but with all gravity.

14. He must not be a novice; not one newly brought to the Christian religion; or not one who is but meanly instructed in it, who knows no more of religion than its surface, for such a one is apt to be lifted up with pride; the more ignorant [proud] men are, the prouder they become. The devils fell through pride, which is a good reason why we should take heed of pride, because it is a sin that turned angels into devils.

15. He must be of good reputation among his neighbors, and under no reproach from former conversation; for the devil will use that to ensnare others, and work in them an aversion to the doctrine of Christ, preached by those who have not had a good report.

Now, on the whole, having briefly gone through the qualifications of a gospel-bishop, we may, with great reason cry out, as Paul does, Who is sufficient for these things? 2 Cor. 2:16. This is a work indeed. What piety, what prudence, what zeal, what courage, what faithfulness, what watchfulness prohibition; for as good reasons may very often be given for marrying a second time, as for marrying at all.—The pastor must also be 'vigilant,' a circumspect and attentive man; one who watches carefully over his flock, capable of discerning dangers at a distance, guarding the people against the artifices of false teachers, and the devices of Satan, and prompt to embrace opportunities of usefulness: he must be 'sober,' serious, and temperate; moderate in all his desires and indulgencies, 'of good behavior' in all the transactions of life; showing a meek, kind, equitable, faithful, and prudent disposition towards all men. He should likewise be ready, according to his ability, to relieve the poor, to entertain his brethren without grudging, and with evident cheerfulness and satisfaction, especially, he ought to be hospitable to Christians, who were driven from home by persecution, or who, in any other way, were brought to the place of his residence.—However we understand the word "bishops," it must be allowed, that they ought to be preachers and teachers, and that frequently and promptly, and not unpreaching prelates.' Latimer.

(2.) Given to hospitality. 'As there were then, in the Eastern countries, few houses of public entertainment, hospitality to strangers was a virtue more peculiarly seasonable and necessary than among us.' Doddr.—Yet, is it not too much neglected? Ed.—Apt to teach. 'The Bp. of Winchester, though so candid as to admit that bishop and presbyter are of the same signification, yet makes it an argument in favor of episcopacy, that ordination is not spoken of. But there is nothing said either of administering the sacraments, which, with other circumstances, concurs to show how far Paul was from intending a full representation of all the pastoral duties. It may be added also, that the directions he afterwards gives to Timothy, on the head of ordination, may suggest instruction in this respect to all ministers. And it must be submitted to consideration, whether the omission of any charge to presbyters, enjoining them to obey their bishop, as a person of superior authority, does not weigh much more one way, than the omission pleaded above can avail the other.' Doddr.

V. 3. Filthy lucre. 'It is remarkable, that this phrase is seldom or never used in the N. T. to express any gain, but that which is made or procured by the covetousness of Christian ministers.' In.

V. 4. 'The result of my experience among the deaf and dumb, and also among other children, has long convinced me, that, both in the family and school, prayer, with the Word of God, applied to the conduct in an appropriate, kind, and solemn manner, is the great secret of effectual discipline and government. Let parents and teachers put themselves, and their own dignity, and authority, in a far less prominent attitude than is often the case. Let them so speak and act, as to lead those under their care, to regard them as God's vicegerents, commissioned and required to enforce his commands, and to see that his authority is respected and obeyed. Let the Bible be referred to, as the universal statute book; the director and arbiter of right and wrong; as the voice of God. Let the Holy Spirit be sought with earnest and devout supplication, for parent and child, teacher and pupil. Then the reason, the conscience, the heart, the will of children, and youth, will be reached and touched as if by the finger of God. He will honor and prosper our efforts, if we thus seek his aid, and use the instruments which He has appointed. Come, happy time! when the Bible shall be the great moral guide and helper in the discipline of families and schools; prayer invoke the blessing of God upon its use; and the Holy Spirit be shed down, to crown the whole with his divinely efficacious influence! Then the country and church will be safe, because their foundations will rest on the Rock of ages. Then the patriot and Christian, may look around with humble exultation on our free institutions, and say, with prophetic truth, "Be ye perpetual!" Rev. T. H. GALLAUDET.

V. 6. It would not be generally expedient, to choose a new convert to the pastoral office, or an inexperienced person, one but superficially acquainted with human nature, and the things of God; lest the distinction of his situation, or the applause bestowed on him, should elate him with pride and ambition, and he should thus fall into a condemnation similar to that of the devil. It is evident from this, that spiritual pride and ambition constituted the beginning of Satan's apostasy. (M. R.) Some have conjectured, that it was revealed to the angels, that the eternal Son would assume a nature inferior to theirs, in which He would rule over them, and be worshipped by them, and that Satan, and the other angels who fell with Him, proudly disdained such subjection. But all our conjectures on this subject must be uncertain, and in a measure presumptuous. The pride, however, and ambition of ministers on account of their office, gifts, popularity, or success, would be of a nature in some respects similar to Satan's pride in heaven, and might involve 'the novice' under a similar condemnation.—It is evident, that some exceptions, to this most important general rule, must have been admitted, in the first formation of newly planted churches, in which the miraculous gifts and endowments conferred by the Holy Spirit, seem to have superseded the necessity of that previous study and experience, which are, in all ordinary cases, indispensable. Ac. 14:21—23. Sc.

V. 7. It is evident, that the apostle did not here at all speak of the several duties of ministers, but only of the general conduct and character of those, whose desires after that office were to be countenanced, or the contrary, by Timothy, and by others concerned. Nothing, therefore, can be proved, as some have attempted, from supposed omissions of any duties of ministers, or parts of their office, for this was not the apostle's subject.—Which are without [Notes, 1 Cor. 5:9—13. Col. 4:5, 6. The snare of the devil.] The singular number, and the prefixed article tu diabolou, preclude the interpretation of those, who explain the passage of false accusers, and the snares laid by them. In.

(7.) Snare of the devil. 'Some have explained it of some human slanderer, but it seems much more natural in the sense of devil, v. 6. our great infernal enemy. And it is easy to see, that Satan might graft many dangerous temptations, on the evil report which a man might have incurred by any scandal, before he entered on the ministry; either attempting to draw him to the repetition of former evils, from an apprehension that he had very little reputation to lose by a new fall, or weakening his hands in efforts of usefulness, by a fear, that the remembrance of those past irregularities would render his attempts less effectual.' over ourselves, our lusts, appetites, and passions, and over those under our charge; I say, what holy watchfulness is necessary in this work! Have not the best qualified and the most faithful and conscientious ministers just reason to complain against themselves, that so much is requisite by way of qualification, and so much work is necessary to be done? And, alas! how far short do the best come of what they should be, and what they should do! Yet let those bless God, and be thankful, whom the Lord has enabled, and counted faithful, putting them into the ministry; if God is pleased to make any, in some degree, able and faithful, let Him have the praise and glory of it.

V. 8—13. 1. We have here the character of deacons. Of the institution of this office, PRACT. OBS. V. 1—7. The office of a minister is an arduous and laborious, 'but a good work,' in every respect. It is indeed that most honorable, useful, and important employment, in which Emmanuel Himself chose to be occupied, while He refused to assume the office of King, during his abode on earth. But to desire emolument or authority in the church, by intruding into this sacred office, without either qualifications suited to its important duties, or any purpose of performing them, from indolence, ambition, and love of 'filthy lucre,' is the vilest of all prostitutions, and merits the deepest condemnation.—The pastors of the Lord's flock should be continent, vigilant, sober, 'of good behavior, given to hospitality, apt to teach,' and remote from violent passions, and every kind and degree of covetousness. The more extensive the sphere, and the more conspicuous the station, to which any of them are called, the greater measure of all these holy endowments are requi-sited; but no man can be a meet person for the pastoral office, in the most obscure situation, who is unwatchful, frivolous, licentious, given to wine, greedy of gain, disposed to furious anger, negligent of moral and relative duties, selfish, averse to hospitality, and unable or unwilling to teach the flock.—The folly, ostentation, conformity to the world, extravagance or ungodliness of a minister's family, will inevitably and greatly lessen his influence, and prevent his usefulness, as well as ruin his comfort. It is also very wrong for novices, however eminent for abilities and gifts, to be pushed forward prematurely into this arduous work. This has ruined many promising young men, by puffing them up with pride, and so casting them into 'the condemnation of the devil.' And Satan finds various advantages against such as lose their reputation, and incur the reproach of the enemies of the Gospel, and not only against them, but against the cause of truth and holiness. with that which gave occasion to it, you have an account in Acts 6:1—7. It was requisite the deacons should have a good character, because they were assistants to the ministers, appeared and acted publicly, and had a great trust reposed in them. They must be grave; gravity becomes all Christians, but especially those who are in office in the church. Not double-tongued; [vulnerable;] that will say one thing to one, and another thing to another, according as their interest leads them; flatterers and slanderers are double-tongued. Not given to much wine; for that is a great disparagement to any man, especially to a Christian, and one in office, unfits men for business, opens the door to many temptations. Not greedy of filthy lucre; this would especially be bad in the deacons, who were intrusted with the church's money, and, if they were covetous and greedy of filthy lucre, would be tempted to embezzle it, and convert that to their own use which was intended for the public service. Holding the mystery of faith in a pure conscience, v. 9. Note, The mystery of faith is best held in a pure conscience. The practical love of truth is the most powerful preservative from error and delusion. Let these also first be proved, v. 10. It is not fit that the public trusts should be lodged in the hands of any, till they are first proved, and found [not merely ready of tongue, in prayer, and shrewd, but] fit for the business they are to be intrusted with; the soundness of their judgments, their zeal for Christ, and the blamelessness of their conversation, must be proved.

2. Their wives likewise must have a good character, v. 11. be of a grave behavior, not slanderers, tale-bearers, carrying stories to make mischief and sow discord; they must be sober and faithful in all things, not given to any excess, but trusty in all that is committed to them. All who are related to ministers, must double their care to walk as becomes the Gospel of Christ, lest, if they in anything walk disorderly, the ministry be blamed. As he said before of the bishops or ministers, so here of the deacons; [each is to] be the husband of one wife, such as had not put away their wives, on dislike, and married others; they must rule their children and their own houses well; families of ministers should be examples to other families. And the reason why the deacons must be thus qualified, is, v. 13. because, though the office of a deacon be of an inferior degree, yet it is a step toward the higher degree; or it may be meant of the good reputation a man would gain by his fidelity in this office; they will purchase to themselves great boldness in the faith that is in Jesus Christ.

Observe, In the primitive church there were but two orders of ministers, or officers, bishops and deacons, Phil. 1:1. After ages have invented the rest. Clemens Romanus, in his epistle to the Christians, ch. 42, 44, speaks very fully and plainly to this effect, that the apostles, foreknowing, by our Lord Jesus Christ, that there would arise in the Christian church a controversy about the name Episcopacy, appointed the forementioned orders, bishops and deacons. The scripture-deacon's main employment was, to serve tables, and not to preach or baptize. Philip, indeed, did preach and baptize many in Samaria, Acts 8. but he was an evangelist, Acts 21:8. and he might preach and baptize, and perform any other part of the ministerial office, under that character; but still the design of the deacon's office was, to mind the temporal concerns of the church, such as providing for the ministers, and the poor.

V. 14—16. He concludes the ch. with a particular direction to Timothy. He hoped shortly to come to him, to give him further directions and assistance in his work; but he wrote lest he should tarry long, that he might know how to conduct himself as became an evangelist, and the apostle's substitute. He must know how to behave himself, not only in the particular church where he was now appointed to reside for some time, but in other churches, where he should in like manner be appointed to reside for some time; therefore it is not the church of Ephesus, but the Catholic [or universal] church, which is here called the house of God, which is the church of the living God. Observe here,

God is the living God; the church is his house, where He dwells; and this is the great support of the church, that it is the church of the living God, the true God in opposition to false gods; the pillar and ground of truth; i. e. either, 15 But if I tarry long, that thou mayest know how thou oughtest to behave thyself in the house <sup>u</sup> of God, which is the church of the living God, the pillar and <sup>v</sup> ground of the truth.

Not that the authority of the Scriptures depends on that of the church, as the papists pretend, for truth is the pillar and ground of the church; but the church holds forth the Scripture and the doctrine of Christ, as the pillar, to which a proclamation is affixed; holds forth the proclamation, Eph. 3:10.

2. Others understand it of Timothy; not he himself only, but he as an evangelist, and other faithful ministers, are the pillars and ground of truth; it is their business to maintain, hold up, and publish, the truths

PRACT. OBS. V. 8—16. The 'mystery of faith' will never appear respectable among men, except it be held in 'a pure conscience.' Professed Christians should therefore be proved, and found blameless, before they are admitted to any office in the church. Time spent in preparation and probation will not be lost, and a precipitate zeal is not one of the prescribed qualifications for the ministry.—This 'doctrine of God our Savior,' will be despised or revered, in great measure according to the conduct of professors of the Gospel, which will be greatly influenced by Phil. 2:14—18.—Others detach the sentence from this v. and connect it with the following; as if the apostle had meant, that 'the mystery of godliness, God was manifest in the flesh,' was 'the pillar and ground of the truth;' but this construction seems inadmissible; for this great mystery is an essential part of the truth, of which 'the church is the pillar and ground.' And as the church is appointed to maintain, hold forth, and 'adorn the doctrine of God our Savior,' in the midst of a dark and wicked world, it was very important, that Timothy should know how to conduct himself, in subserviency to this great design. SCOTT.

(14.) Hoping to come, &c.] 'It seems evident from hence, that Paul intended to have come back to Timothy, at Ephesus, in a little time, but was providentially called another way; but it can by no means be concluded from hence, that Paul wrote this epistle to Timothy, after his first imprisonment at Rome.' DODDR.

(15.) 'No interpretation of this text seems more precarious, than that which refers it to the church. That had just before been called a house, and therefore cannot naturally be called a pillar, or foundation. Yet, if it were to be granted, it would only prove that the church was to support Christianity from age to age,—not that any particular church is infallible. Many good critics refer this descriptive clause to Timothy, agreeably to that figure by which Peter is called a pillar, Ga.2:9. Comp. Rev. 3:12. But I choose to end the sentence with the word God; and begin the next with The pillar, &c.; then the whole system of evangelical truths is considered as resting on this pillar and basis.' DODDR.—Bl. maintains the following as the most natural connexion. 'And great is the dignity and importance of the church universal, as being the depository of the fundamental truths of the Gospel, of which we may undoubtedly say: "Great is the mystery of godliness;" and it is this, &c.' ED.—Some have wished to read "which," or "who," instead of "God," in this verse. The difference, in the original, would be made by a very trifling variation in the characters used. But, as Bloomf. states, the external evidence is decidedly in favor of the word "God," while that in favor of reading "which," or "who," is next to nothing; and the internal testimony against "which," or "who," is not less decisive, while it is objectionable on every ground. Also, J. P. Smith shows, that the reading "which," or "who," would oblige us to understand "the mystery," as a description of Christ, personally, and that such a description is rational and intelligible only on the admission of the Christian doctrine concerning the person of the Savior.' HENRY, abr.—'The apostle is generally supposed to make some allusion to the heathen mysteries, and as those mysteries always have reference to some deity, this greatly favors, or rather confirms the common reading of the text. T. H. HORNE, in Henry, abr.—'Shuttleworth remarks, that the abrupt introduction and detached character of this passage, give it all the appearance of a compressed formula of doctrine. It thus forms an epitome of belief, consisting of the following articles. 1. The Divinity and incarnation of Christ. 2. The separate personality and implied Divinity of the Holy Spirit. 3. The universality of the offer of redemption to the human race. 4. The necessity of faith. 5. The reascension of our Savior into glory, and the consequently implied resurrection of mankind. He would understand the word angels, in this place, to refer to the apostles, as the companions and ministers of our Savior, rather than to the angelic beings, in which sense the word is used at the beginning of the Apocalypse and elsewhere.'

V. 16. That 'Mystery of godliness.' It must be noted, that it 'is the mystery of godliness.' The revelation and belief of it have always of Christ in the church. It is said of the apostles, that they seemed to be pillars, Gal. 2:9. Let us be diligent and impartial in our inquiries after truth; let us take care to publish it, and to transmit it safe and uncorrupted unto posterity. When the church ceases to be the pillar and ground of truth, we may and ought to forsake her.

Now what is the truth which the churches and ministers are the pillars and grounds of? He tells us, v. 16. that without controversy great is the mystery of godliness. The learned Cameron joins this with what goes before, and then it runs thus, 'The pillar and ground of the truth, and without controversy great, is the mystery of godliness.' He supposes this mystery to be the pillar, &c. Observe,

Christianity is a mystery, a mystery that could not have been found out by reason or the light of nature, and cannot be comprehended by reason, because it is above reason, though not contrary to it. It is a mystery of godliness, designed to promote godliness; and herein it exceeds all the mysteries of the Gentiles. It is a revealed mystery, not shut up and sealed; and it does not, because now in part revealed, cease to be a mystery.

Now what is the mystery of godliness? It is Christ; and here are six things concerning Christ, which make up the mystery of godliness.

(1.) He is God manifest in the flesh.

that of ministers, their families and connexions. (Note, Tit. 2:7—10.) The importance of these things is therefore unspeakable, and our watchfulness ought to correspond with it.—While numbers want a religion 'without mystery,' (which those who worship the incomprehensible God cannot possibly have,) and while many seem to make the very truths of the Gospel 'a mystery of ungodliness,' let us glory in the incontrovertibly 'great mystery of godliness,' and show the sanctifying efficacy of it in our lives. SCOTT.

been and are the beginning, and spring, of all pious dispositions and affections in the hearts of fallen men, and of all the spiritual worship of God in the world.—Had this mystery never been revealed, there would not have been any true 'godliness' among men; none can be found, where this mystery is unknown or rejected, and 'godliness' abounds in proportion, as it is scripturally proposed and received.—By this mystery, men learn the true character of God, as 'a just God and a Savior,' and the way in which sinners may approach and worship Him; they discover their real situation, their danger, and their remedy, and thus they are brought to fear, trust, love, worship, obey, and rejoice in God. The substance and centre of this great mystery is this, 'God was manifest in the flesh;' the divine nature, in the Person of the co-eternal and co-equal Son and Word of God, 'was manifested' to fallen men, as dwelling in the man Christ Jesus, so that whoever saw, or contemplated, by faith, this express 'Image of the invisible God,' saw the Father also. (Is. 7:14. 9:6. Jer. 23:5. 6. Mic. 5:2. Mat. 1:23. John 1:1, 2, 14. Ac. 20:28. Rom. 8:3. 9:5. 1 Cor. 15:47. Gal. 4:4. Phil. 2:6—8. Col. 1:16—18. Heb. 1:3. 2:9—13. 1 John 1:2. Rev. 1:17, 18.—Notes, Is. 7:14. 9:6, 7. Mat. 11:27. John 1:1—18. 14:7—14. 15:22—25. Phil. 2:5—11. Col. 1:15—17. Heb. 1:1, 2.)—Thus sinners 'acquaint themselves with God,' and are reconciled to Him. This high character Emmanuel claimed, when on earth, and the unmeasurable union of the Holy Spirit in his human nature, as demonstrated by his perfect holiness and stupendous miracles, justified his claim.—This most important part of Scripture seems to have been obscured, and confined in the interpretation given of it, by the attempt of some expositors, to reduce the overflowsings of the apostle's fervent spirit to their own ideas of method. But the events referred to cannot be reduced to exact order of time, without evidently doing violence to the meaning of the words.—The construction of the v. necessarily requires, that the first clause should serve as the nominative case to the subsequent verbs.—On the above interpretation, [as in Henry,] the construction is as follows; 'God was manifested in the flesh,' 'God, manifested in the flesh,' was justified by 'the Spirit, was seen of angels, &c.' But many have labored to establish another reading from some manuscripts, ancient versions, and quotations, to this effect; 'the mystery of godliness, which was manifested in the flesh.' (Ho, instead of Theos.) According to this reading, it must follow, 'which' mystery 'was justified in the Spirit,' which mystery 'was seen of angels,' which mystery was 'preached unto the Gentiles,' which mystery 'was believed in the world,' which mystery 'was received up into glory.' The mystery being 'manifested in the flesh,' and 'the mystery being received up into glory,' are not very intelligible propositions; but numbers seem to prefer absurdity to orthodoxy, especially in respect of the person of Emmanuel. Others, on similar authority, substitute 'who.' (Theos for hos.) But there is no antecedent to this relative, except 'God,' in the preceding v. 'The church of the living God, (the pillar, and ground of the truth, and without controversy great is the mystery of godliness,) who was manifested, &c.' This brings in the same doctrine, but with a very unnatural parenthesis.—The authority for either of these readings is by no means satisfactory, and the internal evidence for that adopted in our translation is so strong, that it turns the balance completely on that side, in my judgment at least.

(16.) 'It is no proof that our affections are truly gracious, because they are produced by texts of Scripture, suddenly, and in an extraordinary manner, applied to the mind. Some persons seem to regard this, as a good evidence that their affections are saving, especially if they are of his exaltation, and because not only his ascension is meant, but his sitting at the right hand of God, where He ever lives, making intercession, and has all power, both in heaven and earth; and because in the apostasy, of which Paul treats in the following ch., his remaining in heaven would be denied by those who pretend to bring Him down on their altars in the consecrated waters. Observe,

He who was manifest in flesh, was God, really and truly; God by nature, and not only by office, for this makes it to be a mystery. God was manifest in flesh, real flesh, Heb. 2:14. And what is more amazing, He was manifest in the flesh, after all flesh had corrupted his way, though He Himself was ho-

PRACT. OBS. V. 1-5. The Scriptures are arranged with such consummate wisdom, that the apostasies of those, who 'give heed to seducing spirits,' and teach 'the doctrine of demons,' introducing idolatry and various dire corruptions into the church, 'turn to a testimony,' to every humble believer, who, reading that 'the Spirit spoke expressly' of these things long before, is thus most fully convinced of the divine authority of the sacred oracles.—Those false teachers, who most neglect the commandments of God, and allow themselves and others in the most atrocious violations of moral and relative duties, are generally very prompt to forbid as evil what God has pronounced innocent and honorable; and to command as a duty what He has left indifferent. But 'the law of the Lord' is 'exceedingly broad;' and we shall find abundant exercise for watchfulness, diligence, self-denial, and mortification of the hope, or joy, or any other that are pleasing and delightful. What deceives many of the less informed and considerate, seems to be this; the SS. are the Word of God, and therefore contain nothing but what is true and holy; and hence the experience proceeding from the application of passages from them, must be evangelical. But affections may arise from them, not as their genuine fruit, and from a right application, but from an abuse of them. All that can be argued from the veracity and purity of the Word of God, is,—that that experience which is agreeable to it cannot be wrong, and not that those affections must be right, which arise in consequence of the Word of God coming to our minds. Is there any proof that the devil cannot bring texts to the mind, and misapply them for the purpose of deceiving? Or are texts of Scripture so sacred that Satan dares not abuse them? He had the temerity to tempt Christ, and to put Him in mind of texts for this purpose, and why may he not put wicked men in mind of texts, to tempt them? We know that the ministers of Satan, heretical teachers, can and do pervert Scripture to their own and others' damnation, 2 Pet. 3:16. and there is no text so precious and sacred, but they may abuse it. When they do this, they do it at his instigation, and doubtless he himself does what he induces others to do.

NOTES. CHAP. IV. V. 1-5. To stir up Timothy, and others by him, to adhere steadfastly to the 'great mystery of godliness,' 3:16. the apostle declared, that the Holy Spirit spake, in the most express and decisive manner, not only by Daniel, and others of the ancient prophets, but to Paul himself by immediate revelation, and perhaps to several of his brethren, concerning certain persons in the latter days, under the Christian dispensation, or in after times, who would apostatize from the true faith of the Gospel. Dan. 7:7, 8, 19-27. 11:31-39. 2 Thes. 2:3, 4. 2 Tim. 3:1-5. Rev. 13:14.—Every one, who is at all acquainted with ecclesiastical history, must know what apostasy and corruption of Christianity has most entirely accorded to this prediction. The Judaizing teachers, and the Gnostics, and others, contended, indeed, for some of these superstitious; 'the mystery of iniquity' in these respects did 'even then work;' but it was reserved for the church of Rome fully to prove the truth of the Scriptures, by accomplishing these predictions in their most detestable enormities. It has been shown, in what manner the errors of the Judaizing teachers, and the traditions of the Pharisees, ly from the womb. Godliness is a mystery in all its parts and branches, from the beginning to the end, from Christ's incarnation to his ascension. It being a great mystery, we should rather humbly adore, and piously believe it, than curiously pry into, or be too positive in our explications of it, and determinations about it, further than the Holy Scriptures have revealed.

CHAP. IV. V. 1-5. We have here a prophecy of the apostasy of the latter times, 2 Thes. 2. He means the Spirit in the O. T. or the Spirit in the prophets of the N. T. or both. The Spirit in both spake expressly of a general apostasy from the faith of Christ, and the pure worship of God. The latter times means the Christian dispensation, called also the latter days, the following ages of the church. Some shall depart, or there shall be an apostasy; some, not all; for, in the worst of times, God will have a remnant, according to the election of grace. They shall depart from the faith, the faith delivered to the saints, Jude 3. delivered at once, the sound doctrine of the Gospel. Giving heed to seducing spirits; men who pretended to the Spirit, but were not really guided by the Spirit, 1 Jn. 4:1. Now here observe, flesh, in attending to its holy requirements, without being laid under further restrictions, or tasked to imaginary duties; as if we had at present done all his will, and wanted more employment! We should, therefore, be on our guard against impositions of this kind, on whatever pretence they are enforced; and, while we follow after purity, and exercise temperance in all things, according to the will of God; let us disregard such as judge us in those things which He has allowed.—While we are satisfied, that 'every creature of God is good, and nothing to be refused;' let us remember, that all should be 'received with thanksgiving, by them who believe and know the truth;' that even the divine allowance will not sanctify an intemperate, inexpedient, extravagant, unthankful, or cruel use of the creatures; and that nothing will be good to us, except we seek, by prayer, the Lord's blessing on our use of it. SCOTT.

1. One of the great instances of that apostasy, giving heed to doctrines of demons, or concerning demons; doctrines which teach the worship of saints and angels, as a middle sort of deities, between the immortal God and mortal men, such as the heathens called demons, and worshipped under [in their hero worship] that notion. Now this plainly agrees to the church of Rome, and was one of the first steps toward that great apostasy, the enshrining of the relics of martyrs, paying divine honors to them, erecting altars, burning incense, consecrating images and temples, and making prayers and praises to the honor of saints departed. This demon worship is paganism revived, [see Middleton's Letter from Rome,] the image of the first beast.

on the one hand, and the speculations of the heathen philosophers, on the other, corrupted the pure doctrine of Christianity in the primitive times. (Notes, Col. 2:8-23.) But it should not be forgotten, that in subsequent ages, especially in the Roman church, the mythology of the pagans, and the writings of the poets, helped to introduce still further corruptions. For what are the nuns of popery, but the vestal virgins of the Romans, engrafted on Christianity? The monks, indeed, are [in some respects] an unprecedented addition. Saints and angels, as mediators, answer to the demigods and heroes of the pagans; (Note, 1 Cor. 8:4-6.) and the numerous processions and festivals of the papists, and the method of observing them, answer, with surprising exactness, to those described in Homer and Virgil, especially in the latter. Indeed, it appears to me, that a learned man, who had leisure to compare all the pompous and fascinating, outward services in the church of Rome especially, though not there exclusively, with the Greek and Latin poets, might form, I had almost said, a Rubric and a ritual from the latter. [See this done in Dr. A. Clarke's Commentary, and comp. Middleton's Letter from Rome.] At least, I have never, for many years, opened Virgil to read a few pages but I have met with some things, which cogently reminded me of the popish processions and festivals.—'The third v. contains one of the boldest ellipses in the N. T., where a word is to be understood, contrary to that which is before expressed; but, some of the most celebrated classical writers, and particularly Horace and Cicero, take the same liberty.' Doctr. The passage undeniably demands this construction; and all the ancient expositions and versions supply the ellipsis in the same manner, or to the same meaning.—Devils. This term, thus used, proves that the worship of saints and angels, as mediators, in the antichristian system, is as much idolatry, and centres as much in the worship of evil spirits, as the pagan worship did; and that it was introduced, and is maintained, by the seduction of 'the devil and his angels,' even as heathen idolatry was. SCOTT.

(1.) Latter times. 'The whole period or time under the reign of the Messiah.' Doctr.—'All the delusions of Satan, by which those persons are carried away who are under the influence of false religion, seem to be formed in the imagination. This is the devil's grand lurking-place. It is probable he cannot come at the soul of man, to excite any thoughts, or produce any effects there, but through his imagination.' EDWARDS.

6 If thou put the brethren in remembrance of these things, thou shalt be a good minister of Jesus Christ, nourished up in the words of faith and of good doctrine, whereunto thou hast attained.

7 But refuse profane and old wives' fables, and exercise thyself rather unto godliness.

8 For bodily exercise profiteth little: but godliness is profitable unto all things, having promise of the life that now is, and of that which is to come.

9 This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptance.

10 For therefore we both labor and suffer reproach, because we trust in the living God, who is the Savior of all men, specially of those that believe.

11 These things command and teach.

12 Let no man despise thy youth; but be thou an example of the believers, in word, in conversation, in charity, in spirit, in faith, in purity.

13 Till I come, give attendance to reading, to exhortation, to doctrine.

14 Neglect not the gift that is in thee, which was given thee by prophecy, with the laying on of the hands of the presbytery.

ed that this is the most likely to work in us an approbation of what pretends to come from the Spirit. 6. Men must be hardened, and their consciences scared, before they can depart from the faith, and draw in others to side with them. 7. It is a sign that men have departed from the faith, when they will command what God has forbidden, such as saint and angel or demon-worship; and forbid what God has allowed or commanded, such as marriage and meats.

V. 6—10. Savior of all men, &c.] 'The Preserver of all men,' in respect of their lives and temporal concerns, and who will, therefore, take especial care of believers, as interested in his covenanted blessings. Or, who is the Savior of sinners, whether Jews or Gentiles, and of mankind in general; so that none are rejected when they seek to Him for salvation; of which believers are already made partakers by his special grace. Do they, who seem dissatisfied with this interpretation, (as some are,) really intend to maintain, that all men, without exception, will eventually be saved? 'The author of the book, De Vocatione Gentium, expounds this very well, telling us, that by saying . . . "He is the Savior of all men," he confirms the general goodness of God towards all men; and by adding, "specially of them that believe," he shows, there is one part of mankind, who, through the benefit of divinely inspired faith, is by special benefits advanced to the highest and eternal felicity.' Whitby. (6) Bodily exercise.] See on Luke 3:22. Gymnasia. Such as the combatants in the public gymnastic games used, 1 Cor. 4:24—27, whose painful exercises the devotees of superstition imitated. SCOTT.

(7.) Exercise thyself . . . unto godliness.] A most valuable hint; for one great error of the prevalent system of education, especially female education, is, that it is rather preceptive than practitioner. Now it is with the mind and heart, the intellect and affections, the sentiments and propensities, as with the bodily muscles, in one sense; the repetition of a thought or desire, renders similar thoughts or desires more easy; and such acts of intellect, feeling, or propensity, more readily suggest themselves again, and again, and, the oftener repeated, the more readily, till habits of thought, feeling, and sensation are formed,—and these habits are character, and this character goes into eternity. The apostle then requires Timothy to exercise his conscientiousness, his benevolence, his veneration, his love of perfection, his faith; in fine, his love to God, and his law, as holy, just, and good; exercise himself unto godliness or godlikeness. And this is the whole business and end of humanity, of our existence in this world, the moulding of our characters to godlikeness, by constant exercise of the faculties we are endowed with; and God has fitted this whole world to those faculties, endowing us with a correspondent constitution, to be disciplined to moral excellence by the varied experience of life, by God's physical, organic, moral, and revealed laws, and promising the assistance of his Spirit to help our obedience. —The Germans, in their admirable practical system of common school education, acknowledge this law of exercise in moral perfection, and their schoolbooks have questions of conscience, &c. to exercise the pupil,

Upon occasion of the mentioning of their hypocritical fastings, the apostle lays down the doctrine of the Christian liberty we enjoy under the Gospel, of using God's good creatures; that whereas, under the law, there was a distinction of meats between clean and unclean, (such sort of flesh they might eat, and such they might not eat,) all that is now taken away; and we are to call nothing common or unclean, Acts 10:15.

Observe, God's good creatures are then good, and doubly sweet to us, when received with thanksgiving, and sanctified by the Word of God and prayer, v. 5. It is desirable to have a sanctified use of our creature-comforts.

V. 6—16. If thou put the brethren in remembrance, &c. He would have Timothy to instil such notions as these into the minds of Christians, which might prevent their being seduced by the Judaizing teachers. Observe, Those are good ministers of Jesus Christ, who are diligent, not to advance new notions, but to put the brethren in remembrance of those things which they have received and heard, 2 Pet. 1:12. 3:1. And, says the apostle Jude, I will therefore put you in remembrance, Jude 5.

Nourished up in the words of faith and good doctrine, whereunto thou hast attained. Observe, Even ministers have need to grow and increase in the knowledge of Christ; they must be nourished up in the words of faith.

I. Godliness is here pressed on him and others, v. 7, 8. Jewish traditions they were to have nothing to do with, but to mind practical religion. Those who would be godly, must exercise themselves unto godliness; bodily exercise, abstinence from meats and marriage, and the like, though they pass for acts of mortification and self-denial, yet turn to little account. What will it avail us, to mortify the body, if we do not mortify sin! Observe,

A great deal is to be got by godliness; it will be of use to us in the whole of our life; for it has the promise of the life that now is, and of that which is to come. Observe, The gain lies much in the promise; the promise to the godly, as to the life that now is, but especially the life to come. If godly people have but little of the good things of the life that now is, yet [they are blessed in their spirits, and enjoying the happiness which flows from the exercise of their better feelings, and] it shall be made up to them in the good things of the life that is to come.

II. The encouragement we have to proceed in the ways of godliness, and to exercise ourselves to it, notwithstanding the difficulties and discouragements we meet with in it. Those who labor, and suffer reproach, in the service of God and the work of religion, may depend on the living God, that they shall not lose by it. Let this encourage them; We trust in the living God. The consideration of this, that that God who has undertaken to be our Paymaster, is the living God, who does Himself live for ever, and is the Fountain of life to all who serve Him, should encourage us in all our services and in all our sufferings for Him, especially considering that He is the Savior of all men, in that He protects their persons and lives; is not willing any should perish, but that all should come to repentance, and much more will be the Rewarder of those who seek and serve Him, who are new creatures, who are born again. He is the Savior of all men, but especially of those that believe; and the salvation he has in store for those that believe, is sufficient to recompense them for all their services and sufferings.

Here we see, 1. The life of a Christian is a life of labor and suffering; we labor and suffer. 2. The best we can expect to suffer in the present life is, reproach for our well-doing. 3. True Christians trust in the living God; for cursed is the man that trusts in man, or in any but the living God. 4. God is the general Savior of all men, as He has put them into a salvable state; but peculiarly of true believers; there is then a general and a special redemption.

III. He concludes the ch. with an exhortation to Timothy, to command and teach these things he had now been teaching him.

He charges him to conduct himself with that gravity and prudence that might gain him respect, notwithstanding his youth; v. 12. to confirm his doctrine by a good example, as is the duty of those who teach; and to study hard, that he might be well furnished for his ministry, v. 13. The exhortation to reading, &c. may be meant of private study, or of the public reading of the Scriptures; he must read and exhort, that is, read and expound; expound both by way of exhortation, and of doctrine.

and their schoolmasters are required to EXERCISE THE FEELINGS as well as intellects of their pupils, by presenting cases in life and history for judgment, by holding up examples of virtue and vice, and in every way a Christian wisdom can suggest,—and this is one great advantage of their system over our own; for in our 'common schools,' little is done, (except perhaps in a preceptive way,) to aught but the intellect, while the moral sentiments are too much, if not entirely neglected. And the Bible, some think, (how deplorable, if truly,) must not be introduced for fear of sectarianism! Self-discipline, self-examination, self-judgment, self-reproval, self-education, spiritual as well as mental, self-exercise unto godliness,—alas, how much neglected in schools, families, and the hearts of individuals! Observe, 1. Ministers must teach and command the things they are taught and commanded themselves, Mat. 28: 20. And this is the best way for ministers to prevent themselves from being despised. 2. Those ministers that are the best accomplished for their work must yet mind their studies, that they may be improving in knowledge ; and they must mind also their work ; they are to give attendance to reading, to exhortation, to doctrine.

Neglect not the gift that is in thee, v. 14. The gifts of God will wither, if neglected. It may be understood either of the office to which he was advanced, or of his qualifications for that office ; if of the former, it was ordination in an ordinary way ; if of the latter, it was extraordinary. It seems to be the former, for it was by laying on of hands, &c. Observe, Timothy was ordained by men in office. It was an extraordinary gift

PRACT. OBS. V. 6—16. They, who would approve themselves to be faithful ministers, must 'put the brethren in remembrance' of all those things, which Christ and his apostles delivered to the church ; and whatever other studies or accomplishments may be supposed requisite, in those intended for the ministry, it is, above all, necessary, that they 'be nourished up in the words of faith and of good doctrine ;' and that they well digest that knowledge of the Scripture to which they have attained.—Instead of amusing ourselves and others, with ingenious fancies and curious speculations, or with enforcing human inventions and superstitions, by imaginary or fallacious explanations of their origin, meaning, and benefit, which are often no better than 'profane and old wives' fables,' we should exercise ourselves, and instruct others, in the substantial duties of godliness.—Young ministers, when called into conspicuous situations, should be doubly careful to 'abstain from all appearance of evil,' and to shun all levity of conduct, as well as whatever is more directly criminal, or leads to criminality. For they will be narrowly observed, and many will be ready to deem them unfit for their arduous services, especially when they are called to instruct or to admonish their seniors and superiors. Ministers should also be careful to confirm and elucidate their instructions by their example ; and thus to lead forward believers to steadfastness in the faith, holiness of conversation and conduct, fervent love, spirituality, fidelity, integrity, and purity. Their time should be employed in reading and meditating on the Scriptures ; in acquiring religious knowledge, and in communicating it, by the public and private

we read of elsewhere, as being conferred on him by the laying on of Paul's hands, but he was invested in the office of the ministry by the laying on of the hands of the presbytery.

1. Note, the office of the ministry is a gift, the gift of Christ, Eph. 4: 8, 11. a very kind gift to his church. 2. Though there was prophecy in the case of Timothy, (the gift was given by prophecy,) yet this was accompanied with the laying on of the hands of the presbytery, i. e. a number of presbyters ; the office was conveyed to him this way ; and I should think here is a sufficient warrant for ordination by presbyters, since it does not appear that Paul was concerned in Timothy's ordination. It is true, extraordinary gifts were conferred on him by the laying on of the apostle's hands, 2 Tim. 1: 6. but if he was concerned in his ordination, the presbytery was not excluded, for that is particularly mentioned ; whence it seems pretty evident, that the presbytery have the inherent power of ordination.

Having this work committed to him, he must give himself wholly to it. He was a wise, knowing man, yet he must still be profiting, and make it appear that he improved in knowledge. Ministers are to be much in meditation ; they are to consider beforehand how and what they must speak ; they are to meditate on the great trust committed to them, on the worth and value of immortal souls, and on the account they must give at the last ; and they must be wholly in these things, must mind them as their principal work and business. By these means their profiting will appear in all things, as well as to all persons ; this is the way for them to profit in knowledge and grace, and also to profit others.

He presses it on him to be very cautious, v. 16. Observe, The care of ministers should be, in the first place, to save themselves ; yet they should aim at the salvation of those that hear them, next to the salvation of their own souls ; and the best way to answer both these ends is to take heed to ourselves, &c.

CHAP. V. V. 1, 2. Here the apostle gives rules to Timothy, and in him to other ministers, in reproof. They must be very tender in rebuking elders, not sharp or magisterial. The younger they must rebuke as brethren ; not as desirous to spy faults, or pick quarrels, but as willing to make the best of them. The elder women must be reproofed, when there is occasion, but as mothers, Hos. 2: 2. the younger women as sisters, duties of their ministry. This will leave them no leisure for dissipated pleasures, trifling visits, or idle conversation, and but little for amusing and merely ornamental studies. That measure of endowment, which God has given them for the work to which they have been set apart, and to which they solemnly devoted themselves, when ordained by 'the laying on of the hands of the' pastors of the church, must not be neglected, or left to decrease by disuse, but be diligently exercised and improved.—Alas ! we cannot but reflect with grief of heart, that so few of those called ministers seem so much as to have ever seriously read these directions ! and that their method of spending their time, the subjects of their studies, the objects of their pursuits, and the business and pleasure of their lives, form a perfect contrast to what they ought to be. But may the Lord have mercy on each of us, and write these admonitions in our inmost souls ! Let every minister, then, hear the apostle call on him to 'take heed to himself,' as one who must give account ; and let every one persevere in his holy living and faithful preaching, however despised, reviled, opposed, or discouraged he may be ; for in so doing, he shall both 'save his own soul,' and those of his attentive hearers ; while dumb and greedy dogs, blind watchmen or guides, mercenary teachers, and gay triflers in the garb of Christian ministers, in short, all those 'who look every one for his gain from his quarter,' however otherwise distinguished by rank, nobility, learning, or eloquence, can have no reason to expect any other event of their conduct, than that of going before their deluded followers into the pit of everlasting destruction. PRACT OBS. V. 1—8. There is a respect due to the aged, which must not be withheld by their juniors, even when placed in authority over them, or on account of incidental faults.—The greatest caution, as well as purity, is requisite in the conduct of ministers, (especially while in the prime of life,) as to their most needful converse with the younger women in their congregations, neighborhood, and acquaintance; that all occasion, appearance, and suspicion of evil may be prevented; and the neglect of this caution is very frequently productive of lamentable consequences, in various ways; even where direct criminality does not take place, or is indeed designed.—If any who profess the Gospel, through sloth, improvidence, selfishness, or other corrupt principles, wilfully neglect or refuse to provide for their near relatives; they, in the apostle's judgment, virtually 'deny the faith,' and are even in this particular worse than their openly unbelieving neighbors. And may we not, by parity of reason, infer, that they who neglect to instruct their household again, v. 8. If any man or woman do not maintain their own poor relations who belong to them, they do, in effect, deny the faith; for the design of Christ was to confirm the law of Moses, and particularly the law of the fifth commandment; so that they deny the faith, who disobey that law, much more if they provide not for their wives and children, which are parts of themselves; if they spend that on their lusts, which should maintain their families, they have denied the faith, and are worse than infidels.

One reason why this care must be taken, that those who were rich should maintain their poor relations, and not burden the church with them, is, v. 16. that it may relieve them that are widows indeed. Observe, Charity misplaced, is a great hindrance to true charity; therefore there should be prudence in the choice of the objects of charity, that it may not be thrown away on those who are [not] properly so, that there may be the more for those who are real objects of charity.

3. None were to be taken into the number, to receive the church's charity, under sixty years old, nor any who had divorced their husbands, or been divorced from them, and married again; she must have been the wife of one man, such as had been a house-keeper, had a good name for hospitality and charity, well reported of for good works. Observe, Particular care ought to be taken to relieve those, when they fall into decay, who, when they had wherewithal, were ready to every good work.

Here are instances of such good works as are proper to be done by good wives, v. 10. Observe, Those who would find mercy when in religious knowledge, and to do what they can for the salvation of their relatives, act altogether inconsistently with the Christian profession? Gen. 18:18, 19.—It seems the intent of these scriptures to teach us, that every religious society should, as far as it is able, make provision for persons of this description, and not leave them to sordid penury, or to the 'tender mercies of the wicked,' in their old age. But then this provision should be limited to such as give evidence, that they are of a widely different character from those 'who live in pleasure, being dead whilst they live.' Alas! what numbers are there of this latter description, among nominal Christians, even to the latest period of life! And how much does the same heaven work among more decided professors of evangelical truth! These things, however, we must give in charge, that the company of believers may be preserved blameless, or at least that we may deliver our own souls. (Notes, Ez. 3:17—19. P. O. 16—27.) SCOTT.

V. 7, 8. The heathen, in general, considered children as bound to support their aged parents, and reckoned the neglect of this duty infamous, and fit only to be mentioned along with the most scandalous vices.—The manner in which many covetous persons grievously pervert this text, must not pass unnoticed: while they evidently violate the duties of piety, equity, and charity, as well as that of providing for their indigent relations, yea, while they bring up their children and maintain their families, in a manner utterly unsuitable to their circumstances, from eagerness to amass riches, they often quote this verse, in vindication of their sordid avarice, and imagine, that the apostle commanded men to neglect all other duties, in order to enrich their children! (Note, 16)—'Plending these words, to justify or to excuse their sordid parsimony, and want of charity; . . . whereas, they plainly respect the provision which children should make for their parents, and not that which parents should make for their children.' V. 9—12. The apostle could not here mean, that no widows were to be relieved by the church, who were under sixty years of age; for the distresses of younger widows, as well as of other poor persons, might be very urgent.—He is, therefore, generally supposed to speak of a certain number of widows, who were discharged from all secular cares, and maintained by the church, of whom such as were able acted as deaconesses, to visit sick and poor women, and to administer relief and counsel to them; to instruct young women, and perhaps children, or to attend on any other concerns of the church, its ministers, and pious strangers, which lay within their province. Though no command is given for such an order of persons in the church, (for many things of this kind seem to have been left discretionary, and to be determined according to circumstances,) yet they might frequently be useful, if properly selected and regulated. Rom. 16:1, 2. In this view the propriety of the rule here given is apparent. As the apostle counsels 'the younger widows to marry,' 13—15. it cannot be imagined, that he would exclude any when grown old, from the number here intended, if otherwise qualified, merely because they had followed his counsel. By 'the wife of one man,' therefore, the apostle did not intend to exclude such as had married a second time, which the Scripture nowhere disallows, or at all discountenances. But shameful and astonishing irregularities, in this respect, were common among the heathen women; they frequently left their husbands to live with other men, and then sometimes returned again to their former husbands; they often, designedly, gave them just cause to divorce them, on purpose that they might take other husbands; nay, they sometimes did what was equivalent to divorcing their husbands; nor were these things deemed scandalous, at least not in that degree, which they would be at present, in countries professing Christianity. If, then, any woman had formerly conformed to these corrupt customs, it would not be consistent with the credit of Christianity, to admit her into this select number of devoted widows, though no other objection lay against her, for it must exclusively consist of those, who had lived virtuously and honorably in the married state. (Marg. Ref. b. c.—Note, 1:2.)—Some expositors, indeed, think, that those who had married again, after being divorced, were intended; but there is not the least intimation in Scripture, that the divorced should be restrained from marrying again, even if justly put away, and surely then not when unjustly divorced.—The women, however, spoken of, must also be such as had an established character for 'good works,' since they were converted to Christianity. Those were to be preferred, who had charitably educated the children of their poor relatives or neighbors, or who had faithfully done their duty towards their own children, who, when in more prosperous circumstances, had hospitably entertained strangers in their houses, who had willingly stooped to the office of washing the feet of the saints, when wearied with travelling; (Notes, Gen. 18:3—8. Luke 7:44—50. Jn. 13:1—17.) and who had, from love to Christ, readily relieved the afflicted, and diligently 'attended to every good work.' (Marg. Ref. d—k.—Note, and P. O. Acts 9:36—43.) Widows of this character, when grown old and left desolate, were the proper persons for this service.—But the apostle directed Timothy to reject the application of 'younger widows;' for experience showed, that their avowed purpose, of no more entering into the married state, was not to be depended on. After a time, when their grief on account of their loss had subsided, various circumstances might induce them to marry again; and, as their admission into the number of devoted widows implied an engagement to the contrary, and probably was attended by some promise to this effect, so their violation of it might be called 'a waxing wanton against Christ,' leading them to be unfaithful to Him, for the sake of some earthly object. Thus their engagement would tend to their condemnation, by occasioning them to violate that fidelity to Christ, which they had previously promised; the church would see it necessary to censure them, and their sin would expose them to condemnation, if not repented of. They might perhaps be tempted to apostatize from the faith, by marrying heathens, which seems to have been the case with some of this description. For Christians would not be disposed to marry those who had entered into this number, and if their inclinations led them to marry, their situation might expose them peculiarly to this temptation. SCOTT.

(9.) Let not a widow, &c.] 'I. e. be taken upon the list of those to be maintained by the church, and to minister in the office of deaconesses in it.' Doddr.—'Besides general catalogues of all the members of the church, there were others of those attached to the clergy, and to those poorer persons who were maintained at the public expense, including virgins and widows.' ROSENK.—'Shuttleworth notices the wisdom of this injunction, as resolutions to forsake the active duties of life, formed under the momentary operation of some devotional excitement, are often ill adapted to the bodily and intellectual temperament of the persons forming them. He says, had the church of Rome, when she gave her confirmation to the indissoluble obligation of monastic vows, seriously weighed the caution in this passage, how vast a mass of misery, the consequence of [the peevishness of celibacy,] ineffectual regret, and of an alarmed conscience reproaching itself with instinctive, but involuntary recollections of a world it had abjured, would she have removed from many a now blighted victim of ill judging piety, or gloomy superstition.' HENRY, abr.

(9, 10.) Note, Rom. 16:1. Neander suggests, that deaconesses were necessary in the apostolic age, because the free access of men to the female portion of the church, especially as the sexes are so carefully separated in the east, might excite suspicion and give offence. And although women, in conformity to their natural destination, were excluded from the offices of teaching, and governing in the churches, yet in this manner the peculiar qualities of females were brought into demand, as peculiar gifts for the service of the church. By means of the deaconesses, the Gospel might be brought into the inmost recesses of family life, where, from eastern manners, no man could have obtained admittance. Being advanced in life, and experienced, and tried in all the trials of women, they were to uphold the younger women of the church by their counsel and consolation. En. [475] in distress, must show mercy when in prosperity.

4. He cautions them to take heed of admitting into the number those who are likely to be no credit to them, v. 11, 12. You read of a first love, Rev. 2:4. and here of a first faith, that is, the engagements they gave to the church to behave well, and as became the trust reposed in them: it does not appear that by their first faith is meant their vow not to marry, for the Scripture is very silent on that head; besides, the apostle here advises the younger widows to marry, v. 14. which he would not, if hereby they must have broken their vows. Dr. Whitby well observes, 'If this faith referred to a promise made to the church, not to marry, it could not be called their first faith,' v. 13. Withal they learn to be idle, and not only idle, but tattlers, &c. Observe, Those who are idle, are seldom only idle, they learn to be tattlers and busy-bodies, and to make mischief among neighbors, and sow discord among brethren. Those who had not attained to such a gravity of mind as was fit for the deaconesses, (or the widows who were taken among the church's poor,) let them marry, bear children, &c. v. 14. Observe, If house-keepers do not mind their business, but are tattlers, they give occasion to the adversaries of Christianity to reproach the Christian name, which, it seems, there were some instances of, v. 15.

We learn hence, (1.) In the primitive church there was care taken of poor widows, and provision made for them; the churches of Christ in these days should follow so good an example, as far as they are able. (2.) In the distribution of the church's charity, or alms, great care is to be taken, that those share in the bounty, who most want it, and best deserve it. (3.) The credit of religion, and the reputation of Christian churches, are very much concerned in the character and behavior of those that are taken into any employment in the church, though of a lower nature, or that receive alms of the church. (4.) Christianity obliges its professors to relieve their indigent friends, particularly poor widows, that the church may not be charged with them, that it may relieve them that are widows indeed: rich people should be ashamed to burden the church with their poor relations, when it is with difficulty that those are supplied, who have no children or nephews, that is, grand-children, who are in a capacity to relieve them.

V. 17—25. Here are directions concerning ministers.

1. Care must be taken that they be honorably maintained, v. 17. count them worthy of double maintenance, double what they have had, or others have. Observe, The presbytery ruled, and the same that ruled were those who labored in the Word and doctrine. Some have imagined, that by the elders that rule well, the apostle means lay-elders, who were employed in ruling, but not in teaching; and I confess this is the plainest text of Scripture that can be found to countenance such an opinion; but it seems a little strange, that mere ruling elders should be accounted worthy of double honor, when the apostle preferred preaching to baptizing, and much more would he prefer it to ruling the church; and it is more strange, that the apostle should not notice them, when he treats of church-officers; but, as it is hinted before, they had not, in the primitive church, one to preach to them, and another to rule them, but ruling and teaching were performed by the same persons, only some might labor more in the Word and doctrine than others. He quotes a scripture to confirm this command concerning the maintenance of ministers, that we would think foreign; but it intimates what a significancy there was in many of the laws of Moses, and particularly in that, Thou shalt not muzzle the ox that treads out the corn, Deut. 25:4. We hence learn, that God, both under the law, and now under the gospel, has taken care that his ministers be well provided for. As it is God's appointment, that they who preach the Gospel should live of the Gospel, 1 Cor. 9:14. so a comfortable maintenance is their just due, as much as the reward of the laborer; and PRACT. OBS. V. 9—16. Every one, who is brought forth into notoriety in the church, should, as much as possible, be free from scandal, and many are proper objects of charity, who ought not to be employed in public services.—It is not sufficient to determine, what would be best in itself, apart from all other considerations, in respect of things not absolutely obligatory, or things unlawful; the state of human nature and facts must be attended to, that it may be known what is most generally expedient. It might have seemed plausible to admit the young widows, (12.) Having damnation. 'Exposing themselves to just blame of men, and condemnation from God, because they have disannulled their first faith, and violated their engagement to the church, when it assigned them such an office, to which it would be very inconvenient to admit persons that have any views of catering again into the conjugal state; not to say, that some men have been enticed, by very improper alliances, to throw off even the general profession of Christianity.' DODDR.

V. 13—15. It might likewise be feared, and experience had shown, that there was danger, lest 'younger widows,' being freed from the employments of domestic life, and having much leisure, should neglect to spend it in devotion, and the duties of their station, and so contract habits of idleness, and waste their hours in sauntering from house to house, as trifling visitants, tattling and gossiping about the news of the day, and intermeddling with other people's affairs, spreading slanders, and speaking many things of a mischievous and improper nature. (Marg. ref. q—t.—Note, 2 Thes. 3:10—12.) The apostle did not mean, that all 'the younger widows,' who were employed in this service, acted in this manner; but it was an evil incident to the practice, and formed a sufficient reason for excluding them. He therefore decided, as one having authority, that it was better to leave them at liberty to marry, if they chose it, and circumstances admitted, that they might be occupied in the useful duties of wives and mothers, and in domestic business; that so no occasion might be given to any adversaries of the Gospel to speak reproachfully of it, through the misconduct of such as professed to be peculiarly devoted to the service of Christ. (Marg. ref. u—y.) For indeed, some younger widows, being improperly admitted into this number, had turned aside to follow the suggestions of Satan, had married unbelieving husbands, and so relapsed into idolatry.—'The converting men to the Christian faith being the "turning them from Satan unto God," . . . the casting off the faith may well be styled, "the turning aside after Satan." ' Whitby. The apostle's determination, that no widow under sixty years of age, should be admitted into this select number of devoted women, lest their useless lives and misconduct should occasion scandal, and his counsel that younger widows should marry, conclude with peculiar force against all vows of virginity, taken by young persons, under pretence of more strict religion than can be practised in the married state, and against all censures of second marriages, as such; and, indeed, the silence of the apostle concerning women, who had never been married, in this whole argument, is very expressive. But the pastors of the church, before many ages had elapsed, abundantly made up this supposed deficiency!

or other young women, to such a service in the church, as implied an entire devoting of themselves to religion, for the rest of their days; yet the apostle, not only with the wisdom derived from deep reflection and extensive observation, but under the influence of the divine Spirit, decided otherwise. Alas! what immense numbers, in every age, have shown their total ignorance of human nature, and have done incalculable mischief, by attempting to improve on his plan, or rather directly to subvert it!

(14.) Younger women. 'Younger widows.' So Doddr.; and Bloomf. says, 'both the ancients and almost all the moderns are agreed, it can only mean the younger widows, of whom the context speaks.' Ed.

V. 16. 'In the opinion of Estius, this precept extended to the proprietors of slaves, and bound them to maintain their slaves, when they became incapable of labor.' Mackn. The spirit of it, no doubt, extends to servants of every kind, who have spent their strength in our service, as far as we are able to support them.

V. 17, 18. Laborer, &c. 'This, as well as what goeth before, is affirmed by the apostle to be said in the Scripture; yet it is nowhere written in the Jewish Scriptures. It is found only, Mat. 10:10. Luke 10:7. The apostle must therefore have read either Matthew or Luke's Gospel, before he wrote this epistle. And seeing he quotes this saying, as "Scripture," and represents it as of equal authority with the writings of Moses, it is a proof, not only of the early publication of the gospels, but of their authenticity, as divinely inspired "writings." In.

(17.) Elders. 'In the first age, the name elder was given to all who exercised any sacred office in the church, as is plain from Ac. 20:28. where the persons are called bishops, who, v. 17. were called elders. The same thing appears from Tit. 1:5. where those are called elders, who, v. 7. are named bishops; and from 1 Tim. 14. where collectively all who held sacred offices in Lystra are called, "The presbytery or eldership," and are said to have concurred with the apostle in setting Timothy apart to the ministry.' Mackn.—Double honor. 'It seems only to express a plentiful maintenance given in a liberal and respectful manner.' Doddr.—Bloomf. says, 'no doubt respect is included, as well as provision; and azionsthsōsan signifies not merely "let them receive," but also "as their just due." ' To which he adds: 'From the relief of the poor the apostle proceeds to the support of ministers; though with an obscurity of expression (arising from delicacy) which prevents us from acquiring any very exact information. That a stipend was appropriated to the support of the minister, is certain; but on the amount, and the mode of collection, we are left much in the dark.' Ed.

V. 19, 20. In respect of those who were evidently guilty of any scandalous offence, whether elders or others; Timothy, as presiding in the church, was required to 'rebuke them before all' their brethren; not only in order to their being made ashamed, and brought to repentance, but that others might fear the same censure, and so be excited to greater circumspection.

those who would have ministers starved, or not comfortably provided for, God will require it of them another day.

II. Concerning the accusation of ministers, v. 19. Here is the scripture-method of proceeding against an elder, when accused of any crime. Observe, 1. There must be an accusation, not a flying, uncertain report, but an accusation, containing a certain charge. 2. This accusation is not

PRACT. OBS. V. 17-25. The office of a minister is 'honorable' to all, those alone excepted who are a disgrace to the office; but the most prudent, faithful, and diligent, especially the most 'laborious in the Word and doctrine,' ought to be more honored than others, and best provided for. The reverse proportion, indeed, seems almost everywhere to be adopted in this matter; but the Lord will provide for his faithful servants, whatever method men may follow in disposing of their favors.--All who are employed in important services in the church, especially in admitting men into the ministry, or committing to them the care of immortal souls, or in taking cognizance of their conduct, should consider themselves as most awfully charged by the apostle, 'before God and the Lord Jesus Christ, and the elect angels, to observe these things, without preferring one before another.' The neglect of this rule, in the exercise of ecclesiastical authority, has given its opponents one of their most plausible arguments against it. So very much has been done, and is done, out of carnal respects, and 'by partiality' to relatives, friends, and connexions; that the exercise of all authority of this kind has been, and, by numbers at present, is considered as unlawful.--How far those concerned in ecclesiastical matters are culpable, in respect of 'laying hands suddenly' on improper persons, . . . every man's conscience must determine for himself, till Christ shall come to take an account of his servants. But it is certain, that these things involve a responsibility of

V. 21, 22. It is manifest, that Timothy is here and elsewhere supposed to possess great authority in the Ephesian church, both in superintending the elders already ordained, and in ordaining others. It is allowed, that he was an extraordinary person, especially appointed by the apostle to this service, but there is no proof, that he conferred miraculous powers by the imposition of his hands, as the apostles did; and indeed it is altogether improbable. We cannot indeed by any means infer the divine right of episcopacy, from the authority exercised by Timothy, Titus, and other evangelists; yet it is at least highly probable, that it was very early found expedient, and conducive to peace, to have a stated presiding inspector, of approved wisdom and piety, who might superintend the pastors and the concerns of a few neighboring churches, as moderator and censor, and be peculiarly attended to in the appointment of church-officers. Hence a moderate episcopacy was very early, probably even while some of the apostles lived, generally prevalent in the church; indeed, this seems to have taken place, between the time when Paul gave his admirable parting charge to the elders, or bishops of Ephesus, and the time when John, from our Lord's own mouth, wrote epistles to the angels of the seven churches in Asia. (Note, Rev. 2:1.) And, after all the abuses, usurpations, controversies, and prejudices, which have since been introduced, the time may ere long arrive, when experience will convince pious men of different persuasions, that something of this kind, properly conferred, limited, and exercised, would prove a suitable remedy to those multiplied divisions, which so weaken and disgrace religious societies, which in doctrine, worship, and practice may be considered, in many respects, unexceptionable. SCOTT.

(22.) It has been claimed, that this verse implys an episcopal authority and jurisdiction; but DODD. answers, that to ordain 'does not appear to be the chief reason of Timothy's being sent to Ephesus, or rather being left there, when Paul went into Macedonia. Various circumstances of this church might require that a person, of Timothy's extraordinary gifts and character, should be left to superintend their affairs; and it might reasonably be taken for granted, that, as he was there by the apostle's special direction, so much regard would be paid to him, that he would be desired to preside in their sacred solemnities, in the same manner as Paul had done when among them. But that no elder could at any time be ordained, without the presence and concurrence of such an extraordinary person, and that such an extraordinary power and influence should afterwards be transferred to others, not in like manner to be received, unless supported by two or three credible witnesses; and the accusation must be received before them; that is, the accused must have the accusers face to face, because the reputation of a minister is, in a particular manner, a tender thing; 'but, v. 20. them that sin, rebuke before all; thou needest not be so tender of other people, but rebuke them publicly.' Or, 'them that sin before all, rebuke before all, but those who are in danger of sinning by the example of their fall, may take warning by the rebuke given them for it, that others, also, may fear.'

III. Concerning the ordination of ministers; v. 22. appears to be meant of the ordaining of men to the office of the ministry, which ought not to be done rashly and inconsiderately, and before due trial made of their gifts and graces, their abilities and qualifications for it.

Some understand it of absolution; implying that those who are too easy in remitting the censures of the church, encourage others in the sins thus connived at, and make themselves thereby guilty. Observe, We have great need to watch at all times, lest we make ourselves partakers of other men's sins.

Here is a caution against rash ordination of ministers, or absolution of those who have been under church-censures. Those who are rash, either in the one case or the other, will make themselves partakers in other men's sins. We must keep ourselves pure, if we will be pure; the grace of God makes and keeps us pure, but it is by our own endeavors.

no ordinary magnitude, and that immense criminality must rest somewhere; as the multitude of ignorant, slothful, ambitious, avaricious, immoral, and heretical clergymen, who remain uncensured, throughout this land, and in every part of the visible church, most manifestly proves. —It is extremely difficult, under any form of church-government, to conduct every particular in such a manner, as to 'do nothing by partiality;' this will require circumspection, firmness, intrepidity, disinterested zeal, and 'the meekness of wisdom;' and these cannot be obtained without much fervent prayer. These things, however, must be carefully observed by those, who would not 'be partakers of other men's sins,' as every person concerned must feel, in proportion to his conscientiousness; but those who honestly desire to do their duty, will generally be directed in it.—Finally, let us observe, that eminent grace will connect the strictest temperance with the most fervent zeal for the liberty of the Gospel; that it is the duty of every one to use proper means for the preservation of his health and life, as a debt which he owes to the church, the community, and his family; and that those who are frequently infirm, who labor abundantly in important services, and whose earnestness, in spiritual things, induces a disregard to animal indulgence, should attend to the advice of those, who give them proper directions for a due regard to their health. SCOTT.

qualified for the management of it, are things neither easy to be proved, nor rashly to be taken for granted, on a question of so great importance.' See also Dwight's Theol. Sermon, 150, 1. En.

V. 23. This verse is a remarkable instance of the apostle's neglect of exact method, in inditing his epistles.—It occurred to his mind, when reflecting on Timothy's manifold cares and labors, that his frequent indispositions might be increased by too great abstemiousness, to the prevention of his usefulness, and the shortening of his days. He therefore broke in on his subject, to counsel him, not to drink water any longer, at least as his only liquor; but to use a little wine to strengthen his stomach, and preserve his health.—We may hence form an estimate of the exact temperance, practised by these laborious servants of Christ, who so zealously pleaded the cause of Christian liberty, who placed no dependence on their own works, and who never prescribed their own conduct, in these things, as a rule for other men! SCOTT.

V. 24, 25. (Note, 21, 22.) In respect of the choice and ordination of ministers, it might further be observed, that 'some men's sins' were so notorious, and so easily proved, that they lay open beforehand, and anticipated the judgment, which ought to be formed of their conduct and pretensions. In other cases they 'followed after,' so that diligent and impartial investigation would be requisite in order to detect them. In like manner, some persons, applying for admission into the public service of the church, had a sufficient testimonial in their known and abundant good works, which were manifest before any peculiar inquiry was made; and when this was not the case, yet, upon due investigation, Timothy and others might become acquainted with them. So that, in most instances, an impartial attention to the business, without respect of persons, would enable those concerned to know who were, and who were not, eligible to public stations.—'I speak not of men, whose good or bad works are manifest beforehand, for they without further discussion or examination may be admitted, or are to be rejected; but of those whose vices or good works are latent. For they, after examination and inquiry, cannot be long hid. And so, if thou be not hasty in laying on of hands, thou mayest timely discover them. Or if by this mean thou canst not do it, thou wilt not be partaker with the sinner, having done as much as was in thy power to discover them.' Whitby. Id.

PRACT. OBS. V. 1—5. It is most important to the honor of the Gospel, that professed Christians should duly perform their various relative duties. The condition of servants, indeed, in this favored land of liberty, allows them to change one situation for another; but the precepts of Scripture do not at all permit them to behave with disrespect to the persons, or disregard to the lawful commands of those whom they serve; nor yet to return affronting answers, or to speak of their master's faults to others without cause; but rather to weep over them, and pray for them in secret, when they are ungodly and unreasonable. Alas! how grievously are 'the name and Gospel of God blasphemed,' through those servants, who love to discourse and dispute about doctrines and sermons, in families averse to such subjects; and then behave with impertinence in their places, if not with sloth, dishonesty, and unfaithfulness! Thus thousands are fatally prejudiced against Concluding Note. V. 14. Guide the house, &c.] 'Surely, that woman deserves contempt, who, having consumed the period of youth in frivolous reading, dissipating amusement, and in the acquisition of accomplishments, which are to be considered, immediately after marriage, to entire forgetfulness; enters upon the duties of a wife with [little] other expectation, than that of being an useless or prodigal appendage to a household, ignorant of her duties, and of the manner of discharging them; and with no other conceptions of the responsibilities which she has assumed, than such as have been acquired from a life of childish caprice, luxurious self-indulgence, and sensitive, feminine, yet thoroughly finished selfishness. And yet I fear that the system of female education at present in vogue, is, in many respects, liable to the accusation of producing precisely this tendency.' Wayland.

NOTES. CHAP. VI. V. 1—5. This shows, that Christian masters were not required to set their slaves at liberty, though they were instructed to behave towards them in such a manner, as would greatly lessen and nearly annihilate the evils of slavery. It would have excited much confusion, awakened the jealousy of the civil powers, and greatly retarded the progress of Christianity, had the liberation of slaves by their converts been expressly required by the apostles; though the principles of both the law and the gospel, when carried to their consequences, will infallibly abolish slavery. Ex. 21:2.—These things Timothy was directed to teach and enforce, as matters of the greatest importance; and if any person taught otherwise, and consented not to such salutary words, which were indeed the words of Christ 'speaking by him,' and an essential part of 'the doctrine according to godliness;' he must be considered as a self-conceited, ignorant man, who, being puffed up with an opinion of his own abilities, was ambitious of distinction and applause, though entirely unacquainted with the real nature and tendency of the Gospel. 1 Cor. 3:18—23. 8:1—3.—It is not absolutely certain, to are often out of order, and who labor under infirmities, Prov. 31:6. Wine should be used as a help, and not a hindrance, to our work and usefulness.

CHAP. VI. 1—5. Here is,

I. The duty of servants; they are here said to be under the yoke, which denotes both subjection and labor. 'If Christianity finds servants under the yoke, it continues them under it; for the Gospel does not cancel the obligations any lie under, either by the law of nature, or by mutual consent. If servants that embraced the Christian religion should grow insolent and disobedient to their masters, the doctrine of Christ would be reflected on for their sakes, as if it had made men worse liver than they had been before they had received the Gospel. And this is a good reason why we should all conduct ourselves well, that we may prevent the occasion which many seek, and will be very apt to lay hold of, to speak ill of religion for our sakes.'

Or, suppose the master were a believer, and the servant a believer too; would not that excuse him, because in Christ there is neither bond nor free? No, by no means; They that have believing masters, let not them despise them, because they are brethren; for that brotherhood relates only to spiritual privileges, not to any outward dignity or advantage; nay, rather do them service, because they are faithful and beloved. They must think themselves the more obliged to serve them, because the faith and love that bespeak men Christians, oblige them to do good; and that is all wherein their service consists. Observe, it is a great encouragement to us in doing our duty to our relations, if we have reason to think they are faithful and beloved, and partakers of the benefit, that is, of the benefit of Christianity. Timothy is appointed to teach and exhort these things. Ministers must preach not only the general duties of all, but the duties of particular relations.

II. Paul here warns Timothy to withdraw from those who corrupted the doctrine of Christ, and made it the subject of strife, debate, and controversy, v. 3—5. Observe, We are not required to consent to any words as wholesome, except the words of our Lord Jesus Christ; his doctrine is a doctrine according to godliness, and therefore must be received; it has a direct tendency to make people godly; but he that does not act agreeably, is proud, v. 4. contentious, ignorant, and does a great deal of mischief to the church, knowing nothing. Observe, Commonly those are most proud who know least; for, with all their knowledge, they do not know themselves. Those who fall off from the plain practical doctrines of Christianity, fall in with controversies which eat out the life and power of religion, and occasion envy, strife, railings, and evil surmisings. When men are not content with the words of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the doctrine according to godliness, but will frame notions of their own, and impose them, and that, too, in their own words, which man's wisdom teaches, and not in the words which the Holy Ghost teaches, 1 Cor. 2:13. they sow the seeds of all mischief in the church. Hence come perverse disputings of men of corrupt minds, v. 5. disputes that are all subtlety, and no solidity. Observe, Men of corrupt minds are destitute of the truth. The reason why men's minds are corrupt is, because they do not stick to the truth as it is in Jesus: supposing that gain is godliness, making religion truckle to their secular interest. From such as these Timothy is warned to withdraw himself.

We observe, (1.) The words of Christ are the best to prevent ruptures in the church; and it has never gone well with the church, since the words of men have claimed a regard equal to his words, and in some cases a much greater. (2.) Paul sets a brand on those who consent not to the words of our Lord Jesus Christ; and when men leave those wholesome words they will never agree in other words, either of their own or other men's inventions, but will perpetually wrangle and quarrel about them: this will produce envy, and be attended with jealousies and suspicions of one another, called here evil surmisings; then they will proceed to perverse disputings. Such persons appear to be corrupt, and destitute of the truth, and good ministers and Christians will withdraw themselves from such; 'Come out from the Gospel.—Indeed, some servants, whose sincerity is unimpeached, through a lamentable mistake, suppose equality in religious privileges to imply equality in the family; and thus they act, as if they 'despised their believing masters' and their authority; giving them rude answers, and either neglecting their business, or doing it in their own way, as if this was a part of their Christian liberty! Whereas, they ought to honor and serve them, with the greater diligence and alacrity, because 'they are faithful and beloved, partakers of the benefit.' No doubt there are violations of duty, equally inexcusable, committed by those who stand in the opposite relation; and zealous professors of evangelical doctrines are necessary to believing servants' choosing to live in irreligious families, by behaving in so unchristian a manner to such as have come among them, expecting better treatment. SCOTT.

what set of men the apostle referred to; but, as many of the Jews deemed it unlawful to submit to heathen governors, it is probable, some of the Judaizing teachers inculcated, that the worshippers of God ought not to obey heathen masters, and so paid their court to servants, by persuading them that they ought to assert their liberty. But there might be others also, who disregarded and despised these practical instructions, while their attention was taken up with curious and nice speculations and distinctions. Such persons, however, were to be considered as doting, or talking wildly, like sick and delirious persons, about hard questions and disputes of words, names, forms, or notions, which had no connexion with 'the power of godliness.' . . . Thus they wanted to persuade the Christian servants, that the recovery of their liberty was to be considered as a Christian privilege of great value, which they ought to claim, whatever the consequence might be; and, from the same principle, they sought worldly lure by their religious profession, and as their leading object. (*M. V. 6—12. From the mention of the abuse which some put on religion, (making it to serve their secular advantages,) the apostle takes occasion to show the excellency of contentment, and the evil of covetousness.

I. The excellency of contentment, v. 6—8. Some account Christianity an advantageous profession for this world; in the sense they mean, it is false; yet it is undoubtedly true, that, though Christianity is the worst trade, it is the best calling, in the world. The truth he lays down is, that godliness with contentment is great gain. Some read it, godliness with a competency; that is, if a man have but a little in this world, yet if he have but enough to carry him through it, he needs desire no more; his godliness,

V. 6—10. Having things barely needful for the present, we ought to be contented and satisfied with them, without indulging any desire of acquiring greater affluence, or being exempted from hard labor and mean fare. For discontent in a lowly situation commonly produces a determination to be rich, if possible, and leads men out of the plain path of honest industry and prudent economy, in dependence on the providence and obedience to the commandment of God.—When once 'the love of money' is allowed to rule in the heart, it becomes the prolific root of all kinds of evil. Impostures, frauds, lies, thefts, robberies, oppressions, murders, ungodliness, hypocrisy, apostasy, contention, lawsuits, wars, cruelty, pride, luxury, sensuality, or penurious avarice, are some of the noxious weeds, of which it daily produces a most abundant increase, according to the different constitutions, habits, and circumstances of mankind. Every species of impiety, iniquity and vice, in one way or another, grows from it; and a large proportion of the miseries, as well as the crimes of mankind, originate from the same source.—It is not to be supposed, that the apostle meant to establish, as a universal proposition, that every kind and every act of wickedness, grew from 'the love of money,' as from their only root; for doubtless, many kinds and innumerable acts of wickedness spring from other roots, which have scarcely any connexion with the love of money; and Cicero, in his Offices, states, that the love of money itself, in many and most insatiable instances, springs from love of power and dominion, for which it is indispensably requisite. But, whoever well considers what influence the desire of riches, not only to hoard them, but to purchase with them the gratification of pride, ambition, sensual inclinations, and even revenge, has on the conduct of mankind, will readily see, that, as a general truth, there is sufficient ground to aver, that 'the love of money is the root of all evil.' The abandoned prostitute, Judas, who sold his Lord, the traitor who sells his country, and the mercenary teacher of religion, combine in spying, 'What will ye give me?' It was the remark of a corrupt, but able statesman in this nation, [the English,] that 'every man has his price;' and it is in some sense, true of every man, who is 'a lover of money,' of pleasure, or of worldly honor, more than 'a lover of God.' The ambitious conquerors and destroyers of mankind, have always loved money, as the means of accomplishing their object; and have extorted it from those in their power, with the most entire disregard to justice, truth, and mercy. Nor did any one ever desire to revenge himself, or remove a rival, by assassination or perjury, but some wretch could be found disposed by love of money to perpetrate the villainy. SCOTT.

(6.) 'If you are ever disposed to envy the great and affluent, and mourn that you may not shine in the circles of fashion, and be arrayed in splendor, and feast at luxurious banquets,—if, with eager and unsatisfied desire, you cry, give, give, as you survey their treasures,—reflect one moment how these bar up their entrance to the kingdom of God,—how they add fuel to their lusts, and furnish excitement to their pride,—how they remove them far from the hopeful means of salvation, and often prove their sure passports to the gates of death. Wealth is a privilege, when enjoyed and used as it should be. But I should fear to pray for wealth either for myself or my children. If I knew I should devote it to God, with that, will be his great gain, Ps. 37: 16.

We read it, godliness with contentment; godliness is itself great gain, and wherever there is true godliness, there will be contentment; but those that are arrived at the highest pitch of contentment with their godliness, are certainly the easiest, happiest people in this world, and are sure to be happy in another world.

Here we have a Christian's gain,—godliness with contentment; this is great, and, not like the little gain of worldlings, it is ever accompanied with contentment in a greater or less degree. Let us all, then, endeavor after godliness with contentment.

He gives the reason, v. 7. We should be content with a little,

(1.) Because we can challenge nothing as a debt due to us, for we came naked into the world; we had our beings, our bodies, our lives, when we came into the world, though we came naked, and brought nothing with us: may we not then be content while our beings and lives are continued to us, though we have not everything we would have? When reduced to the greatest straits, we cannot be poorer than when we came into this world, yet then we were provided for; therefore let us trust in God for the remaining part of our pilgrimage.

(2.) We shall carry nothing with us out of this world; a shroud, a coffin, and a grave, are all that the richest man in the world can have from his thousands. Therefore why should we covet much? Eccl. 5: 15, 16.

Hence he infers, v. 8. if God give us the necessary supports of life, we ought to be content therewith; though we have not dainty food nor costly raiment, if we have but food and raiment convenient for us, and covering, including habitation as well as raiment, we ought to be content: this was Agur's prayer, Prov. 30: 8.

Here we see the folly of placing our happiness in these things, and how the necessities of life are the bounds of a true Christian's desire, with which, therefore, he will endeavor to be content.

II. The evil of covetousness, v. 9. It is not said, they that are rich, but they that will be rich, that is, that place their happiness in worldly wealth, that covet it inordinately, and are eager and violent in the pursuit of it. They that are such, fall into temptation and a snare, unavoidably; nor will they be safe or innocent, for they will be in danger of ruining themselves for ever. It is good for us to consider the mischievousness of worldly, fleshly lusts. They are foolish, and therefore we should be ashamed of them; hurtful, and therefore we should be afraid of them, especially considering to what degree they are hurtful, for they drown men in destruction and perdition.

The love of money is the root of all evil, v. 10. What sins will not men be drawn to by the love of money? Particularly this was at the bottom of the apostasy of many from the faith of Christ; while they coveted money, they erred from the faith, they quitted their Christianity, and pierced themselves through with many sorrows.

III. Hence he takes occasion both to caution Timothy against their lusts, and to counsel him to keep in the way of God and his duty, and particularly to fulfil the trust reposed in him as a minister. He addresses himself to him as a man of God. Ministers are men of God, and ought to conduct themselves accordingly in everything; they are men employed for God, devoted to his honor more immediately. The prophets, under the Old Test., were called men of God.

1. He charges Timothy to take heed of the love of money, which had been so pernicious to many; Flee these things. It is ill becoming any men, but especially men of God, to set their hearts on the things of this world; men of God should be taken up with the things of God.

2. To arm him against the love of the world, he directs him to follow that which is good; righteousness in his conversation

DODDR. The love of money is the root of all evil.] For since in this desire all other appetites and passions concur (as they are bought by money), it is the prevalent form of selfishness, the great antagonist principle of the Gospel of love. Selfishness the antagonist of the Gospel, with sections respectively entitled, 'the universe, designed to display and enjoy the love of God; sin, as selfishness, is the frustration of the divine plan; all sin is selfishness; the Gospel, as a system of benevolence, opposed to selfishness; selfishness the sin of the world, has long since become the sin of the church; the forms of selfishness in the church. Ed.

V. 11, 12. According to the language of the Old Test., concerning the ancient prophets, the apostle addressed Timothy as a 'man of God,' one devoted to God, and employed by Him as his messenger to mankind; as one who bore this high and important character, he exhorted him to 'flee' without delay or looking back, to the utmost distance from that destructive whirlpool, in which such immense numbers were continually swallowed up; and to 'follow after' more entire conformity to the per-toward men, godliness toward God, faith and love as living principles, to support him, and carry him on in the practice both of righteousness and godliness.

Observe, It is not enough that men of God flee evil things, but they must follow after what is directly contrary thereto. Further, what excellent persons men of God are, who follow after righteousness! They are the excellent of the earth, and, being acceptable to God, they should be approved of men.

3. He exhorts him to do the part of a soldier; those who will get to heaven, must fight their way thither; must conflict with corruption and temptations, and the opposition of the powers of darkness: it is a good fight, a good cause, and it will have a good issue; it is the fight of faith; we do not war after the flesh, for the weapons of our warfare are not carnal, 2 Cor. 10:3, 4.

4. He exhorts him to lay hold on eternal life. Eternal life is the crown proposed for our encouragement, and this we must lay hold on, as those that are afraid of coming short of it, and losing it. We are called to the fight, and to lay hold on eternal life. The profession Timothy, and all faithful ministers, make before many witnesses, is a good profession; for they profess and engage to fight the good fight of faith, and to lay hold on eternal life; their calling and their own profession oblige them unto this.

V. 13—21. He charges him to keep this commandment without spot; that is, the whole work of his ministry, all the trust reposed in him, all the service expected from him, he must keep it without spot, unrebukable; he must conduct himself so in his ministry, that he might not lay himself open to any blame, or incur any blemish.

What are the motives to move him to this?

I. He gives him a solemn charge, v. 13. charges him, as he will answer it at the great day to that God whose eyes are on us all, who sees what we are, and what we do. This should quicken us to the service of God, that we serve a God who quickens all things. He charges him before Christ Jesus, to whom, in a peculiar manner, he stood related as a minister of his Gospel; and whose good confession before Pilate, My kingdom is not of this world, should be effectual to draw off all his followers, both ministers and people, from the love of this world. John 18:36, 37, Christ died as a Martyr, as well as a Sacrifice.

II. He reminds him of the confession he himself had made, v. 12. when ordained by the laying on of the hands of the presbytery. The obligation of that was still upon him, and he must live up to it, and be quickened by it, to do the work of his ministry.

III. He reminds him of Christ's second coming; 'Keep this commandment, until the appearing of our Lord Jesus Christ; keep it as long as thou livest, till Christ come at death to give thee a discharge. Keep it with an eye to his second coming, when we must all give an account of the talents we have been intrusted with,' Luke 16:2.

Mentioning the appearing of Christ as one that loved it, he loves to speak of it, and loves to speak of Him, who shall then appear. The appearing of Christ is certain; but it is not for us to know the time and season of it; let this suffice, that in time He shall show it, in the time He thinks fit for it.

Concerning Christ, and God the Father, he here speaks great things. God is the only Potentate; the powers that are, are ordained of God, Rom. 13:1. He is the blessed and only Potentate, infinitely happy, and nothing can in the least impair his happiness. He is King of kings, and Lord of lords. All the kings of the earth derive their power from Him; and He has a sovereign dominion over them. This is Christ's title, Rev. 19:16.

He only has immortality; has it in Himself, has it as He is the Fountain of it, for the immortality of angels and spirits is derived from Him. He dwells in inaccessible light; light which no man can approach unto: no man can get to heaven, but those whom He is pleased to bring thither, and admit into his kingdom. He is invisible; whom no man hath seen, nor can see. It is impossible that mortal eyes should bear the brightness of the divine glory. No man can see God and live.

Having mentioned these glorious attributes, he concludes with a doxology; To Him be honor and power everlasting. Amen. God having all power and honor to Himself, it is our duty to ascribe all power and honor to Him.

What an evil is sin, when committed against such a God, the blessed and only Potentate! The evil of it rises in proportion to the dignity of Him against whom it is committed. Similar is his condescension, to notice such mean and vile creatures as we are. What are we, that the blessed God, the King of kings, and Lord of lords, should seek after us? Blessed are they who are admitted to dwell with this great and blessed Potentate. Let us love, adore, and praise, the great God; for who shall not fear Thee, O Lord, and glorify thy name? For Thou only art holy, Rev. 15:4. The apostle adds, as a postscript, a lesson for the rich people, v. 17—19. Timothy must charge them that are rich to take care of the temptations, and improve the opportunities, of their prosperous estate. He must caution them,

1. To take heed of pride. That is a sin that easily besets rich people; but they must not think of themselves above what is meet, or be puffed up with their wealth.

2. Not to confide in their wealth. Nothing is more uncertain than the wealth of this world; many have had much of it one

PRACT. OBS. V. 6—12. We cannot look about us at all, without perceiving, that 'they who will be rich, fall into temptation,' are entangled 'in a snare,' and are overcome by many foolish and harmful lusts, which drown men in destruction and perdition.' 'For the love of money is the root of all kinds of evil,' in every part of the earth. Many hopeful persons, by allowing themselves to covet something greater, more elegant or affluent, have 'erred from the faith,' have 'made shipwreck' of their religious profession, or have turned out mere thorny-ground hearers; and others 'have pierced themselves through with many sorrows,' to the embittering of all their future lives. No words can express, no description reach, the numberless and horrid evils, which continually flow from this source; especially in a day of outward prosperity, extensive commerce, lavish expense, and loose profession!—Let every Christian flee from this destructive lust; let 'the man of God, especially, avoid every appearance of 'the love of filthy lucre,' or improvident expense; let us, on the contrary, 'follow after righteousness, godliness, faith, love, patience, meekness,' with that assiduity and earnestness, with which worldly men pursue perishing riches; let us fight the noble and profitable fight of faith, and thus 'lay hold on eternal life, to which we also are called;' and strive to act consistently with that good profession, which, in our ministry, we have made of the truth, before many witnesses, who will at last testify against us, if we 'forsake Christ from love of this present world.' SCOTT.

fect rule of universal 'righteousness,' by an upright, faithful conduct towards all men; a proper temper and behavior towards God in everything; a lively faith in Christ, and the divine promises in Him, as well as faithfulness in his stewardship; 'love' to the Lord, to his brethren, and mankind; 'patience' under sufferings, and 'meekness' amidst injuries and provocations.

(12.) Fight, &c.] 'It might, perhaps, more literally be rendered, exercise the good exercise; but this is a Grecism which the English language will not conveniently allow; nor does the word exercise by any means express the force of the original word, which always supposes an opponent to be resisted.'

V. 13—16. The Godhead itself seems to be here adored, without distinction of Persons, of which all these things are properly spoken, whether the Person of the Father, of the Son, or of the Holy Spirit, be mentioned. The invisible God is revealed to us, only in and through the human nature of Christ, as 'the only begotten Son' of the Father. Mat. 11:27. John 1:18. Col. 1:15—17. Heb. 1:3, 4. And this display of the divine glory will be rendered most illustrious, when Christ shall be seen as Man, exercising all the power, authority, and perfections of God, by the whole assembled universe. Rev. 20:11—15. —'Without spot,' in respect of the commandment itself, and 'unblamable,' in respect of the performance of it, which will contribute to preserve the good confession in the world, "till the appearing of our Lord Jesus Christ." MACKN. This is true and important, and indeed implied; but the apostle constantly, in his exhortations, referred to the appearing of Christ; not to establish it as a doctrine, that it was near in respect of time, but to inculcate a continual readiness for it, and an habitual regard to it, in the whole conduct of Christians to the very close of life. SCOTT.

(13.) Before Pontius Pilate, &c.] 'We have here another proof that Paul was acquainted with the first three gospels when he wrote his later epistles, and with that of Mat. when he wrote his earlier ones. — The confession here refers to the admission of our Lord, that He was the King of the Jews, and the Son of God. Mat. 27:11. Mark 15:2. John 18:37.' BLOOMF.—'It is perhaps called a good confession, not only as in itself noble and generous, but as all our hopes of happiness and salvation are built upon the truth of it.' DODDR.

(15.) 'Now are accumulated the most splendid predicates of the majesty and power of God; and these pave the way for the doxology which closes the passage.' HEINR., in Bloomfield.

V. 17—19. A few rich persons had, it seems, embraced the Gospel at Ephesus, and, as wealth is a comparative thing, some more wealthy than their brethren must be found in other places. Now Timothy and other ministers might be tempted to pay them undue deference, or to be afraid of speaking plainly to them, which would have a very bad effect on their ministry; and it would require much firmness and impartiality to give 18 That they do good, that they be rich in good works, ready to distribute, willing to communicate;

19 Laying up in store for themselves a good foundation against the time to come, that they may lay hold on eternal life.

20 O Timothy, keep that which is committed to thy trust, avoiding profane and vain babblings, and oppositions of science falsely so called:

day, and been stripped of all the next. Prov. 23:5.

3. He must charge them to trust in God, the living God; to make Him their Hope, who giveth us richly all things to enjoy: many

PRACT. OBS. V. 13-21. The apostle charges each one who ministers in holy things, and not Timothy alone, that we 'keep the commandment of God, without spot and rebukable, till the appearing of Jesus Christ.' Let none suppose, that 'our Lord delayeth his coming.' In his own times, He will be manifested, as 'the Effulgency of the divine glory, the Image of the invisible God.'—While nature prompts us to desire connexion with them; [the rich;] it produces a reluctance to that part of our duty, which relates to them. Even modesty, timidity, gratitude, or supposed prudence, may warp us in this matter; a false apprehension of what may conduce to their best interest, that of our religious society, or of the church at large, and a fear of prejudicing and offending them, and so losing the opportunity of doing good to them, or by them, may easily mislead us in this great concern; not to speak of the dread of their frown, and the credit and advantage of their friendship, both which are very ensnaring to the ministers of the Gospel. But their proper counsel, caution, and instruction. The apostle, therefore, peculiarly enjoined Timothy, to charge them, in the most plain, authoritative, and solemn manner, to warn them against the danger to which they were exposed, and to call on them to perform the peculiar duties of their station. By relieving the wants of the indigent, and largely contributing to the support and comfort of their poor brethren, and by other pious and charitable actions, they must aim to be 'rich in good works,' the genuine fruits of faith and love.

(17, 18.) 'Our houses are built, our vineyards are planted around the base of a volcano. They may be fair and flourishing to-day,—to-morrow, ashes may be all that remains. Open your hands wide, then, while they contain any blessings to bestow; for of that which you give, you can never be deprived.'

(17-19.) 'If any man take a tenth, or fifth part, from his stock, to give to the poor, the remainder will be a weightier seed for producing an increase, than if the whole had remained untouched. But then this is a delicate affair. To give, chiefly, with an expectation of increase, is traffic, not charity.' ADAMS.—Solomon tells us, that "riches often take wings and flee away;" and truly many times the undue sparing of them, is but letting their wings grow, which makes them ready to fly away; and the contributing a part of them to do good, only clips their wings a little, and makes them stay longer with the owner.' LEITCH.

V. 20, 21. Paul, considering the snares and temptations, the allurements and terrors, which Timothy had to guard against and overcome, in order to the faithful fulfilment of his ministry, and reflecting also on the various species of false religion, which many artfully substituted instead we riches, but enjoy them poorly, not having a heart to use them, and see God in them.

4. To do good with what they have; that they be rich in good works. Those are truly rich, who are rich in good works. That they be ready to distribute, willing to communicate; not only to do it, but to do it willingly, for God loves a cheerful giver.

5. To think of another world, and prepare for that which is to come by works of charity,—laying up in store a good foundation against the time to come, that they may take hold on eternal life. Observe,

Ministers must not be afraid of the rich; be they ever so rich, they must speak to them, and charge them; caution them against pride, and vain confidence in their riches; and stir them up to works of piety and charity, that they do good, &c. Here is a lesson for ministers in the charge given to Timothy; Keep that which is committed to thy trust. Every minister is a trustee; the truths of God, the ordinances of God, are a treasure committed to his trust; keep these, avoiding profane and vain babblings; not affecting human eloquence, which the apostle calls vain babblings, or human learning, which often opposes the truths of God, but keep close to the written Word, for that is committed to our trust. Some who have been

we must break through all these obstacles, if we would be faithful stewards and vigilant watchmen, and 'deliver our own souls.' We must 'charge them in the name of God not to be high-minded, nor to idolize, or at all to trust in uncertain riches;' we must show them the danger to which they are exposed, of being betrayed into pride, avarice, ambition, self-indulgence, and the love of outward splendor; we must point out to them the proper use and improvement of their wealth; we must call on them to provide against the time to come, when it will be said to them, 'Give an account of thy stewardship, for thou mayest be no longer steward.' Luke 16:1-4. P. O. 1-13, 19-22.—But, 'who is sufficient for these things?' Or who can give such charges with energy, that is not himself evidently superior to the love of wealth, or any thing which wealth can purchase? May the Lord help us all to 'keep these things, which are committed to our trust,' and may the grace of the Lord Jesus be with all his faithful ministers and people every where, and at all times! Amen. Sc.

of the haughty, holy Gospel of Christ, again most affectionately and earnestly called upon him to keep inviolable, without shrinking or wavering, the stewardship, or deposit with which he had been entrusted. And he warned him to shun the 'profane and vain babblings' of those, who wanted to impose on Christians the foolish and frivolous traditions and observances of the Jewish scribes, as well as the rites of the Mosiac law. He must turn away from 'the oppositions of science,' or knowledge, 'falsely so called,' such as those, with which the Gnostics, or knowing ones, afterwards corrupted the Gospel. These speculations were borrowed from the vain philosophy of the Gentiles, and being distorted and mutilated, to suit their purpose, men introduced them into Christianity, to render it more congenial to the heart of man, and especially to gratify their fondness for disputation, and pride of superior penetration and acuteness. Thus, one corrupt system of boasted knowledge was opposed to another; jangling controversies were multiplied and perpetuated; the truth was obscured and overlooked, and the wildest absurdities were substituted in its place. Some, even then, having been seduced into these speculations, had 'erred from the faith' into fatal heresies, and the evil was likely to increase. Having, therefore, given Timothy this warning, the apostle closed this most instructive epistle, with his usual salutation.

(20.) Science] 'The original word here gave rise, in the following century, to a sect famous (or rather infamous) in ecclesiastical history, called Gnostics, or knowing ones, because they pretended to know more than other Christians; and, it has been surmised, it was now rising into notice.'

These motives, which derived their strength from the imagination, were enforced by fears and hopes of a more substantial kind. Regular pay, [1 Cor. 3:7.] occasional donatives, [Rom. 6:23.] and a stated recompense, after the appointed time of service, [Heb. 10:35, 36.] alleviated the hardships of the military life, while, on the other hand, it was impossible for cowardice or disobedience to escape the severest punishment. The centurions were authorized to chastise with blows; the generals had a right to punish with death; and it was an inflexible maxim of Roman discipline, that a good soldier should dread his officers far more than the enemy. From such arts did the valor of the imperial troops receive a degree of firmness and docility, unattainable by the impetuous and irregular passions of barbarians.

And yet so sensible were the Romans of the imperfection of valor without skill and practice, that, in their language, the name of an army [exercitus] was borrowed from the word which signified exercise [ab exercitiis], says Vatro. Military exercises were the important and unremitted object of their discipline. [2 Tim. 4:7, 8.] The recruits and young soldiers were constantly trained, both in the morning and in the evening, nor was age or knowledge allowed to excuse the veterans from the daily repetition of what they had completely learned. [2 Tim. 2:3.] Large sheds were erected in the winter-quarters of the troops, that their useful labors might not receive any interruption from the most tempestuous weather; and it was carefully observed, that the arms destined to this unattractive of war, should be of double the weight which was required in real action. The exercises comprehended whatever could add strength to the body, activity to the limbs, or grace to the motions. The soldiers were diligently instructed to march, to run, to leap, to swim, to carry heavy burdens, to handle every species of arms that was used, either for offence or for defence, either in distant engagement or in a closer onset; to form a variety of evolutions; and to move to the sound of flutes, in the Pyrrhic or martial dance. In the midst of peace, the Roman troops familiarized themselves with the practice of war; and it is prettily remarked by an ancient historian, who had fought against them (Josephus), that the effusion of blood [comp. Heb. 12:4.] was the only circumstance which distinguished a field of battle from a field of exercise. It was the policy of the ablest generals, [comp. Heb. 2:10, 2 Tim. 4:8.] and even of the emperors themselves, to encourage these military studies by their presence and example; and we are informed, that Hadrian as well as Trajan, frequently condescended to instruct the inexperienced soldiers, to reward the diligent, and sometimes to dispute, with them, the prize [2 Tim. 2:5.] of superior strength and dexterity. Under their reigns tactics were cultivated with success, and, while vigor remained to the empire, their military institutions were the model.

Nine centuries of war had gradually improved the service; Polybius gives the early system, but the following was the constitution of the imperial legion. The heavy armed infantry which composed its principal strength, was divided into 10 cohorts and 65 companies, under the orders of a correspondent number of tribunes and centurions. [Acts 10:1, &c.] The 1st cohort, which always retained the post of honor and the custody of the eagle, was formed of 1035 soldiers, the most approved for valor and fidelity. The remaining 5 cohorts consisted, each, of 555; and the whole body of legionary infantry amounted to 6100 men. Their arms were uniform and admirably adapted to the nature of their service: an open helmet, with a lofty crest [1 Thess. 5:8.]; a breast-plate, or coat of mail; greaves on their legs; and an ample buckler on their left arm. [Eph. 6:14, &c.] The buckler was of an oblong and concave figure, 4 feet in length, and 2 1/2 in breadth, framed of a light wood, covered with a bull's hide, and strongly guarded with plates of brass. Besides a lighter spear, the legionary soldier grasped in his right hand the formidable pila, a ponderous javelin, whose utmost length was about 6 feet, and which was terminated by a massy triangular point of steel, of 18 inches. It was, however, exhausted by a single discharge, at the distance of only 10 or 12 paces. Yet, when launched by a firm and skilful hand, there was not any cavalry that durst venture within its reach, nor any shield or corslet that would sustain the impetuosity of its weight. As soon as the Roman had darted his pila, he drew his sword, and rushed forward to close with the enemy. His sword was a short, well-tempered, Spanish blade, [comp. Eph. 6:17.] that carried a double edge, and was alike suited to the purpose of striking or pushing; but the soldier was always instructed to prefer the latter use of his weapon, as his own body remained less exposed, while he inflicted a more dangerous wound on his adversary. The legion was usually drawn up 8 deep; and the regular distance of 3 ft. was left between the files and ranks; which would facilitate evolutions, and give room to supply the places of the killed or exhausted. The Macedonian phalax trusted in its 16 ranks of long pikes, closely wedged; but reflection and experience proved the strength of the phalax to be no match for the activity of the legion. AN EXPOSITION
PAUL TO TIMOTHY,

WITH
PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS AND NOTES.

(Henry's Exposition, completed by Mr. Atkinson.)

THIS second epistle Paul wrote to Timothy from Rome, when he was a prisoner there, and in danger of his life; this is evident from ch. 4:6. It appears that his removal out of this world, in his own apprehension, was not far off, especially considering the rage and malice of his persecutors; and that he had been brought before the emperor Nero, which he calls his first answer, when no man stood with him, but all men forsook him, ch. 4:16.—And interpreters agree, that this was the last epistle he wrote.

Where Timothy now was, is not certain. The scope of this epistle somewhat differs from that of the former, not so much relating to his office as an evangelist, as to his personal conduct and behavior. HENRY.

The apostle was evidently a prisoner at Rome when he wrote this epistle; but some suppose, that it was written during his first imprisonment, as the epistles to the Ephesians, the Philippians, the Colossians, Philemon, and the Hebrews, were. Others, however, are of opinion, that it was written when he was imprisoned a second time, and not long before he suffered martyrdom; and this appears to me by far the most satisfactory. — [Paley shows this view is strongly supported by the mention that is made of Erastus and Trophimus, and other internal evidence.] Henry, abr.—Roscnm. inclines to the opposite. ED.]—‘The ancients from these words . . . “I am ready to be offered, and the time of my departure is at hand,” (4:6.) do generally conclude, that this was the last of Paul’s epistles. . . . And truly the words of the apostle . . . are not well capable of any other sense; for he says, expressly, (4:6) . . . “I am now offered, and the time of my dissolution is instant. I have finished my course, and henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of glory” (8). Whereas, he not only expected to be delivered from his first bonds, but says, expressly, “I know that I shall abide, &c.” (Phil. 1:25, 26. Philem. 22. Heb. 13:23.) . . . In his first bonds, he was in libera custodia, “in his own hired house, receiving all that came to him, none forbidding him.” (Ac. 23:30, 31.) “His bonds were known in Cesar’s palace, and to all others.” (Phil. 1:13.)—Here he is in arcta custodia [close confinement]; so that Onesiphorus was forced to “inquire more diligently after him, that he might find him out.” (1:17.) Again, he said, before, “Many of the brethren in the Lord being encouraged by my bonds, were bold to speak the word more abundantly without fear.” (Phil. 1:14.) Here, “all men forsake him.” (4:16.)’ Whitby.—Timothy was with Paul, when he wrote to the Philippians, to the Colossians, to Philemon, and to the Hebrews. (Phil. 1:1. Col. 1:1. Philem. 1. Heb. 13:23.) Mark was also with him, and joined in saluting the Colossians; but both were absent when this epistle was written, (4:11.)—Should it be argued, that they came to him before he wrote the other epistles, what can be said concerning Demas? For he was with the apostle when he wrote to the Colossians, but had forsaken him when he wrote this epistle. (4:10. Col. 4:14.) The supposition, that Timothy and Mark had come to the apostle, before he wrote the other epistles, implies, that this was written a considerable time before those; but the assumption, that Demas had repented, and returned to the apostle, when he wrote to the Colossians, implies, that the epistle to Colosse was written some time after. Yet, these contradictory suppositions must both be admitted, to support the opinion, that this epistle was written during the apostle’s first imprisonment. Indeed, the language used in it implies, that the apostle considered himself, as one who had finished his ministerial labors, and after a severe imprisonment, perhaps for some time longer, was about to close his testimony by martyrdom. (Notes, 1:15—18. 4:6—8.) Timothy, it is generally thought, now resided at Ephesus; indeed this is probable, though not certain. (Comp. 2:16—18. 4:14. with 1 Tim. 1:20.—See Notes, 4:9—13, 19—22.)—It was evidently the scope of the epistle, to animate Timothy to endure persecutions, with courage and constancy; to caution him and others against false teachers and corrupt professors of Christianity, the increase of whom the apostle predicted, in the most energetic language; and to direct and animate him in fulfilling his ministry, and in following after holiness.

‘The apostle had been for some time under close confinement at Rome, at the mercy of a cruel and capricious tyrant. He had seen himself deserted by his friends, in his greatest extremity, and had nothing before him, but the certain prospect of being called to suffer death, in the same cause to which he had devoted his life. In this situation, how does he behave? Does he seem to look back with concern on his past conduct, or to regret the sacrifice he had made of his worldly interests? Can we discover anything, that betrays a secret consciousness of guilt, or even a suspicion of the weakness of his cause? Nay, does he drop a single expression, that can be interpreted as the mark of fear, or discomposure of mind, in the apprehension of those gloomy scenes that lay before him? Surely, if he had been an impostor, or had entertained the least doubt of the doctrines he taught, something of this kind would have escaped him when writing to a friend, with whom he could intrust all the secrets of his breast.—On the contrary, upon the most calm and deliberate survey, he expresses an entire satisfaction, in reflecting on the part he had acted; and earnestly recommends it to his beloved pupil, to follow his example, in maintaining the glorious cause, even at the hazard of his life. He appears, throughout the epistle, to have felt a strong conviction of the truth of those principles he had embraced, and glories in the sufferings he had endured in support of them, triumphing in the full assurance of being approved by his great Master, and of receiving at his hands a crown of distinguished lustre.’ Doddr. SCOTT.

CHAP. I.

1 Paul’s love to Timothy, and the unfeigned faith which was in Timothy himself, his mother, and grandmother. 6 He is exhorted to stir up the gift of God which was in him, 8 to be steadfast, and patient in persecution, 13 and to persist in the form and truth of that doctrine which he had learned of him. 15 Phygellus and Hermogenes, and such like, are noted, and Onesiphorus is highly commended.

PAUL, an apostle of Jesus Christ by the will of God, according to the <sup>a</sup> promise of life which is in Christ Jesus,

2 To Timothy, my dearly beloved—

NOTES. CHAP. I. V. 1. The Gospel, intrusted to the apostle by the will and appointment of God, was according to ‘the promise of life’ and salvation, made from the beginning, to fallen man, through the predicted Messiah; (Note, Gen. 3:14, 15.) all the prophecies to this effect were fulfilled in Christ, and then the promise of life was sent to Jews and Gentiles without distinction. (M. R.—Note, Rom. 15:8—13.)—‘Adam brought the sentence of death upon us all, and the promise of deliverance from that death is only made to us, through Jesus Christ, by virtue of that death which He suffered in our stead.’ Whitby.—‘Thus he

CHAP. I. V. 1—5. Here is,

1. The inscription of the epistle; Paul calls himself an apostle by the will of God, i. e. he was so merely by his good pleasure, and grace, which he professes himself unworthy of; according to the promise of life which is in Christ Jesus, i. e. the Gospel, which is the promise of life in Christ Jesus; life the end, and Christ the Way, John 14:6. He calls Timothy his beloved son; Paul felt the warmest affection for him, both because he had been an instrument of his conversion, and because, as a son with his father, he had served with him in the Gospel.

In the former epistle he says, he was an apostle by the commandment of God our Savior, here by the will of God; the meaning is, God called him to be an apostle. The Gospel is the promise of life, Ti. 1:2.

shows, that the Gospel is not new, but the very thing which God promised by the prophets. . . . I would again and again admonish the reader, not to pass over the superscriptions to the epistles of Paul, in a slight manner, as he uses in them, with a sort of inimitable brevity, to embrace the sum of the mystery of the Gospel; so that while these are preserved, the church possesses that which she may oppose to all heretics.’ Beza.

3 I thank God, whom I serve<sup>c</sup> from my forefathers with pure<sup>d</sup> conscience, that without ceasing I have remembrance of thee in my prayers night and day;

4 Greatly desiring<sup>e</sup> to see thee, being mindful of thy tears, that I may be filled with joy;

6 Wherefore I put thee in remembrance, that thou stir up the gift of God,<sup>h</sup> which is in thee by the putting on of my hands.

7 For God hath not given us the spirit of<sup>i</sup> fear; but of<sup>j</sup> power, and of love, and of a sound mind.

PRACT. OBS. V. 1—9. The 'promise of eternal life,' to all who believe in Jesus Christ, is the leading subject in the preaching of those ministers, who are employed 'according to the will of God;' and though outward dispensations vary, yet his real people have, in every age, substantially the same religion, and serve God after the manner of their forefathers and predecessors, 'with a pure conscience,' being partakers of the same 'grace, mercy, and peace, from God the Father, and our Lord Jesus Christ.'—The pious instructions and fervent prayers of believing parents, are often the means of conversion to their children; yet, such as enjoy this advantage should be reminded, that they will derive no benefit from 'the unfeigned faith' of the nearest relations, unless the same dwell in them also. We ought to exhort those, of whom we have the best opinion, 'to stir up the gift of God that is in them,' and to occupy with it in the duties of the stations allotted them.—The new nature, communicated in regeneration, leads to true liberty, and victory over the fear of man, and of those reproaches, contumelies, and

V. 3—5. Lois and Eunice seem to have 'waited for the consolation of Israel,' before they heard the Gospel, and thus were prepared to receive it; and having diligently given Timothy a religious education, it greatly conduced to his being made partaker of the same faith, as the apostle was fully persuaded concerning him. (Marg. Ref. h—q.—Note, 3:14—17. Acts 16:1—3.)—It is not unlikely, that Timothy accompanied the apostle to Miletus, and parted with him there, accompanying the Ephesian elders, when they returned to Ephesus. SCOTT.

(5.) Lois and Eunice.] 'The pains these worthy persons took to impress the mind of their son in his childhood, with sentiments of piety and virtue, is a fit example for the imitation of all mothers, who, if they take the same pains with their children, may hope that, by the blessing of God, their care will be followed with the same happy effects.' MACKN.—'How powerful is the influence of a mother, and what an opportunity does she enjoy, if she be a Christian, for instilling into the hearts of her children, the principles of religion. If all were like the mother of Timothy, there would be no lack of faithful and devoted ministers to preach the Gospel at home, or of missionaries to carry it to the heathen. Can the reader think of a more perfect image of bliss, than the mother of a glorified spirit?—a spirit that shall have turned many to righteousness, and will be for ever loved and honored by Christ, and the redeemed, for the part which he bore on earth, in the cause of human salvation? If it is seen, that the mother gave such direction to the opening mind of her son, as that his subsequent usefulness can be traced back to her influence, [can woman's ambition aim higher?—surely there will be no crown in heaven, for which that mother would exchange her joy.'

the other, is the Giver of these blessings, and ought to be applied to for them; and they are the best we can ask for our dearly beloved friends, or ourselves.

2. Paul's thanksgiving to God for Timothy's faith and holiness, and that he remembered Timothy in his prayers. Observe, Whatever good office we perform for our friends, God must have the glory of it. He puts it into our hearts to remember such and such in our prayers. Observe, Paul prayed much, night and day, and without ceasing; and he never forgot his friends in his prayers, as we often do. He greatly desired to see Timothy, out of the affection he had for him, that he might have some conversation with him, being mindful of his tears at their last parting; for he perceived by that, what a true affection he had for him. He thanks God, that Timothy kept up the religion of his ancestors, v. 5. Observe, Timothy had a good mother, and a good grandmother: they believed, though his father did not, Acts 16. It is a comfortable thing when children imitate the faith and holiness of their godly parents, and tread in their steps, 3 John 4: Paul had a very charitable opinion of his friends, was very willing to hope the best concerning them; indeed he had great reason to believe well of Timothy, for he had no man like-minded, Phil. 2:10.

Observe, We are, according to Paul, to serve God with a pure conscience; this is to draw near with a true heart, in full assurance of faith, having our heart sprinkled from an evil conscience, Heb. 10:22. The faith that dwells in real believers is unfeigned, a faith that will stand the trial; it dwells in them as a living principle: we should rejoice, moreover, wheresoever we see the grace of God thus manifested; so did Barnabas, Acts 11:23, 24. 2 John 4.

V. 6—14. Here is an exhortation and excitation of Timothy to his duty, v. 6.

I. He exhorts him to stir up the gift of God that was in him. It is meant of all the gifts and graces God had given him, to qualify him for the work of an evangelist, the gifts of the Holy Ghost, the extraordinary gifts that were conferred by the imposition of the apostle's hands. These he must stir up, exercise, and so increase: use gifts and have gifts; to him that hath shall be given, Mat. 25:29.

Whether the gift of God in Timothy was ordinary or extraordinary, (though I incline to the latter,) he must stir it up, otherwise it would decay. Further, you see that this gift was in him by the putting on of the apostle's hands, which I take to be distinct from his ordination, which was performed by the hands of the presbytery, 1 Tim. 4:14. Probably, Timothy had the Holy Ghost, in his extraordinary gifts and graces, conferred on him by the laying on of the apostle's hands, (for I reckon none but the apostles had the power of giving the Holy Ghost,) and afterward, being thus richly furnished for the work of the ministry, was ordained by the presbytery.

The great hindrance of usefulness in the increase of our gifts, is, slavish fear; therefore, he warns him against this, v. 7. it was through base fear the evil servant buried his talent, and did not trade with it, Mat. 25:25. Now God hath therefore armed us against the spirit of fear, by often bidding us fear not. The spirit of love to God will carry us through all opposition we may meet with, and set us above the fear of man, and all the hurt man can do us. The Spirit God gives his ministers, is not a fearful, but courageous Spirit; it is a Spirit of power, for they speak in his name who has all power, both in heaven and earth; a Spirit of love, for love to God and the souls of men, must inflame ministers in all their service; and it is a Spirit of a sound mind, for they speak the words of truth and soberness.

II. He exhorts him to count on afflictions, and get ready for them, v. 8. The Gospel of Christ is what we have none of us reason to be ashamed of. We must not be ashamed of those who are suffering for the Gospel of Christ.

The Gospel is a testimony of our Lord; in and by that He bears testimony of Himself to us, and by professing our adherence to it we bear testimony of Him and for Him: if we are now ashamed of either Christ or those who suffer for Him, He injuries which may be expected in the path of duty. Whenever, therefore, we find our hearts discouraged, our hands weakened, or our earnestness in the work of the Lord abated, we should ascribe it to the remains of unbelief and a carnal mind, and to the temptations of Satan; and we should strive the more fervently in prayer, for 'supplies of the Spirit of Christ,' to invigorate our faith and hope, to 'shed abroad the love of God in our hearts,' to animate us with zeal and holy affections, and to produce in us a sound mind, and heavenly wisdom.—In proportion as 'the Spirit witnesseth with our spirits, that we are the children of God,' and 'that He hath saved us, and called us with a holy calling, not according to our works, but according to his purpose, and grace, given us in Christ before the world began,' we shall feel ourselves 'constrained by love,' to devote ourselves and all our talents to his glory. Thus we shall manifest the holy nature of our calling, and of that doctrine which is so much opposed and perverted by the pride and carnality of the human heart. SCOTT.

V. 6—8. Love, zeal, and compassion for souls, being brought into vigorous exercise, Timothy would be animated to improve his talents, and fulfil his ministry, with ardor and effect. The spirit of a lively Christian [is] that of courage, firmness, zeal, and wise consistency of conduct, in the midst of persecutions and temptations. SCOTT.

V. 9. This calling had not been 'according to their works,' for if God had dealt with them by that rule, they must have been left under condemnation; but it was 'according to his own purpose, and grace, which was given them in Christ before the world began;' that is, his purpose of giving them grace, in and through Christ Jesus, which was engaged to Him, as the appointed Surety of his chosen people, 'from eternal ages.' M. R. h—b.—Note, Tit. 1:1—4. Various ways of setting aside the obvious meaning of the v. as implying personal election 'from the beginning,' or 'before eternal times,' have been proposed: but none of them can be maintained, as it appears to me, without supposing, that all, who live and die impenitent and unbelieving, may nevertheless be said to be 'saved and called with a holy calling,' because a Savior was promised from the beginning of the world. Indeed, 'the purpose of God' is expressly mentioned, as the reason why they, rather than others, were thus 'saved and called.' SCOTT.

(9.) 'Grace was given us in Christ before the world was, i. e. before we or our works could exist. Therefore we ought not to be ashamed of the testimony and cross of Christ. Grace is said to be given us in Christ, because, although we did not yet exist, yet Christ, the appointed Mediator, subsisted from eternity; and He in the covenant of redemption with the Father, before the world was, covenanted for us his elect,

10 But is now made manifest<sup>q</sup> by the appearing of our Savior Jesus Christ, who hath abolished<sup>r</sup> death, and hath brought<sup>s</sup> life and immortality to light through the gospel:

12 For the which cause I also suffer these things: nevertheless<sup>t</sup> I am not ashamed: for I know whom I have<sup>u</sup> believed, and am persuaded that he is able to keep that which I have<sup>v</sup> committed unto him against that day.

13 Hold fast<sup>w</sup> the form<sup>x</sup> of y sound words, which thou hast heard of me, in faith and love which is in Christ Jesus.

14 That<sup>z</sup> good thing which was committed unto thee, keep by the Holy Ghost which dwelleth in us.

will be ashamed of us hereafter: 'But let them partaker of the afflictions of the Gospel;' (or, as it may be read, Do thou suffer with the Gospel;) 'not only sympathize with those who suffer for it, but be ready to suffer with them, and like them.' If at any time the Gospel be in distress, he who hopes for life and salvation by it will be content to suffer with it.

Mentioning God and the Gospel, he notices what great things God has done for us by the Gospel, v. 9, 10. To encourage him to suffer, he urges two considerations.

1. He shows him the nature of that Gospel which he was called to suffer for, and the glorious and gracious designs and purposes of it; enlarging on them, as usual, so full was he always of that which is all our salvation, and ought to be all our desire.

Observe, The Gospel aims at our salvation; He has saved us, and we must not think much to suffer for that which we hope to be saved by. It is designed for our sanctification; and called us with a holy calling, called us to holiness; all who shall be saved hereafter, are sanctified now. The rise of it is the free grace and eternal purpose of God in Christ Jesus. If we had merited it, it had been hard to suffer for it; but our salvation by it is of free grace, therefore we must not think much to suffer for it. The Gospel is the manifestation of this purpose and grace, by the appearing of our Savior Jesus Christ, who had lain in the bosom of the Father from eternity, and was perfectly apprised of all his gracious purposes; by his appearing, that gracious purpose was made manifest to us. Did Jesus Christ suffer for it, and shall we think much to suffer for it?

By the Gospel of Christ, death is abolished; He has abolished death, not only weakened it, but broken its power over us; by taking away sin He has abolished death, for the sting of death is sin, 1 Cor. 15:56. He has altered the property of it. Death now, of an enemy, is become a friend, and is the gate by which we pass out of a troublesome, vexatious, sinful world, into a world of perfect peace and purity; it comes not now in triumph over those who believe the Gospel, but they triumph over it, 1 Cor. 15:55.

Lastly, He has brought life and immortality to light by the Gospel; He has showed us another world, more clearly than it was before discovered under any former dispensation; and the happiness of that world, the certain recompense of our obedience by faith: we all, with open face, as in a glass, behold the glory of God. Let us value the Gospel more than ever, for herein it has the pre-eminence above all former discoveries.

2. Consider the example of blessed Paul, v. 11, 12. He was appointed to preach the Gospel, and particularly to teach the Gentiles. He thought it a cause worth suffering for, and why should not Timothy think so too?

Observe, Good men often suffer many things for the best cause in the world; for which cause I suffer these things; that is, 'for my preaching and adhering to the Gospel.' They need not to be ashamed, the cause will bear them out; but those who oppose it, shall be clothed with shame. Observe, Those who trust in Christ, know whom they have trusted. He speaks with a holy triumph and exultation, as much as to say, 'I stand on firm ground. I know I have lodged the great trust in the hands of the best Trustee.' And am persuaded, &c. What must we commit to Christ? The salvation of our souls, and their preservation to the heavenly kingdom; and what we so commit to Him, He will keep. There is a day coming, when our souls will be inquired after; 'Man! Woman! thou hadst a soul committed to thee, what hast thou done with it? To whom was it offered, to God or Satan? How was it employed; in the service of sin, or in the service of Christ?'

There is a day coming, and it will be a very solemn and awful day, when we must give an account of our stewardship, Luke 16:2. give an account of our souls: now if by an active, obedient faith we commit it to Jesus Christ, we may be sure He is able to keep it, and it shall be forthcoming to our comfort in that day.

III. He exhorts him to hold fast the form of sound words, v. 13.

1. 'Have a form of sound words;' (so it may be read;) an abstract of the first principles of religion, according to the Scriptures; a brief summary of the Christian faith, in a proper method, drawn out by thyself from the Holy Scriptures for thy own use; or rather, by the form of sound words, I understand the Holy Scriptures themselves.

2. 'Having it, hold it fast, remember it; retain it, adhere to it. Adhere to that, in opposition to all heresies and false doctrine, which corrupt the Christian faith. Hold that fast which thou hast heard of me.' Paul was divinely inspired. But how must it be held fast? In faith and love; we must assent to it as a faithful saying, and bid it welcome as worthy of all acceptance. Hold it fast in a good heart; Faith and love must go together; it is not enough merely to assent to sound words, but we must love them, believe their truth, and love their goodness, and we must propagate them in love, Eph. 4:15. Faith and love which are in Christ Jesus; it must be Christian faith and love; faith and love fastening on Jesus Christ, in and by whom God speaks to us, and we to Him. Timothy, as a minister, must hold fast the form of sound words, for the benefit of others. Of healing words, so it may read; there is a healing virtue in the Word of God; He sent his Word and healed them. To the same purport is v. 14.

The Christian doctrine is a trust committed to us, to Christians in general, but to ministers in particular; it is a good thing, of unspeakable value in itself, and which will be of unspeakable advantage to us; for it discovers to us the unsearchable riches of Christ, Eph. 3:8. It is committed to us, to be preserved pure and entire, and to be transmitted to those who shall come after us, and we must keep it, and not contribute anything to the corrupting of its purity, the weakening of its power, or the diminishing of its perfection; Keep it by the Holy Ghost that dwelleth in us. We must not think to keep it by our own strength, but keep it by the Holy Ghost.

The Holy Ghost dwells in all good ministers and Christians; they are his temples, and afterwards paid the price of redemption, and in our name received the grace by which we might at length be called, justified, and each finally saved.' Dickson.—'The gift of the grace he here commemorates is no other than that predestination, by which we are made the sons of God. God is often said to give us grace, when we experience the effect of his grace. But here Paul speaks of what He had determined with Himself, from the beginning.' CALVIN.—'Here is the divine glory, as set forth, independent of any motive or cause whatever, but God's own sovereign will and pleasure. No moving cause, no procuring cause, no assisting cause. Here is not a word of either. Who hath saved us. It is spoken of us a thing already done. And called us. So then salvation, or the predestinated purpose of God, of the church to salvation in Christ, is before calling. A most plain, palpable, decided proof, that nothing of creature-worth, or creature-ability, is taken into the account.' HAWK.—'If the thing were done before we had a being, how could it depend on our doing?' Rev. B. JONES.

V. 10. Whatever notions, and convictions, any of the Gentiles had concerning the soul's immortality, they knew nothing of the way in which eternal life might be enjoyed by sinful man; they were wholly ignorant of the meaning annexed in the Scripture to the words, 'life and immortality.' Their speculations served only for amusement or disputation, being blended with error and fable, involved in obscurity and uncertainty, and utterly inefficacious on their practice. The Jews indeed had a revelation in the O. T. both of a future state, and of the resurrection of the body. But it was far less full and explicit, than that in the N. T., it was chiefly confined to one small nation, and it was very imperfectly understood and believed, even in that one nation. (Note, Mat. 22:23-33.) So that whatever had been conjectured or believed, before the coming of Christ, concerning a future state, it might properly be said, that 'He had brought life and immortality to light by the Gospel;' the doctrine respecting it was placed in the most convincing and interesting light, every proper question about it was satisfactorily resolved, and the whole was suited to answer the most important practical purposes.—Indeed, after all modern improvements and supposed demonstrations, the influential belief of the immortality of the soul, and a future state of retribution, rests wholly on divine revelation, as well as that of the resurrection of the body, and the way of a sinner's acceptance. If indeed it can be demonstrated, that the soul is naturally capable of immortality, it certainly cannot be proved, except from immediate revelation, that almighty God will not terminate its existence, especially as it is forfeited by sin, or that He will not make every transgressor miserable in immortality; for immortality may be endless misery; but the Gospel, which expressly states this, Notes, Mat. 25:11-46. Mark 9:43-50. also clearly connects 'life,' with 'immortality,' in respect of all who believe, John 11:20-27. So that it should exceedingly enhance our value for 'the oracles of God,' when we clearly perceive the insufficiency of 'the oracles of reason,' in the most intricate of all concerns.

SCOTT.—V. 12. That which I have committed. Here only.—'It signifies both that which is committed to us of God, and that we commit to Him. . . . A thing committed to the trust of any whomsoever, by any whomsoever.' Leish. See also 1 Tim. 6:20.

V. 13, 14. After the above animating declaration of his own experience and joyful confidence, in the midst of sufferings, and the near prospect of a violent death, the apostle exhorted his beloved Timothy to 'hold fast,' in a steadfast profession, and by faithful preaching, 'the form of sound words,' the substance of evangelical truth, which he had heard of him; and of which perhaps he had given him some compendious epitome. 'That good thing,' the ministerial charge, or the Gospel committed to his stewardship, Timothy was exhorted thus to retain, observe, and fulfil, without turning aside from it on any account; but he must do this 'by the Holy Ghost, which dwelleth in us,' in dependence on his sacred influences, sought by constant prayer, and by compliance with them. (M. R. g. h.)—'Adhering closely to the words and phrases, in which the apostle had taught the doctrines of the Gospel. The teachers, in modern times, who, in explaining the articles of the Christian faith, use phrases different from the scripture-phraseology, would do well to attend to this apostolical injunction.' Mackn. 12.

15 This thou knowest, that all <sup>a</sup> they which are in Asia be turned <sup>b</sup> away from me; of whom are Phygellus and Hermogenes.

16 The Lord give mercy unto the house of <sup>c</sup> Onesiphorus; for he oft refreshed me, and was not ashamed of my <sup>d</sup> chain:

and He enables them to keep the Gospel pure and uncorrupt; and yet they must use their best endeavors; for the assistance and indwelling of the Holy Ghost does not exclude men's endeavors, but they very well consist together.

V. 15—18. Having exhorted Timothy to hold fast, v. 13, 14, he mentions,

PRACT. OBS. V. 10—18. We should bless the Lord continually for 'the appearing of our Savior Jesus Christ,' for what He has done and suffered to 'abolish death,' and for his Gospel, by which He has 'brought life and immortality to light.' As we have such decisive assurance of a future state, such full information concerning the nature of it, and so clear a prospect of immortal felicity, by faith in Him 'who is the Resurrection and the Life,' let us 'give the more diligence,' in making our personal interest in his salvation sure to our souls; and let such as are appointed to publish these important tidings to mankind, and to instruct the nations in the truths of Christ, prepare for sufferings, knowing that his most honored servants have always been most conformed to Him in this respect.—The hope of the mearest real Christian, rests on the same basis with that of the greatest apostle; and, in order to possess this good hope, we must adhere steadfastly to 'the form of sound words,' which the apostles have taught us; not only rejecting new notions, but new expressions, which are often employed to evade one part of religion, by drawing the attention from others of equal importance. We must also be careful to hold even an orthodox creed 'in faith and love which are in Christ Jesus;' this, as well as ministerial

1. The apostasy of divers from the doctrine of Christ, v. 15. He does not say from Christ, (though it should seem they were,) but from me; they had turned their backs on him, and disowned him, in the time of his distress. And should we wonder at it, when many turned their backs on a much better than Paul? I mean the Lord Jesus Christ, John 6: 66.

2. He mentions the constancy of one Onesiphorus, v. 16. Observe, What kindness Onesiphorus had showed to Paul, not once or twice, but often; at Rome he took care to seek Paul out very diligently, and found him, v. 17. and at Ephesus he had ministered to him, and been very kind to him; Timothy knew it. Paul returns his kindness, v. 16—18. He that receives a prophet, shall have a prophet's reward. He repays him with his prayers; The Lord give mercy to Onesiphorus. It is probable Onesiphorus was now absent from home, and in company with Paul; he therefore prays that his house might be kept during his absence. The papists will have it he was dead; and from Paul's praying for him, they conclude the warrantableness of praying for the dead; but who told them Onesiphorus was dead? And can it be safe to ground a doctrine and practice of such importance on a mere supposition, and very great uncertainty? He prays for Onesiphorus himself, as well as for his house, that he might find mercy in that day, in the day of death and of judgment, when Christ will account all the good offices done to his poor members as done to Himself. Observe, (1.) The day of death and judgment is an awful day, which may be emphatically called that day; (2.) We need desire no more to make us happy, than to find mercy of the Lord in that day; the best Christians will want mercy in that day, looking for the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ, Jude 21; if you would have mercy then, you must seek for it now of the Lord, for it is of and from the Lord that we must have mercy, and unless the Lord has mercy on us, in vain will be the pity and compassion of men or angels; we are to seek and ask for mercy of the Lord, who is the Giver and Bestower of it; for the Lord Christ has satisfied justice, that mercy might be displayed. Finally, The best thing we can ask for is, mercy of the Lord in that day, when we must pass out of time into eternity, and appear before the judgment-seat of Christ; the Lord grant unto all of us, that we may find mercy of the Lord in that day!

CHAP. II. In this ch., our apostle gives Timothy many exhortations and directions, which may be of great use to others, both ministers and Christians, for whom they were designed as well as for him.

V. 1—7. I. Timothy is encouraged to constancy and perseverance in his work, v. 1. Be strong in the grace that is in Christ Jesus, may be understood,

1. In opposition to the weakness of grace. Where there is the truth of grace, there must be a laboring after the strength of grace. As our trials increase, we need to grow stronger and stronger in that which is good; in our faith, our resolution, our love to God and Christ.

2. In opposition to our being strong in our own strength; 'Be strong, not confiding in thy own sufficiency, but in the grace that is in Jesus Christ.' Compare Eph. 6: 10. When Peter promised rather to die for Christ than to deny Him, he was strong in his own strength; had he been strong in the grace that is in Christ Jesus, he had kept his standing better.

There is grace in Christ Jesus, John 1: 17. grace enough for all; and we must be strong in this grace, and not in ourselves. Paul exhorts Timothy with great tenderness and affection; Thou, therefore, my son, &c.

Timothy must count on sufferings, even unto blood, therefore,

He must train up others to succeed him in faithfulness, must be attempted 'by the Holy Spirit which dwelleth in us;' and it will never be performed by those, 'who trust in their own hearts,' and 'lean to their own understandings.'—We need not wonder, that self-wisdom, and a contempt of the influences of the Holy Spirit, united with a dislike to the humbling truths of the Gospel, and to bear the cross for Christ's sake, should turn so many, in these latter ages, from regarding the writings of the apostles; for similar causes turned many from them, even while the apostles were living, and confirming their authority and doctrine by the most undeniable miracles! But if others choose to follow the example of Phygellus and Hermogenes, let us copy that of Onesiphorus, by seeking out the afflicted servants of Christ, and refreshing and ministering to them; not being ashamed of their poverty or disgrace, though laid in dungeons or workhouses, and doing them all the good we can, with a constant affection, for the Lord's sake. Then shall we have an interest in their prevailing prayers; (Note, 2 Cor. 9:12—15. P. O. 3—15.) then we may thus hope for the mercy of God on our families, and may rest assured of 'finding mercy of the Lord in that day,' when we shall most know its unspeakable value.

SCOTT.

V. 15. Some understand this of those ministers and Christians, who were natives of Asia, professing Christianity, and had been with Paul at Rome; but who had shamefully deserted him in the season of his greatest danger. Others suppose the apostle to mean, that the churches in Asia (or that district of which Ephesus was the metropolis) had withdrawn their regard from him, being perverted by heretical teachers. (Notes, Rev. 2:1—7.) Some indeed interpret it of the Judaizing teachers, but those who had always openly opposed the apostle, could not be said to be 'turned away from him.' These, however, and other false teachers, probably had succeeded in alienating many of the apostle's converts. Yet the first interpretation seems to be the true one, and is established by the context. (Note, 16—18.)—The expression, 'Thou knowest,' may only mean, 'No doubt thou hast heard;' and to mention two individuals of whom better hopes had been formed, to Timothy while resident in Asia, and witnessing the defection of many churches, would have been wholly unnatural.

(15.) All they in Asia. 'The Asiatics were infamous for their cowardice and effeminacy. But Paul probably alludes to their behavior at Rome, ch. 4:16, of which Timothy might have been informed by travellers.'

V. 16—18. Onesiphorus probably resided at Ephesus, where his family then was, and had been at Rome, and still was at a distance from them. [This, Onesiphorus, pains to find Paul] shows, that the apostle's imprisonment was far more close and severe than before; so that Christians in general scarcely knew where he was, and many of them were afraid to inquire after him. (Preface, Note, Acts 23:30, 31.—The eager manner, in which the papists catch at the unfounded notion that Onesiphorus was dead, because the apostle prayed separately for his household, and yet afterwards prayed for him also, shows how entirely destitute their practice of praying for the dead is of scriptural proof, and how glad they would be to meet with some countenance for it in the Word of God, if that could be done.—Very well. More exactly, than what Onesiphorus had done for the apostle at Rome.

NOTES. CHAP. II. V. 1, 2. This does not indeed prove, that the people had no concern in the appointment of their own pastors, or of ministers to preach the Gospel in dark places; but it undeniably proves that Timothy had a superintending authority, and was empowered to take head, that none should be appointed, except 'faithful men, who were able to instruct others also.' It can scarcely be supposed, that there was any competition at that time. The apostles, and those sent by them, would doubtless select the most suitable persons, and the people would cordially acquiesce in the choice. (M. R. e.g.—Notes, Acts 6:2—6. 14:21—23. 1 Tim. 5:21, 22. Tit. 1:5—9.)—The communication of divine truth to mankind, by a succession of witnesses, from age to age, was thus effectually provided for. In 'Endynamow: (1) cannot mean less than " exert thyself vigorously."'

(2.) Commit, &c. 'Some argue hence, that the people were not to choose their own ministers. But if they did choose them, or propose them to Timothy, it might yet be his appropriate office to admit them to the ministry, and solemnly to commit the Gospel to them.' DODD.—Eusebius, speaking of the churches founded by Paul and Peter, saith, "But how many, and who, having become genuine imitators of these," (apostles,) "were esteemed fit to feed the churches founded by them, it is not easy to say; unless it is such as any one may easily collect from the writings of Paul."—If in the days of Eusebius, the succession of pastors in the churches, founded by the apostles, was so uncertain, these successions must now be much more uncertain. Nevertheless, as, in Eusebius' time, the authority of the ministry was not called in question, on account of the intrusions of pastors into particular churches without due warrant, so it can as little be called in question now on that account, in regard it is nowhere promised in Scripture, that the succession of pastors should be uninterrupted.

MACKNIGHT.

3 Thou therefore endure <sup>e</sup> hardness, as a good soldier of Jesus Christ.

4 No man that warreth <sup>f</sup> entangleth himself with the affairs of this life; that he may please him who hath chosen him to be a soldier.

5 And if a man also strive for masteries, yet is he not crowned, except he strive lawfully.

6 The husbandman <sup>g</sup> that labor-eth must be first partaker of the fruits.

7 Consider <sup>h</sup> what I say; and the <sup>i</sup> Lord give thee understanding in all things.

8 Remember that <sup>j</sup> Jesus Christ, of the seed of David, was raised from the dead according to my gospel:

9 Wherein I suffer trouble, as an evil-doer, even unto <sup>k</sup> bonds; but the word of God is not bound.

10 Therefore I endure all things for the <sup>l</sup> elect's sakes, that they may also obtain the salvation which is in Christ Jesus with eternal glory.

11 It is a faithful saying: For if <sup>m</sup> we be dead with him, we shall also live with him:

12 If we suffer, we shall also reign with him: if we deny <sup>n</sup> him, he also will deny us:

e c. 4:5. f 1 Co. 9:25,26. g or, laboring first, must be partaker.

the ministry of the Gospel, v. 2. and ordain them, lodge the Gospel as a trust in their hands, and so commit to them the things he had heard. Two things he must have an eye to in ordaining ministers; their fidelity or integrity, Commit them to faithful men; and their ministerial ability. They must not only be knowing themselves, but be able and apt to teach others also; must aim at the honor of God and Christ, and the welfare of souls.

11. He must endure hardness, v. 3. Thou therefore, &c. All Christians, but especially ministers, are soldiers of Jesus Christ; they fight under his banner, in his cause, and against his enemies, He is their Captain, Heb. 2: 10. They must approve themselves good soldiers, faithful, resolute, and persevering, till they are made more than con- querors, through Him that loved them, Rom. 8: 37. They must endure hardness; expect it, count on it in this world; endure and accustom themselves to it, and persevere in it.

III. He must not entangle himself in the affairs of this world, v. 4. A soldier, when enlisted, leaves his calling, to attend his captain's orders. If we have given up ourselves to be Christ's soldiers, we must sit loose to this world; and though we must employ ourselves in the affairs of this life while here, yet we must not entangle ourselves with those affairs, so as by them to be diverted and drawn aside from our duty to God, and the great concerns of our Christianity.

IV. We must see to it, that in warring our spiritual warfare we go by rule, observe the laws of war, v. 5. we cannot expect the prize unless we do. Observe here, A Christian is to strive for masteries; he must aim at mastering his own lusts and corruptions. Those who do so, shall be crowned at last, after a complete victory.

V. We must be willing to wait for a recompense, v. 6. It should be read, The husbandman laboring first, must partake of the fruits, as appears by comparing it with Jam. 5:7. If we would be partakers of the fruits, we must labor; if we would gain the prize, we must run the race; we must do the will of God, before we receive the promises, for which reason we have need of patience, Heb. 10: 36.

Consider what I say, and the Lord give thee understanding in all things, v. 7. Observe, God gives understanding. The most intelligent men need more and more of this gift. If He who gave the revelation in the Word, does not give the understanding in the heart, we are nothing. Together with our prayers for others, that the Lord would give them understanding in all things, we must exhort and stir them up to consider what we say, for consideration is the way to understand, remember, and practise, what we hear or read.

V. 8—13. 1. To encourage Timothy in suffering, the apostle puts him in mind of the resurrection of Christ, v. 8. This is the great proof of his divine mission, and a great confirmation of the truth of the Christian religion; therefore the consideration of it should make us faithful to our Christian profession, and particularly encourage us in suffering for it. Let suffering saints remember this.

Observe, We are to look to Jesus the Author and Finisher of our faith, Heb. 12: 2. The incarnation and resurrection of Jesus Christ, heartily believed and rightly considered, will support a Christian under all sufferings in the present life.

II. Another thing to encourage him was, that he had Paul for an example, v. 9. Paul was a man who did good, and yet suffered as an evil-doer; we must not think it strange, in this world, if the best of men meet with the worst of treatment; but this was his comfort, that the Word of God is not bound. Persecuting powers may silence ministers, and restrain them, but they cannot hinder the operation of the Word of God upon men's hearts and consciences. This also might encourage Timothy.

Here we see the good apostle's treatment in the world; how he suffered trouble under pretence and color of an evil-doer, as Christ, John 18: 30. He suffered trouble unto bonds, and afterward resisted unto blood, striving against sin, Heb. 12: 2. Yet he endured for the elect's sake, v. 10. Observe, Good ministers should encourage themselves in the hardest services and sufferings, with this, that God will certainly bring good to his church, and benefit to his elect, out of them; that they may obtain the salvation which is in Christ Jesus. Next to our own salvation, we should be willing to do and suffer anything, to promote the salvation of others.

Observe, further, The elect are designed to obtain salvation, 1 Thess. 5:9. and this is in Christ Jesus, in Him as the Fountain, the Purchaser, and the Giver, of it; and it is accompanied with eternal glory; there is no salvation in Christ Jesus without it. Lastly, The sufferings of our apostle were for the elect's sake, for their confirmation and encouragement.

III. Another thing with which he encourages Timothy, is, the prospect of a future state.

1. Those who faithfully adhere to Christ, and to his truths and ways, whatever it costs them, will certainly have the advantage of it in another world, v. 11. If, in conformity to Christ, we be dead to this world, we shall go to live with Him in a better world, to be for ever with Him. Nay, though we be called to suffer for Him, we shall not lose by that. They who suffer for Christ on earth, shall reign with Christ in heaven, v. 12.

2. It is at our peril if we prove unfaithful to Him; If we deny Him, He also will deny us, Matt. 10: 33. And that man must needs be for ever miserable, whom Christ disowns at last.

This will certainly be the issue, whether we believe it or no, v. 13. He is faithful to his threatenings, faithful to his promises; neither one nor the other shall fail to the

V. 3.—7. Timothy was again called on to consider himself, as 'a good soldier of Christ.' (Notes, 1 Tim. 1:18—20. 6:11,12.) Having enlisted under his banner, he was bound to follow Him.—(4) Entangleth, &c.—It is plain from the apostle's own example, that ministers may, on some occasions, earn their bread by labor; but this widely differs from seeking to grow rich by trade, or such employments as engross the mind and time, and introduce them into such connexions, and involve them in so many pecuniary engagements, as greatly endanger their own characters, and the honor of the Gospel. (Marg. Ref. k—m.)—In the public games, also, the man who strove for mastery was not crowned victor, unless the contest had been managed according to the prescribed rules; it therefore behoved Timothy and his brethren, to regulate their diligence and earnestness by the Word of God, otherwise they could not expect the conqueror's crown. And as the husbandman must 'first labor,' before he partakes of the fruits of the field, so they must first diligently and patiently execute their ministry, before they received the gracious recompense. This is the most obvious meaning of the verse; but it may signify, that the laboring husbandman must first be supported by the fruits of the earth, or he cannot perform his work; nor can the office of the ministry be duly exercised, except by those who live by faith in Christ themselves, as well as preach Him to others. Timothy ought therefore well to consider these illustrations, and the Lord would give him understanding in all things pertaining to his work and circumstances.

(3.) Endure, &c. 'The hardships endured by Roman soldiers were very great. Josephus says, "a Roman foot-soldier is but very little different from a beast of burdea." Adam estimates the load they usually carried as amounting to 60 lbs. weight, besides their arms, which were very heavy.' HENRY, abr.—The commentators aptly compare 1 Tim. 1:1, 18, and 6:12. But away are the duties of the soldier, besides fighting; and when we take the admonition, e. 1:3. (be thou partaker with me, &c.) in conjunction with this, we shall see that the apostle here adverts to the labors of propagating as well as defending the Gospel.' BL.

(6.) The husbandman must first labor and then partake. So Doddr. (and others.) who remarks, also: 'it was entirely to the apostle's purpose to remind Timothy, that the labor of the husbandman must precede the harvest; but whether he was to receive these fruits first, was not the point in question.'

V. 8—13. Amidst all dangers and sufferings, it behoved Timothy to 'remember Jesus Christ,' the promised Savior, 'of the seed of David, who had been raised from the dead.' This, which is literal, seems the proper translation, for Timothy was not only called on to remember, and preach to others, the resurrection of Jesus, but all the sufferings which preceded this great event, his conduct under them, and the glorious termination of them, in his exaltation as our Prince and Savior. (Marg. Ref. l—v.—Notes, Heb. 12:2, 3.) This could not fail to suggest proper motives, and encouragements, to perseverance and constancy. S.

(8.) My gospel. 'It was reported by some that the gospel according to Luke, was commonly meant by Paul, when writing as concerning a gospel of his own, he saith, according to my gospel.' [Eusebius, in Macknight.] 'This, however, could not be his meaning, in every instance where he useth that expression; for we find it in some of his epistles, which were written before Luke's gospel was published.' See Rom. 2:16. 15:25.

(9.) 'The mention of bonds, as a malefactor, would imply the apostle's being bound hand and feet, in a close dungeon, a very different condition from that of his first imprisonment.' HENRY, abr.—But the Word of God is not bound. 'Many of my brethren are at liberty to preach publicly, though I am not; and that is my comfort and yours.' Ed.

(11.) 'Some refer this to the concluding clause of the former verse; but it seems much more reasonable to connect it with what follows, as, generally speaking, this phrase is introductory to the weighty sentence it is intended to confirm. Tillotson thinks, this was a celebrated saying among Christians, either derived by tradition from Christ, or some of the apostles, and it had so powerful a tendency to keep them steady to their religion, that it is no wonder it was in frequent use.' DODDR.

13 If we believe not, yet he abideth faithful: he cannot deny himself.

[Practical Observations.]

14 Of these things put them in remembrance, charging them before the Lord that they strive not about words to no profit, but to the subverting of the hearers.

15 Study to shew thyself approved unto God, a workman that needeth not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth.

16 But shun profane and vain babblings: for they will increase unto more ungodliness:

17 And their word will eat as doth a canker: of whom is Hymeneus and Philetus;

18 Who concerning the truth have erred, saying that the resurrection is past already: and overthrow the faith of some.

[Practical Observations.]

19 Nevertheless the foundation of God standeth sure, having this ground, no not the least jot or tittle of them.

Observe, (1.) Our being dead with Christ, precedes our living with Him, and is connected with it, the one is in order to the other; so our suffering for Him is the way to reign with Him, Matt. 19:28. (2.) This is a faithful saying, and may be depended on, and ought to be believed. But, (3.) If we deny Him, out of fear, or shame, or for the sake of some temporal advantage, He will deny and disown us; and will not deny Himself, but will continue faithful to his PRACT. OBS. V. 1—13. Both the falls of some, and the good examples of others, should excite us to 'be strong in the grace of Christ,' and zealous in his cause.—None ought to be chosen or appointed to the sacred ministry, who are not 'faithful men, and able to instruct others also;' and all concerned in this most important trust should be careful, to whom they commit the 'stewardship of the mysteries of Christ;' for if they wilfully, negligently, or partially choose or ordain improper persons, they will be condemned for it 'before many witnesses,' however they here concealed their motives, or excused their conduct. 1 Tim. 5:21, 22.—We should also labor in patience and hope, assured 'that in due season we shall reap, if we faint not,' without vainly expecting to receive our reward, till we have given proof of our persevering diligence. Gal. 6:6—10.—In all our hardships, conflicts, and temptations, we must 'remember the Lord Jesus,' and meditate daily on his sufferings, his resurrection, and his subsequent glory. And if 'the mind of Christ' be in us, we shall be willing 'to endure all things for the elect's sake,' and to promote the salvation and eternal glory of those chosen ones, for whom Christ willingly laid down his life.

PRACT. OBS. V. 14—18. Ministers must 'charge' their flocks 'before the Lord,' with great solemnity and earnestness, 'not to strive about words,' or the Shibboleths of a party, Judg. 12:1—7, which tend to no profit, but rather 'to the subverting of the hearers.' In performing this part of our duty, we shall be likely to give much offence; for eager controversy is exceedingly agreeable to the vitiated taste of the carnal mind, which loaths plain, practical instruction. We should there-(13.) If we believe not. 'If we are unfaithful. So I think it should be rendered; and so the words will farther imply, that, whatever we lose by our unfaithfulness, in whatever degree it appears, it is no argument of any unfaithfulness in Him; as his promises are made to faithful servants, and fair warning is given to persons of a different character.' DODDR.—'The unfaithfulness here spoken of, seems to have been, denying the Christian religion, in the times of persecution, in order to avoid suffering.' BLOOMF.—'He cannot deny Himself.' 'He cannot act contrary to his own nature; which consists in this, that it is true,—is essential truth. He may deny us; but He cannot deny Himself, cannot deny that He is Christ, and that the things He has taught us are true.—He cannot,—it is altogether foreign from Him.' ROSENM.

V. 14—18. Timothy was expressly required to remind Christians and ministers of the important practical truths before stated; and to 'charge them' most solemnly, 'as in the presence of the Lord,' not to strive and dispute about words, and those frivolous matters which the love of controversy magnified into important distinctions. These disputes could answer no good purpose; but, on the contrary, they tended to 'subvert the hearers,' perplexing them about empty speculations, feeding their self-conceit and contempt of others, and drawing them off from the simplicity of faith and obedience. (Marg. Ref. n—r.) In this expression [dividing the word] the apostle is supposed, by some, to allude to the skill, used by the priests and Levites, in cutting in pieces the victims, and dividing them according to the legal prescriptions, and by others to refer to the conduct of those, who carve for a large company, and are peculiarly careful that no one wants what is suitable for him.

V. 14—18. Having thus encouraged Timothy to suffer, he comes in the next place to direct him in his work.

I. He must make it his business, to edify those who were under his charge, to put them in remembrance of those things which they did already know; charging them that they strive not about words. Observe, Those that are disposed to strive, commonly strive about matters of very small moment, and to no profit. Strifes of words are very destructive to the things of God. If people did but consider, of what little use most of the controversies in religion are, they would not be so zealous in their strifes of words, drawing persons away from the great things of God, and occasioning unchristian heats and animosities, by which truth is often in danger of being lost.

Study to show thyself approved unto God, v. 15. Observe, The care of ministers must be, to approve themselves unto God, to be accepted of Him, and to show that they are so approved unto God. In order thereto, there must be constant care and industry; those who mind their business, and keep to their work, are workmen that need not be ashamed. And what is their work? It is rightly to divide the Word of truth. Not to invent a new Gospel, but rightly to divide the Gospel that is committed to their trust: to speak terror to those to whom terror belongs, comfort to whom comfort; to give every one their portion in due season, Matt. 24:25.

Observe here, 1. The Word which ministers preach, is the Word of truth, for the Author of it is the God of truth. 2. It requires great wisdom, study, and care, to divide this Word of truth rightly; Timothy must study in order to do this well.

II. He must take heed of that which would be a hindrance to him in his work, v. 16. The heretics, who boasted of their notions and their arguments, thought their performances such as might recommend themselves; but the apostle calls them profane and vain babblings; when once men take to be fond of such, they will increase unto more ungodliness; when errors or heresies come into the church, the infecting of one often proves the infecting of many, or the infecting of the same person with one error, often proves the infecting of him with many errors. The apostle mentions some who had lately advanced erroneous doctrines. He names them, by which he brands them, to their perpetual infamy, and warns all people against hearkening to them; they have erred concerning one of the fundamental articles of the Christian religion, which is truth. The resurrection of the dead is one of the great doctrines of Christ. Now see the subtlety of the serpent and the serpent's seed. They did not deny the resurrection, but put a corrupt interpretation on that true doctrine, saying, the resurrection is past already; that what Christ spake concerning the resurrection, is to be understood mystically and by way of allegory, that it must be meant of a spiritual resurrection only. It is true, there is a spiritual resurrection, but from thence to infer that there will not be a true and real resurrection of the body at the last day, is to dash one truth of Christ in pieces against another. By this they overthrew the faith of some, took them off from the belief of the resurrection of the dead; and if there be no resurrection of the dead, no future state, no recompense of our services and sufferings in another world, we are of all men the most miserable, 1 Cor. 15:19. What takes away the doctrine of a future state, overthrows the faith of Christians. The apostle had largely disproved this error, 1 Cor. 15, and therefore does not here enter into the arguments against it.

V. 19—21. Here, amid the errors and heresies that both infect and infest the church, we are both comforted and admonished.

It may be a great comfort to us, that the unbelief of men cannot make the promise of God of none effect. Though the faith of fore 'study to show ourselves approved unto God,' and to obtain his seal to our ministry; we should bestow pains to become skilful, as well as faithful preachers; 'workmen that need not be ashamed,' instructors, who 'know how rightly to divide the Word of truth,' and to give every man the portion which belongs to him, with close application to his heart and conscience. Mat. 24:45—51. This will lead us to a distance from 'profane and vain babblings, which continually increase to more ungodliness;' for many a specious error is allowed, without notice, to be privily brought in among professed Christians, which gradually eats like a gangrene, and destroys 'the power of godliness,' in an imperceptible manner. 1 Cor. 15:31—34. Gal. 2:1—5. 5:7—12. 2 Pet. 2:1—3.—Scarcely anything has done more mischief within the church, and among those who retain a regard for the Scriptures, than the manner of 'Hymeneus and Philetus,' in allegorizing away its plain doctrines and precepts, and so causing them to evaporate in some visionary, mystical notion. This some call spiritualizing; but it well answers the purpose of deceivers, though often used by well meaning, injudicious persons. It excites the wonder of the ignorant, and the disgust of rational men; and thus it takes off the one from the substantial part of religion, to amuse themselves with fancies, and it increases the prejudices of the other against evangelical truth. Nothing can be so crude, so foolish, or so evidently erroneous, but it will subvert the temporary faith of some professors of the Gospel; for of all the numberless delusions, which have been or may be invented, there is not one, but is more congenial to the pride and lusts of men, than the simple truths of the Holy Scriptures. (Note, John, 8:41—47.) SCOTT.

(15.) Rightly dividing, &c. 'Let him pass over nothing that should be said, let him add nothing of his own; let him mutilate, tear in pieces, and wrest nothing; finally, let him diligently consider, what the hearers are capable of receiving, and what conduces to edification.' BEZA. SC. (15.) Rightly dividing. Some think, (as above,) the allusion is to the Jewish priest or Levite, in dissecting the victim, and separating aright the parts; others, as DODDR. and T. H. HORNE, to the ploughman, in making a straight and even furrow.

V. 19. Some have interpreted this of the doctrine of the resurrection, and others of election; but Christ Himself, or the promise of eternal life to every one who believeth in Him, is doubtless 'the Foundation of God,' which the apostle meant. According to the ancient custom, of sealing the foundation stones of magnificent structures, and en-seal, The Lord <sup>z</sup> knoweth them that are his. . . And, Let <sup>a</sup> every one that nameth the name of Christ depart from iniquity.

20 But in a great house there are not only vessels <sup>b</sup> of gold and of silver, but also of wood and of earth; and some to honor, and some to dishonor.

21 If <sup>c</sup> a man therefore purge himself from these, he shall be a vessel unto honor, sanctified, and meet for the master's use, and prepared <sup>d</sup> unto every good work.

22 Flee <sup>e</sup> also youthful lusts: but follow righteousness, faith, charity, peace, with them that call <sup>f</sup> on the Lord out of a pure heart.

23 But foolish and unlearned questions <sup>g</sup> avoid, knowing that they do gender strifes.

24 And the servant of the Lord must not strive; but be gentle unto all men, apt to teach, <sup>h</sup> patient, some be overthrown, yet the foundation of God standeth sure, v. 19. It is not possible they should deceive the elect. Or it may be meant of the truth itself, which they impugn; that stands firm. The prophets and apostles, that is; the doctrines of the Old and New Test. are still firm. The motto of the seal by which they are ratified is, on one side, The Lord knoweth them that are his.

25 In meekness <sup>i</sup> instructing those that oppose themselves; if God <sup>k</sup> peradventure will give them repentance to the acknowledging <sup>l</sup> of the truth;

26 And <sup>m</sup> that they may recover themselves out of the snare <sup>n</sup> of the devil, who are <sup>o</sup> taken captive by him at his will.

PRACT. OBS. V. 19—26. Amidst all heresies, schisms, and apostasies, 'the Foundation of the Lord standeth sure.' Secure and happy are they who build on it by an obedient faith! These are the 'vessels of gold and silver,' which the Lord has 'before prepared unto glory,' whom He has 'sanctified, and made meet for his own use, and ready for every good work;' and when 'the vessels of dishonor' shall be consigned to destruction, these will be 'filled with all the fulness of God.' Let us then, in dependence on the promises of God, and diligent attendance on every mean of grace, 'cleanse ourselves from all filthiness of flesh and spirit;' let young Christians and ministers 'see youthful lusts;' let all 'follow after righteousness, faith, love, peace, with all them that call on the Lord out of a pure heart;' and let the frequent repetitions of the apostle, teach us the immense importance of avoiding foolish, curious, and frivolous questions, and whatever can produce strifes and angry controversies. Alas! His predilection for controversy, both in teachers and hearers of the Gospel, is one grand hindrance to our 'recovering sinners out of the snare of the devil;' for, to exasperate opposers is by no means the way to convince them.—The artful enemy of our souls knows how to bait his hook and spread his net for men, according to their different tastes, humors, and situations. They do not suspect graving some inscription on them; this mystical Foundation had the seal of God, and a double inscription, upon it. 'The Lord knoweth them that are his.' This is supposed, by some, to refer to the words of Moses, concerning Aaron and himself, in the rebellion of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram. Num. 16:5.

(19.) Foundation. 'The religion which has God for its Author. This foundation stands firm. The sense is; certain false teachers would overthrow the faith of some, but the whole edifice, the whole church, they can never overthrow, Mat. 16:18. And this best agrees (respondet) with what follows, having this seal, &c.' ROSENA.—So Bloomfield; except that he thinks the doctrine of the resurrection is particularly had in view. Ep.—Seal. 'Inscription. The expression is here used, with peculiar propriety, in allusion to the custom of engraving on stones, laid in the foundation of buildings, the names of persons by whom, and the purposes for which, the structure is raised. Nothing can have a greater tendency to encourage the hope, and at the same time engage the obedience of Christians, than this double inscription.' DODD.

V. 20—22. Still further to show, that the heresies and apostasies of many professed Christians, were entirely consistent with the engagements of God by his covenant to true believers, the apostle observed, that in a great house, the habitation of some wealthy person, there were not only 'vessels of gold and of silver,' but others of baser materials;

This is for our comfort: the Lord knows them that are his; knows them, that is, owns them; so knows them, that He will never lose them, Ps. 1:6. On the other side, the motto speaks our duty; Let every one that nameth the name of Christ depart from iniquity.

Those who would have the comfort of the privilege, must make conscience of the duty. If the name of Christ be called upon us, we must depart from iniquity, else He will not own us, Mat. 7:22. Observe, Though the faith of some is overthrown, yet others keep their integrity, and hold it fast, v. 20. If some in that great house, the church of Christ, are like vessels of wood and earth, vessels of dishonor, yet some, at the same time, are vessels of honor, vessels of gold and silver, sanctified and meet for the Master's use. When discouraged by the badness of some, we must encourage ourselves by the consideration of the goodness of others. Now we should see to it that we be vessels of honor: we must purge ourselves from these corrupt opinions, that we may be sanctified for our Master's use.

Observe, Some dishonor the church by their corrupt opinions and wicked lives; others honor and credit it by their exemplary conversation. A man must purge himself from these before he can be a vessel of honor, or meet for his Master's use. Sanctification in the heart is our preparation for every good work. The tree must be made good, then the fruit will be good.

V. 22—26. 1. Timothy must beware of youthful lusts, v. 22. though holy and very much mortified to the world, yet Paul thought it necessary to caution him against youthful lusts. The lusts of the flesh are youthful lusts, which young people must carefully watch against, and the best must not be secure. He prescribes an excellent remedy against youthful lusts; Follow righteousness, faith, charity, peace, &c. Observe,

1. Youthful lusts are very dangerous, for which reason even hopeful young people should be warned of them, for they war against the soul, 1 Pet. 2:11. 2. The exciting of our graces will be the extinguishing of our corruptions. Righteousness, and faith, and love, will be excellent antidotes against youthful lusts. Holy love will cure impure lust. Follow peace with them that call on the Lord. The keeping up of the communion of saints, will take us off from all fellowship with unfruitful works of darkness. See the character of Christians; they are such as call on the Lord Jesus Christ, out of a pure heart. Observe, Christ is to be prayed to. It is the character of all Christians; that they call upon Him; but our prayers to God and Christ are not acceptable or successful, except they come out of a pure heart.

II. He cautions him against contention, and, to prevent that, v. 23. cautions him against foolish and unlearned questions, that tend to no benefit, strifes of words. It is very remarkable how often, and with what seriousness, the apostle cautions Timothy against disputes in religion; which surely was not without some such design as this, to show us that religion consists more in believing and practising what God requires, than in subtle disputes.

Now the servant of the Lord must not strive, v. 24. Nothing worse becomes the servant of the Lord Jesus, (who Himself did not strive or cry, Mat. 12:19. but was a pattern of meekness, and mildness, and gentleness to all,) than strife and contention.

The servant of the Lord must be gentle to all men, and thereby show that he is himself subject to the commanding power of that holy religion which he is employed in preaching and propagating; apt to teach. Those are unapt to teach, who are apt to strive, and are fierce and froward. Ministers must be patient, bearing with evil, and in meekness instructing, v. 25. not only those who subject themselves, but those who oppose themselves. Observe,

Instruction is the scripture-method of dealing with the erroneous, which is more likely to convince them of their errors than fire and fagot; he does not bid us kill their bodies, under pretence of saving their souls. Such as oppose themselves, are to be instructed in meekness, for our Lord is meek and lowly, Mat. 11:29. and this agrees well with the character of the servant of the Lord, v. 24.

This is the way to convey truth in its light and power, and to overcome evil with good, Rom. 12:21. That which ministers must have in their eyes, in instructing those who oppose themselves, must be their recovery; the deception, till they have swallowed the bait, or are caught in the net; then they are 'taken captive by him at his will,' and they sometimes appear under a kind of necessity of proceeding in their ruinous courses. Yet some are 'recovered out of the snare;' for when 'God gives them repentance,' they come to themselves, they 'acknowledge the truth,' they confess their guilt; they cry for mercy and deliverance, they obtain pardon and grace; they are set at liberty, and 'walk in newness of life;' and Satan can never more regain his dominion over them. There is no 'peradventure,' in respect of the readiness of God to pardon those who do repent, but we cannot tell whether He will 'give repentance' to those who still continue to oppose his will; yet, as He sometimes grants it even to the most obstinate of his enemies, it is our duty to hope and pray for them, and 'in meekness to instruct them,' as long as we have the opportunity. And if any feel themselves 'taken captive by Satan,' and long for deliverance; let them remember, that they can never 'recover themselves out of the snare of the devil,' except by 'acknowledging the truth of God' in the Gospel: that this they never can do without repentance; that repentance is the gift of God; and finally, that they must ask it of Him by earnest, persevering prayer.

SCOTT. The former for honorable, and the other for meaner uses. In like manner, in the visible church, not only true Christians and faithful ministers were found, as willing instruments in the honorable work of glorifying God, and promoting the good of men, but persons also of a different character, whose hypocrisy and iniquity were overruled, contrary to their intentions, to fulfil his righteous purposes, though to their own ruin and 'everlasting contempt.' (Notes, Mat. 13:24—30, 36—43, 47—50, 22:11—14, 25:1—4. Jn. 15:2, 6—8. 1 Cor. 11:17—22. 1 Jn. 2:18, 19.) If then any man, but especially a minister of the Gospel, carefully 'purified himself from these' evil things, and simply adhered to the truth and will of God, he would be 'a vessel of honor, sanctified and prepared' for the service of Christ, and ready to be his willing instrument 'in every good work.'

(22.) Youthful lusts. 'Sensual pleasure, or rashness, contention, pride, and vainglory.' DODD.—The age at which Timothy now was (about 38) is commonly remarked to be the time of life when men are most susceptible of ambition, pride, &c. and less of sensual pleasure. Ep. V. 23—26. The apostle saw it necessary again to caution his beloved Timothy, against 'foolish and unlearned questions;' such curious, presumptuous, or useless questions, as often appear to spring from a depth of discernment, reflection, and erudition; but which in fact are suggested by folly, and a want of solid acquaintance with the majesty of

CHAP. III.

1 He adviseth him of the times to come, 6 describeth the enemies of the truth, 10 propoundeth unto him his own example, 16 and commendeth the Holy Scriptures.

THIS know also, that <sup>a</sup> in the last days perilous times shall come.

If God, peradventure, will give them repentance to the acknowledging of the truth. Observe,

Repentance is God's gift, a gift with a peradventure, in the case of those who oppose themselves ; and, therefore, though we are not to despair of the grace of God, yet we must take heed of presuming on it. To the acknowledging of the truth. The same God who gives us the discovery of the truth, does, by his grace, bring us to the acknowledging of it, otherwise our hearts would continue in rebellion against it. Thus sinners recover themselves out of the snare of the devil. And see here, v. 26. the misery of sinners, and the happiness of those who repent ; sinners are in the snare of the devil, as fishes taken in an evil net, and as birds caught in a snare ; they are slaves to him who is but a slave and vassal himself.

Those who repent are as a bird escaped out of the snare ; the snare is broken, and they are free ; and the greater the danger, the greater the deliverance. When sinners repent, they who before were led captive by the devil at his will, come to be led into the glorious liberty of the children of God, and have their wills melted into the will of the Lord Jesus. The good Lord recover us all out of the snare !

CHAP. III. V. 1-5. Timothy must not think it strange, if there were in the church bad men ; for the net of the Gospel was to enclose both good fish and bad, Mat. 13: 47, 48. and Christ had foretold, Mat. 24. that there would come seducers.

Even in gold ore there will be dross, and a great deal of chaff among the wheat when it lies on the floor. Timothy must know that, in the last days, v. 1. in gospel-times, there would come perilous times, difficult times ; perilous times for such as have the form of godliness, v. 5. shall be corrupt and wicked, and do great damage to the church. Note, Sin makes the times perilous. A general corruption of manners, and of the tempers of men, makes the times dangerous, hard to keep our integrity in.

The coming of perilous times is an evidence of the truth of scripture-predictions ; this we are all concerned to know, believe, and consider, that we may not be surprised when we see the times perilous ; This know also.

Then he tells Timothy what would be the occasion of making these times perilous, or what shall be the marks and signs, whereby these times may be known, v. 2. and following verses.

1. Self-love will make the times perilous ; it is meant of an irregular, sinful self-love. Men love their carnal selves better than their spiritual selves ; love to gratify their own lusts, and make provision for them, more than to please God and do their duty. Instead of Christian charity, which takes care for the good of others, they will mind themselves only, and prefer their own gratification before the church's edification.

2. Covetousness. When every man is for what he can get, and keeping what he has, this makes men dangerous to one another.

3. Pride and vainglory make the times perilous. When men, being proud of themselves, are boasters before men whom they despise, and blasphemers of God, and of his name ; when men do not fear God, they will not regard man, and so vice versa.

4. When children are disobedient to their parents, and break through both in duty and gratitude, and frequently in interest, that makes the times perilous ; for what wickedness will they stick at, who will abuse their own parents, and rebel against them ?

5. Unthankfulness and unholiness make the times perilous, and commonly go together. Why are men unholy, and without the fear of God, but that they are unthankful for the mercies of God ? Unthankful, and impure, defiled with fleshly lusts ; we abuse God's gifts, if we make them the food and fuel of our lusts.

6. The times are perilous when men will not be held by the bonds either of nature or common honesty, v. 3. See what a corruption of nature sin is ; how it deprives men even of that which nature has implanted in them for the support of their own kind. Those who will not be bound by natural affection, no marvel that they will not be bound by the most solemn leagues and covenants. Again, the times are perilous when men are false accusers, and have no regard to the good name of others, or to the religious obligations of an oath, but think themselves at liberty to say and do what they please, Ps. 12: 4.

7. When men have no government of themselves, their appetites, and passions ; and therefore are like a city that is broken down, and are soon fired, on the least provocation.

8. When that which is good, and ought to be honored, is generally despised, and looked upon with contempt ; as persecutors look on good people, though more excellent than their neighbors.

9. When men are generally treacherous, wilful, and haughty, v. 4. when men are traitors, heady, high-minded. Our Savior has foretold, that the brother shall betray the brother to death, and the father the son, Mat. 10: 21. and those are the worst sort of traitors. When men are petulant and puffed up, carrying it scornfully to all about them, and when this temper generally prevails, then the times are perilous.

10. When men are generally lovers of pleasure, more than lovers of God. When there are more epicures than true Christians, then the times are bad indeed ; that is a carnal mind, and full of enmity against Him,

God, with man's true condition and character, and with other subjects of the highest importance. . . . Whatever Jewish or Gentile disputers did, 'the servant of the Lord must not strive' in this manner, or with such weapons. 2 Cor. 10:1-6.

(26.) That they may recover, &c.] Adolescentia cupiditates defervissent. 'The word properly signifies, to awake from a deep sleep, or from a fit of intoxication, and refers to an artifice of fowlers, to scatter seeds impregnated with some drugs, intended to lay birds asleep, that they might [may?] draw the net over them with the greater security.' Doddr. from Elser.

NOTES. CHAP. III. V. 1-5. The apostle foresaw, and foretold to Timothy, and so to the church in that and in all future generations, that 'in the last days,' or under the Christian dispensation, chiefly in the latter ages, 'perilous' or grievous times would arrive, in which it would be extremely difficult for Christians to escape the contagion of bad examples and corrupt principles, or for ministers to preach the unadulterated truth of the Gospel ; and in which those who retained their integrity would be exposed to the hatred and persecution of their professed brethren.—We need not suppose, that the same individuals would answer to every part of this description ; but men would arise, called Christians, who would be guilty of these vices, some being more notorious in one way, and some in another, even as the heathens were, and differing from them only in name. (Note, Rom. 1:28-32.)—Such persons have always been found within the visible church, in every place, and through all succeeding ages hitherto, and some even among those who have most zealously contended for the peculiar doctrines of the Gospel. Many such were soon perceived in the primitive church, but things grew 'worse and worse' (13), till the grand antichristian apostasy was produced. The selfishness, enormous covetousness, 'high swelling words of vanity,' and blasphemous claims and titles of the church of Rome, have generally been supposed to be pointed at, in an especial manner. 2 Thes. 2:3-12. The practice of that church, in counselling children to 'disobey their parents,' and parents to withdraw their natural affection from their children, in order the more readily to replenish religious houses with monks and nuns ; their disregard of the most solemn leagues and covenants, and want of all faith and mercy towards those whom they falsely accused of heresy, their enmity against true Christians, the licentiousness countenanced by indulgencies and dispensations, their fierce persecutions, their arrogant conduct towards princes and emperors, have certainly exceeded every other corruption of Christianity which has yet appeared ; nevertheless, they have always maintained, and been very exact and pompous in their 'form of godliness.'—It is self-evident, that the apostle foretells what the state of things would be in the visible church, and among the professors and ministers of Christianity. No doubt, the Jews, just before the destruction of Jerusalem, answered in many things to the description here given, and so do numbers of nominal protestant Christians at this day. There was, however, no occasion to warn Timothy to 'turn away from' persecuting Jews ; but 'the mystery of iniquity was already working,' and it was necessary for faithful ministers to protest against it, in the most decided manner. (3) Without natural affection.] 'The Roman clergy, being forbidden to marry, can neither have wives nor children openly ; so they are without the affections natural to mankind ; at least they dare not avow them.' Mackn. False accusers.] The persons intended are the ministers, and as it were the mouth of the grand 'accuser of the brethren,' and the successors of the traitor Judas. Turn away.] 'Shun with decision, and marked aversion.' Here only. Sc.

(2.) Men shall be, &c.] 'The word men includes both teachers and people.' Mackn.—'He speaks only of Christians.' Bloomr.—'I choose to interpret the words of those who not only professed Christianity, but pretended to teach it.' Donn.—who, followed by Bloomfield, refers to Vitringa, as proving that there was a great alteration in the face of the Christian church, between the time of Nero and Trajan, within which period, he [Vitringa] apprehends great numbers of professors to have departed from the strictness of Christian morals, as well as the purity of the faith.—Mackn. understands the character given of these men here, and onward through v. 4. as descriptive of 'the Romish clergy.'—Lovers of their own selves.] Yet was ever a person excommunicated from the church for selfishness ? That modern civilization is founded too much on the lower, animal, or selfish propensities, is an obvious truth, and Paul says, v. 12. they that live godly in Christ Jesus shall suffer more or less of persecution in the world ; a truth which will also be acknowledged by all who have attempted to carry out Christ's principles in everything ;—though there is a sort of half-way covenant, an expediency morality, a jesuitical smoothness, in which some Christians contrive to slip along easily, remaining, to spectators, very good friends both of God and mammon. Examined however more closely, their whole conduct will be seen to be based on a pennywise selfishness, concealed perhaps even to themselves. And indeed, 'much of the honorable practice of the world, [they love and imitate.] rests on the substratum of selfishness ; society is held together in the exercise of its relative virtues, mainly by the tie of reciprocal advantage ; that a man's own interest bound him to all those average equities which obtained in the neighborhood around him ; and in which, if he proved himself to be glaringly deficient, he would be abandoned by the respect, and the confidence, and the good will, of the people with whom he had to do. . . . And as even the homage rendered to integrity in the world, is due to the operation of selfishness . . . so man is ever prone to estimate the enormity

6 For of this sort are they <sup>g</sup> which creep into houses, and lead captive silly women laden with sins, led away with divers lusts,

7 Ever learning, and never able to come to the knowledge of the truth.

8 Now as Jannes and <sup>h</sup> Jambres withstood Moses, so do these also resist the truth: men <sup>i</sup> of corrupt minds, <sup>j</sup> reprobate concerning the faith.

which prefers anything before Him, especially such a sordid thing as carnal pleasure is.

11. All this notwithstanding, all these have the form of godliness, v. 5. are called by the Christian name, baptized into the Christian faith, make a show of religion; but, how plausible soever their form of godliness is, they deny the power of it.

Observe, here, (1.) Men may be very bad and wicked, under a profession of religion; they may be lovers of themselves, &c. yet have a form of godliness. (2.) A form of godliness is a very different thing from the power of it; men may have the one, and be wholly destitute of the other; yea, they deny it, at least practically, in their lives. (3.) From such, good Christians must withdraw themselves.

V. 6—9. Here Paul warns Timothy to take heed of certain seducers.

1. He shows how industrious they were to make proselytes, v. 6. they applied them-

PRACT. OBS. V. 1—9. The descent of a stone to the earth is not more natural, than fallen men's propensity to turn away from God; so that, whatever means are used to bring them to love Him and one another, the end will not be attained unless by the continual influence of his new-creating Spirit.—We need not, therefore, wonder, that, even 'in the last days,' under the fullest external revelation, which God has made to man, 'perilous times soon came;' and professed Christians became 'lovers of themselves,' lovers of money, of honor, 'and of pleasure, rather than lovers of God.' Our land at this day abounds with such nominal disciples of Christ, as are here described. Some are selfish and covetous; others proud boasters and blasphemers; many regardless of their duty to parents or children, relatives and rulers, being 'unthankful and unholy.' Very many are slanderous, treacherous, intemperate, licentious, profligate, 'fierce,' implacable, 'despisers of good men, traitors, heady, high-minded;' and who can number those, 'who are lovers of pleasure rather than lovers of God?' Can any man seriously think, that these crimes are less abominable in men called Christians, than they were in heathens? Can any one doubt, but that they will be more terribly punished? In fact, in proportion to the zeal and exactness, with which 'the form of godliness' is retained, when 'the power of it' is denied, the more criminal and dangerous men become, and the more should they be avoided and protested against. For when any form or notion of religion is made a cloak, or an excuse, or a com-

of injustice by the degree in which he suffers from it . . . or to measure guilt by gain, to rate the criminality of injustice by the amount of its appropriations, making it an affair of product, rather than principle. It is the taint of selfishness, then, which has so marred and corrupted the moral sensibility of our world.' CHALMERS. Comp. note, Col. 3:5. Ed.

V. 6. Creep, &c. 'Insinuate themselves.' DONDR.—'The term may be best rendered, wind their way into, wriggle themselves into.—Though creep and insinuate are proper enough.' BLOOMF.—Silly women. 'Inconsiderable, of low rank, and mean understandings, yet easily inflamed with passionate zeal.' DONDR.—Heinr., in Bloomf., thinks, it applies chiefly to rich elderly women, who, after having past a life of sin, wished to attain something that should allay the stings of conscience, and reconcile them to themselves. ID.

V. 8. Jannes and Jambres. 'It is related in the Gemara, that these were those Egyptian magicians, who withstood Moses by their cunning [490] selves to particular persons, visited them in their houses, not daring to appear openly; for they that do evil, hate the light, John 3:20. And see what sort of people they made proselytes of; weak, silly women; and wicked, laden with sins, and led away with divers lusts; a foolish head and a filthy heart make persons, especially women, an easy prey to seducers.

2. He shows how far they were from coming to the knowledge of the truth, though they pretend to be ever learning, v. 7. In one sense we must all be ever learning, growing in knowledge, following on to know the Lord, pressing forward; but these were skeptics, giddy and unstable, who were forward to imbibe every new notion, under pretence of advancement in knowledge, but never came to a right understanding of the truth as it is in Jesus.

3. He foretells the certain stop that should be put to their progress, v. 8, 9. comparing them to the Egyptian magicians who withstood Moses; their names are not met with in the Old Test. yet are found in some old Jewish writers. Moses came with a divine commission, to fetch Israel out of Egypt; these magicians opposed him, and thus those heretics resisted the truth, and, like them, were men of corrupt minds: men who had their understandings perverted, biassed, and prejudiced against the truth, and reprobate concerning the faith, very far from being true Christians; but they shall proceed no further; or not much further, as some read it. Observe,

Seducers seek for corners, and love obscurity; attack those least able to defend themselves, and in all ages are much alike, their characters the same, men of corrupt minds, &c. and their conduct much the same; they resist the truth, as Jannes and Jambres withstood Moses; and they will be alike in their disappointment.

Those who resist the truth are guilty of folly, yea, of egregious folly; for, though the spirit of error may be let loose for a time, God has it in a chain. Satan can deceive the nations and the churches no further and no longer than God will permit him; their folly shall be manifest; it shall appear that they are impostors, and every man shall abandon them.

V. 10—13. Here the apostle, to confirm Timothy in that way wherein he walked,

I. Sets before him his own example, which

Timothy had been an eyewitness of, having long attended Paul, v. 10. Timothy had known Paul,

1. In the doctrine he preached. Paul kept back nothing from his hearers, but declared to them the whole counsel of God, Acts 20:27. so that if it were not their own fault, they might fully know it.

2. In his conversation; his doctrine and manner of life; his manner of life was of a piece with his doctrine. Those ministers [if their doctrine is true] are likely to do good, and leave lasting fruits of their labors, whose manner of life agrees with their doctrine; as, on the contrary, those cannot expect to profit the people at all; that preach well and live ill.

3. Timothy fully knew the great thing Paul had in view, both in his preaching and in his conversation, his purpose; he fully knew Paul's good character, for he gave proofs of his faith, that is, of his integrity and fidelity, or his faith in Christ, his faith concerning another world, by which Paul lived, his long-suffering toward the churches to which he preached, and over which he presided, his charity toward all men, and his patience. These were graces Paul was eminent for, and Timothy knew it.

4. He knew he had suffered ill for doing well, v. 11. knew what care God had taken of him, and how the Lord had delivered him. When we know the afflictions of good people but in part, they are a temptation to us to decline the cause they suffer for; but when we fully know the afflictions, not only how they suffer, but how they are supported and comforted under their sufferings; then, instead of being discouraged, we shall be animated by them; especially considering that we are told before, that all must count on such things, v. 12. who will live godly in Christ Jesus, that is, according to the strict rules of the Christian religion.

The apostle's life was very exemplary for three things; for his doctrine, which was according to the will of God; for his life, which was agreeable to his doctrine; and for his persecutions and sufferings. Though his life was a life of great usefulness, yet it was a life of great sufferings, in which none, I believe, came nearer to their great Master. Here he mentions his persecutions and afflictions at Antioch, at Iconium, at Lystra, beside what he suffered elsewhere. The apostle mentions the Lord's delivering him out penetration for wilful transgressions of the divine law, the danger becomes greater, than from men who openly cast off all regard to God. Hypocrisy, superstition, enthusiasm, and antinomianism, are infectious beyond other mental maladies; the poisonous draught is more dangerous, when so mingled as to resemble some valuable medicine, and 'a wolf in sheep's clothing,' is most dreadful to the unsuspecting flock. (Notes, Mat. 7:13—20.) Of this genus, (which is divided into various species, popish and protestant, ancient and modern, learned and unlearned,) there have ever been artful men, who have insinuated themselves, by pompous or plausible pretensions and flatteries, into the favor and confidence of the weakest, most credulous, most ignorant, and imaginative of the human species, and who have taken them captive, by soothing them into quietness, 'when laden with sins, and led away with divers lusts.' Those weak and deluded persons, who want a safe and comfortable religion, without self-denial, humiliation, and mortification of their lusts, 'are ever learning, and never able to come to the knowledge of the truth,' and readily fall in with artful and interested deceivers of any description. But, though it is grievous to perceive, that 'evil men and seducers grow worse and worse, deceiving and being deceived;' we may yet rejoice that they cannot exceed their limits; that they cannot fatally delude the upright believer, and that, at length, 'their folly will be made manifest to all men,' as that of their predecessors, during a long succession of ages, has uniformly been. V. 10—12. As a contrast to the base spirit of the deceivers before mentioned, the apostle reminded Timothy of his own conduct and industry.—It is highly probable, that Timothy was converted to Christianity, during the apostle's first progress through the cities of Asia Minor, and that he was an eyewitness of Paul's sufferings at that time. This satisfactorily accounts for his mentioning the persecutions he endured at Antioch, Iconium, and Lystra, rather than more recent ones which Timothy had not witnessed.—Antioch in Pisidia is evidently meant. Acts 13:49—52. 14:5—7, 19, 20. 16:1—3.—Indeed, it was a general rule, that if any man was determined to live a godly life, in dependence on the atonement and grace of the Lord Jesus, and according to his precepts, he would certainly be exposed to persecution. of all, for Timothy's and our encouragement under sufferings. We have also the practice and treatment of true Christians; they live godly in Jesus Christ, that is their practice; and they shall suffer persecution, that is the usage they must expect in this world.

II. He warns Timothy of the fatal end of seducers, as a reason why he should stick close to the truth as it is in Jesus, v. 13. Observe, As good men, by the grace of God, grow better and better, so bad men, through the subtlety of Satan, and the power of their own corruptions, grow worse and PRACT. OBS. V. 10—17. In order to escape and expose every seduction, we ought to get well acquainted with the doctrine and example of the apostle, and to copy his 'manner of life,' his 'purpose, faith, long-suffering, charity, and patience.' Let us then frequently reflect on his persecutions, supports, and deliverances; let us count our cost, and know assuredly, that, 'if any man determine to live godly in Christ Jesus, he must suffer persecution' in one way or other, as far as Providence will permit the enmity of men's hearts to break forth against him. Let us 'continue in the things which we have learned,' and professed to believe; endeavoring to get further acquaintance with 'the Holy Scriptures, which are able to make us wise unto salvation, by faith in Jesus Christ,' who is the principal Subject both of the Old and New Test. And let us learn to reverence the whole Bible, as every sentence in it was 'given by inspiration from God,' and all religious error springs from ignorance, perversion, or misunderstanding of the Scriptures. The way therefore to oppose error, is by promoting the solid knowledge of liness,' without any direct connexion with the doctrine of faith in a crucified Savior, or a profession of that faith, without the example of a godly life, might be endured and tolerated; but the open profession of 'the truth as it is in Jesus,' and a resolute attention to all the duties of vital godliness, would excite the scorn and enmity of mankind, nor could any abilities, wisdom, amiability, or beneficence, secure a man from all the effects of their persecuting animosity. SCOTT.

V. 13. Instead of matters taking a more favorable turn, the apostle predicted, that 'wicked men and seducing teachers' would grow more and more subtle, daring, callous, malicious, cruel, covetous, and ambitious; deceiving others, and being themselves deceived, by their own delusions, and by Satan's wiles. Ez. 14:9—11.—The history of the Christian church, through all the subsequent ages, forms an awful demonstration, that he 'spoke as he was moved by the Holy Spirit;' so that all the declamations of infidels against the impostures, persecutions, wars, and massacres, occasioned by Christianity, are only so many attestations to the truth of the religion contained in the Holy Scriptures, and in the profession and lives of a remnant through every age, and they bear against nothing, but that spurious Christianity, which was long before predicted and condemned by the Spirit of prophecy.—The original word for 'seducers,' signifies magicians, or enchanters, such as Jaanes and Jambres had been; that is, men who, by lying pretences to miraculous powers, opposed that Gospel, which had been confrmed by real and indisputable miracles. 6—9. Now it scarcely admits of a doubt, what company of men, since the apostle's days, have most exactly answered this description. 2 Thes. 2:3—12. Rev. 13:11—17. In.

(13.) 'The scope of the apostle is this: v. 12. he speaks for the warning, and in some measure, comfort of all true Christians, of all ages. Here he speaks further for their comfort, by checking that spirit of murmuring, which even the righteous are too apt to fall into, on comparing their own afflictions with the seeming happiness of the wicked. To which the answer is, that this world is a scene of trial; and moreover, that the wicked do in reality deceive themselves, when they deceive others, and will suffer what they inflict.' BLOOMER.

V. 14—17. The apostle, applying what he had before stated, called on Timothy diligently to maintain and persevere in the profession and preaching of that doctrine, which he had learned and assuredly believed, worse. Those who deceive others, do but deceive themselves; those who draw others into error, run themselves into more and more mistakes, and they will find it so at last, to their cost.

V. 14—17. He directs him to keep close to a good education, and particularly to what he had learned out of the Holy Scriptures, v. 14, 15. Note, It is not enough to learn what is good, but we must continue in it, and persevere in it unto the end. John 8:31.

We ought not to continue in any errors and mistakes we may have been led into, in our childhood and youth, but this makes nothing against our continuing in those things which the Holy Scriptures plainly assert, and which he that runs may read.

If Timothy would adhere to the truth as he had been taught it, that would arm him against the snares and insinuations of seducers. It is a great happiness to know the certainty of the things wherin we have been instructed, Luke 1:4. and this Timothy was assured of. What we have learned, we must labor to be more and more assured of; certainty in religion is of great importance and advantage; Knowing,

1. That thou hast had good teachers; consider of whom thou hast learned them; not of evil men and seducers, but good persons, [of thy grandmother Lois, and thy mother Eunice.]

II. He knew, especially, the firm foundation on which he had built, namely, that of the Scripture, v. 15. [which he had been taught from his childhood.]

Observe, Those who would acquaint themselves with the things of God, and be assured of them, must know the Holy Scriptures, for those are the summary of divine revelation. Observe, It is a great happiness to know the Holy Scriptures from our childhood: and children should betimes get the knowledge of the Scriptures. The Scriptures are holy; they came from the holy God, were delivered by holy men, contain holy precepts, treat of holy things, and were designed to make us holy, and to lead us in the way of holiness to happiness; being called the Holy Scriptures, they are by that distinguished from profane writings of all sorts, and from those that only treat of morality, and common justice and honesty, but do not meddle with holiness. If we would know the Holy Scriptures, we must read and search them daily, as the noble Bereans did, Acts 17: 11.

Now here observe, 1. The excellency of the Scripture. It is given by inspiration of God, v. 16. and therefore is his Word. The same Spirit that breathed reason into us, breathes revelation among us. That the Scripture was given by inspiration of God, appears by the majesty of its style; from the truth, purity, and sublimity, of its doctrines; from the harmony of its several parts; from its power and efficacy on multitudes that converse with it; from the accomplishment of many prophecies relating to things beyond all human foresight; and from the uncontrollable miracles that were wrought in proof of its divine original, Heb. 2: 4.

2. Its use to us.

(1.) It is able to make us wise to salvation; that is, It is a sure guide in our way to eternal life. Note, Those are wise indeed, who are wise to salvation. Observe, The Scriptures are able to make us wise to salvation through faith, not otherwise, Heb. 4: 2. For if we do not believe their truth and goodness, they will do us no good.

(2.) It is profitable to us for all the purposes of the Christian life, for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness. It answers all the ends of divine revelation.

the Word of truth, especially by the faithful preaching of the Gospel; and the greatest kindness which we can do our children, is to bring them early acquainted with the Bible. 'For it is evident, that the pious endeavors of Lois and Eunice, in bringing young Timothy acquainted with the Holy Scriptures, laid the foundation of all his subsequent eminence and usefulness, in which he was inferior to none but the apostles. It is probable, that, while they were teaching the child to read, and treasure up in his memory "the Oracles of God," they little thought what a harvest in future life would spring from the seed thus sown. But the Scripture warrants high expectations in this respect; and it may fairly be said, that the education of women in useful knowledge and genuine piety, in order that they might be qualified and disposed to instil good principles into the tender minds of children, would have the happiest effects towards reforming mankind, and diffusing the light of the Gospel in the world.' Memoir of Rev. Jerem. Newell, annexed to his funeral sermon by the author. SCOTT.

knowing that, through his affinity, he had received it from God Himself, and remembering, that it accorded to the Holy Scriptures, with which he had from his childhood been acquainted.—Doubtless this is still more emphatically true of the sacred Scriptures, now the canon of the New Test. also is completed.—The Old Test., almost entirely in its present form, was called by the Jews, 'The Scriptures,' or 'The Oracles of God;' now, if everything which Christ and his apostles spoke on the subject, was exactly calculated to confirm them in this opinion, and to discredit all traditional revelations, and if the apostle here expressly declares, that the whole was divinely inspired, what are they doing, who, as professed friends to Christianity, and holding the office of pastors, nay, rulers of the Christian church, labor to persuade men, that the books of Moses, and other parts of the Old Test., are genuine and authentic indeed; but speak so ambiguously on the point of their being divinely inspired, as to leave their readers in general to suppose, that they do not believe them to be so, or that this is a matter of subordinate consequence? Rom. 15:4—7.—(15) A child. Gr. an infant.—Children may then very early and profitably be made acquainted with the Scriptures. SCOTT.

(15.) 'The apostle calls the Old Test. sacred, because of its divine inspiration, v. 16. Timothy's mother and grandmother, being Jewish women of great piety, had trained him from his childhood, in the knowledge and belief of the writings of Moses and the prophets. And their care in thus instructing him being commended by the apostle, it shows that little children ought to be made acquainted with the Scriptures, as early as possible; and that they may derive much benefit, [nay, by the grace of the Holy Spirit, experience true piety,] from that imperfect knowledge of the Scriptures and the principles of religion, which they are capable of attaining in their tenderest years.' MACKEN.—'Little children ought to be early initiated into the study of the sacred letters; directly contrary to what the church of Rome teaches.' DODD.

(16.) 'The communicating from God, to a mortal, the knowledge which could not be, or had not been obtained in any other way, by his immediate influence on the human mind, is revelation. The qualifying one who receives revelation to communicate the revealed knowledge to his fellow-creatures, with perfect certainty and accuracy, is inspiration.' J. P. SMITH, in Henry, abr.

It instructs in what is true, reproves for what is amiss, directs in what is good. It is of use to all, and specially to ministers. That the man of God may be perfect, v. 17. The Christian, the minister, is the man of God. That which finishes a man of God in this world, is, the Scripture. Whatever duty we have to do, whatever service is required from us, we may find enough in the Scriptures to furnish us for it.

The Scripture has various uses, and answers divers ends and purposes; it is a perfect rule of faith and practice; follow its directions, and we shall be made men of God, perfect and thoroughly furnished to every good work: there is no occasion for the writings of the philosopher, for rabbinical fables, popish legends, or unwritten traditions, to make us perfect men of God, since the Scripture answers all these ends and purposes. Oh, that we may love our Bibles more, and keep closer to them than ever! and then shall we find the benefit and advantage designed thereby, and shall at last attain the happiness therein promised and assured to us.

CHAP. IV. V. 1—7. Here we have Paul's charge to Timothy; where, Observe,

NOTES. CHAP. IV. V. 1—5. These repeated, solemn charges of the apostle, to so zealous and faithful a minister as Timothy, most emphatically show, how difficult it is to fill up this important office, in a proper manner, to the end of life, especially in dangerous times.—Timothy, to whom this exhortation was given, had an infirm constitution; so that this excuse for remissness should not be too readily admitted. 1 Tim. 5:23.—Timothy is said in the postscript, to have been 'ordained the first bishop of the church of the Ephesians;' but it seems, to me, at least, that the office of an evangelist was superior to that of a diocesan bishop, as exercised in the earliest ages of Christianity. Those, however, who think otherwise, and consider Timothy as a bishop, should not forget the apostle's charge to bishops, to 'preach the Word, instant in season, out of season.' For this too many seem to disregard. The evangelists appear to have been extraordinary assistants to the apostles, exercising great authority, in their absence, over the several churches which they visited: perhaps when that extraordinary office began to cease in the church, diocesan episcopacy was substituted; but it can only answer the same end in a smaller degree, and in one place: while absolutely necessary. Woe be to him if he preach not the Gospel, 1 Cor. 9:16. To induce him to faithfulness, he must consider,

1. That the eye of God and Jesus Christ was upon him; I charge thee before God and the Lord Jesus Christ; that is, 'As thou tenderest the favor of God and Jesus Christ,' &c.

2. That he will answer it at the great day: at his appearing and his kingdom, that is, when the Lord Jesus appears in his kingdom. It concerns all, both ministers and people, seriously to consider the account they must shortly give to Jesus Christ of all the trusts reposed in them. Christ shall judge the quick and the dead, that is, those that at the last day shall be found alive, and those who shall be raised to life out of the grave.

II. The matter of the charge, v. 2—5.

1. To preach the Word. That is ministers' business; a dispensation is committed to them. It is not their own notions and fancies they are to preach, but the pure, plain Word of God; and they must not corrupt it, but as of sincerity, but as of God, in the sight of God, they speak in Christ, 2 Cor. 2:17.

2. To urge what he preached with all earnestness on his hearers. He must do his work with all fervency of spirit. 'Call on those under thy charge to take heed of sin, to do their duty: call on them to repent and believe, and live a holy life, and this both in season and out of season. In season, when they are at leisure; nay, out of season, even when there is no apparent probability of fastening anything on them, because thou dost not know but the Spirit of God may fasten on them; for the wind bloweth where it listeth, Eccl. 11:6.'

3. He must tell people of their faults; Reprove them, rebuke them. Convince wicked people of the evil and danger of their wicked courses. Rebuke them with gravity and authority, in Christ's name, that they may take thy displeasure against them as an indication of God's displeasure.'

4. He must direct, encourage, and quicken those who began well. Exhort them; persuade them to hold on, and endure to the end, and this with all long-suffering and doctrine. He must do it very patiently, with all long-suffering; do it rationally, not with passion, but with doctrine, that is, 'In order to reduce them to good practices, instil into them good principles.'

5. He must watch in all things; 'Seek an opportunity, and let no fair occasion slip through negligence: watch to work, watch against temptations, and over the souls of those committed to thy charge.'

6. He must count on afflictions, and endure them; make the best of them. Endure them patiently, be not discouraged, but bear them with an even spirit.

7. He must remember his office, and discharge that; Do the work of an evangelist. The evangelists were as the apostles' deputies, to water the churches they planted, to reside in, and preside over, them, till they were settled under a standing ministry. This was Timothy's work.

8. He must fulfil his ministry; Make full proof of it. A great trust was reposed in him, therefore he must answer it, and perform all the parts of his office with diligence and care.

III. The reasons to enforce the charge.

1. Because errors and heresies were likely to creep into the church, by which the minds of many professing Christians would be corrupted, v. 3, 4. People must hear, and ministers must preach, for the time to come, and guard against the mischiefs likely to arise hereafter, though they do not yet arise. They will turn away their ears from the truth, grow weary of the plain Gospel of Christ, and then be greedy of fables, and take pleasure in them; and God shall give them up to those strong delusions, because they received not the truth in the love of it, 2 Thess. 2:11, 12. Observe,

These teachers were of their own heaping up, and not of God's sending; but they chose them, to gratify their lusts, and to please their itching ears. People do so when they will not endure sound doctrine, that preaching which is searching, plain, and to the purpose. There is a wide difference between the Word of God and the words of such teachers. God justly suffers those to turn to fables, who grow weary of the truth, and gives them up to be led aside from the truth by fables.

2. Because Paul for his part had almost done his work, v. 6.

When laborers are removed out of the vineyard, it is no time for them to loiter, that are left behind, but to double their diligence. Paul's comfort and cheerfulness, in the prospect of his approaching departure, might encourage Timothy to the utmost industry, diligence, and seriousness in his work. The courage and comfort of dying saints and ministers, and especially dying martyrs, are a great confirmation of the truth of the Christian religion, and a great encouragement to living saints and ministers in their work. Here,

(1.) He looks forward, upon his death approaching; I am now ready to be offered. The Holy Ghost witnessed in every city, that bonds and afflictions did abide him, Acts 20:23. He was now at Rome, and probably had particular intimations from the Spirit, that there he should seal the truth with his blood; and he looks upon it now as near at hand; I am already poured out; so it is in the original, that is, I am already a martyr in affection. It alludes to the pouring out of the drink-offerings; for the blood of the martyrs, though it was not a sacrifice of atonement, yet it was a sacrifice of acknowledgment to the honor of the grace of God, and his truths. Observe, With what pleasure he speaks of dying. He calls it his departure; though probably he foresaw he must die a violent, bloody death, yet he calls it his departure, or his release. Death to a good man is his release from the imprisonment of this world, and his depart-

the missionary part of an evangelist's office continues essential to the promulgation of the Gospel in every age.—'The twelve, after Christ's departure, had others whom they sent into some part of their charge.—These, when they were employed in preaching the Gospel, to them that had not yet received it, the Scripture calls evangelists.' HAMMOND. Sc.

(2.) Long-suffering.] 'This virtue the apostle often recommended to Timothy, 2 Tim. 2:20. 3:16. but never this or patience either, to Titus. Perhaps Timothy, being younger than Titus, was of a more ardent spirit, which needed to be restrained; or, as Benson suggests, difference of character in the persons they had to do with, might occasion this difference in the apostle's exhortations.' MACKN. 'What would a physician who had a sovereign cure for all diseases, be accounted, if he kept it a secret, or was slothful in dispensing it, or mixed poison with it? How much more criminal is a minister of the Gospel, who thinks himself entrusted with an infallible medicine for all the disorders of the soul, if he adulterates it, or is unfaithful and inactive in applying it?' ADAMS.

ture to the enjoyments of another world ; he does not cease to be, but is only removed from one world to another.

(2.) Observe with what pleasure he looks back on the life he had lived, v. 7. He therefore did not fear death, because he had the testimony of his conscience, that, by the grace of God, he had, in some measure, answered the ends of living. As a Christian, as a minister, he had fought a good fight. His life was a course, and he had now finished it ; as his warfare was accomplished, so his race was run.

Note, The life of a Christian, but especially of a minister, is a warfare and a race. It is a good fight, a good warfare. We must fight this good fight, must not give over till we are made more than conquerors through Him who hath loved us, Rom. 8:37. It is a great comfort to a dying saint, when he can look back on his past life, and say, as our apostle does, I have fought, &c. Toward the end of our days, to be able to speak in this manner, what comfort, unspeakable comfort, will it afford ! Let it then be our constant endeavor, by the grace of God, that we may finish our course with joy, Acts 20:24.

(3.) With what pleasure he looks forward to the life he was to live hereafter, v. 8. Let this encourage Timothy, that there is a crown of life before us, the glory and joy of which will abundantly recompense all the hardships and toils of our present warfare. Observe, It is called a crown of righteousness ; because it will be the recompense of our services, which God is not unrighteous to forget ; and because our holiness and righteousness will there be perfected, and that will be our crown.

God will give it as a righteous Judge, who will let none lose by Him.

And yet this crown of righteousness was not peculiar to Paul, as if it belonged only to apostles, and eminent ministers and martyrs, but to all them also that love his appearing. Observe, It is the character of all the saints, that they love the appearing of Jesus Christ : they loved his first appearing, they love to think of it ; they love his second appearing at the great day, love it, and long for it : and with respect to those who love the appearing of Jesus Christ, He shall appear to their joy ; there is a crown of righteousness reserved for them, which shall then be given them, Heb. 9:28.

We learn, hence, The Lord is the righteous Judge, for his judgment is according to truth. The crown of believers is a crown of righteousness, purchased by the righteousness of Christ, and bestowed as the reward of the saints' righteousness. This crown, which believers shall wear, is laid up for them ; they have it not at present, for here they are but heirs ; they have it not in possession, yet it is sure, for it is laid up for them. The righteous Judge will give it to all who love, prepare, and long for, his appearing ; Surely I come quickly ; Amen, even so come, Lord Jesus.

V. 9—15. Here divers particular matters Paul mentions to Timothy, now at the closing of the epistle.

1. He bids him hasten to him, if possible, v. 9. Timothy was an evangelist, not a fixed pastor, but attended the motions of the apostles ; Paul wanted his company and help ; and the reason he gives, is, several had left him, v. 10. One, from an ill principle, Demas, who abides under an ill name for it : fear of suffering, or interest, called him off from his ministry. Note, Love to this present world is often the cause of apostasy from the truths and ways of Jesus Christ. He is gone, is departed to Thessalonica ; called thither, perhaps, by trade, or other worldly business. Crescens is gone one way, Titus another way, and only Luke was with Paul, v. 11, 12. Was not that enough ? Paul did not think it so ; he loved the company of his friends.

2. He speaks respectfully of Mark : supposed the Mark about whom Paul and Barnabas contended, Acts 15:39. Paul, it appears, was now reconciled to him, and had a better opinion of him than he had had formerly. This teaches us to be of a forgiving spirit ; those that are profitable and useful, though they may have done amiss, we must not therefore disclaim for ever making use of them.

3. Paul orders Timothy to come to him, bids him as he came through Troas to bring with him from thence those things he had left there, v. 13. the cloak, it may be, Paul had the more occasion for in a cold prison. Probably it was his usual habit, a plain dress. Some read it the roll of parchment ; others, the desk I left. Paul was guided by divine inspiration, yet would have his books with him. As he had exhorted Timothy to give attendance to reading, so he did himself, though now ready to be offered. As long as we live, we must be still learning. But especially the parchments, the originals of his epistles, so some ; others, the skins he made his tents of, whereby he got a livelihood, working with his own hands.

4. He mentions Alexander, and the mischief he had done him, v. 14, 15. He is PRACT. OBS. V. 1—8. The importance of the work of ministers, the peculiar temptations to which they are exposed, and the multiplied evil effects of their unfaithfulness or negligence, concur in rendering it needful, most solemnly and repeatedly, to charge the most zealous of them, as 'in the presence of God and of the Lord Jesus,' before whom they must shortly appear, to give an account of their stewardship, that 'they preach the Word, instant in season, out of season,' to few or many, as opportunities offer, like men engaged in the work, who make it their one great business and pleasure, without consulting their own ease, interest, or reputation, or shrinking from hardship, reproach, or persecution ; and that they 'reprove, rebuke, exhort,' with forbearance and perseverance, with plain instructions, and close application. This is the more indispensable, as the time is indeed now come, when even a large majority of professed Christians 'will not endure sound doctrine ; they are offended by the humbling truths of the Gospel, or by the heart-searching, distinguishing, practical truths of Scripture, which detect their sins, and show the necessity of mortifying their peculiar lusts ; and they desire to be soothed and flattered in the indulgence of them, and to have 'teachers according to them.' This should induce those who love souls, 'to watch in all things,' to venture and endure all painful effects of faithfulness, to take every opportunity of preaching the pure Gospel, and to 'make full proof of their ministry,' that they may do all the good in it which they possibly can. In doing this, they should be quickened by the consideration, that their brethren, one after another, are taken away, or laid aside, and that their own term of usefulness will soon expire.—In proportion as the duties of a man's place and station are neglected, his evidence of an interest in Christ must be obscured, and uncertainty and discouragement may probably distress his closing scene. SCOTT.

V. 7, 8. 'The whole passage is beautifully allusive to the celebrated games and exercises of those times.' T. HORNE.—This shows that the apostle looked upon his death as at hand, and evidently it was written under different prospects from those described in his first epistle. HENRY, abr.

V. 9—13. Of Demas, he seems before to have judged very favorably ; but he had forsaken him in his perilous situation, 'having loved this present world.' He had not courage to venture his life, by continuing with the apostle under his persecutions : he loved the world too much to give up all for Christ ; and perhaps some prospect of secular advantage offered itself, with which he was caught. Whether he finally apostatized or not, we cannot certainly tell ; but the apostle 'stood in doubt of him.' Prof. Col. 4:14. Notes, 1 John 2:15—17. He also informed Timothy, that 'he had sent Tychicus to Ephesus.' This has been deemed a decisive proof, that Timothy was not at Ephesus, at that time, and, indeed, it greatly favors that conclusion : but, possibly, Tychicus might be sent by another way, than the bearer of this epistle, and calling at other places, might not arrive till afterwards ; and the apostle might mean, that he had sent Tychicus, to supply Timothy's place at Ephesus, that he might come to him the sooner.—Among these informations and directions, we find Paul desiring Timothy, to bring his cloke to him. If the word means a cloke, or upper garment, (as it seems to do.) which he supposed he might want at the approach of winter, it is a remarkable proof of his poverty to the end of his life, that he should need to send so far for a garment to keep him warm during the remnant of his days ! 1 Cor. 4:9—13. 2 Cor. 6:3—10. 11:24—27.—What books and parchments were meant, Timothy would know ; but it is in vain for us to conjecture. As Troas was not in the direct road from Ephesus to Rome, this may be urged as a proof that Timothy was not then at Ephesus ; but it is not certain, that he might not go by another way, to call on some of the churches with which he was connected.—These directions favor the opinion, that the apostle had been hurried away, by his persecutors, from these eastern regions ; without being allowed leisure, either to accomplish his plans, or to take with him those things which he intended. SCOTT.

spoken of Acts 19: 33. It should seem, he had been a rather forward professor, for he was there particularly maligned by the worshippers of Diana, yet he did Paul much evil. Paul was in as much danger from false brethren, 2 Cor. 11 : 26. as from open enemies. Paul foretells that God would reckon with him. It is a prophetic denunciation of the just judgment of God that would befall him. He cautions Timothy to take heed of him. It is dangerous having anything to do with those who would be enemies to such a man as Paul. Observe,

Some, who were once Paul's hearers and admirers, did not give him reason to remember them with much pleasure ; yet others did, as Timothy, Titus, Mark, and Luke. On two, he has left a brand ; one, Demas, who forsook him, the other, Alexander, who greatly withstood his words.

V. 16—22. Here he gives Timothy an account of his own present circumstances. He had lately been called to appear before the emperor, on his appeal to Cesar ; and then no man stood with him, v. 16. but all men forsook him. Strange, so good a man should have nobody to own him, even at Rome, where were many Christians, whose faith was spoken of throughout all the world, Rom. 1:8. But men are but men. And see what distinction is put between sins of presumption and sins of infirmity. Alexander the coppersmith, who maliciously withstood Paul, he prays against him ; The Lord reward him according to his works ; but of these Christians, who through weakness shrunk from Paul in time of trial, he says, The Lord lay it not to their charge. Here we see that Paul had his trials, in his friends forsaking him, and enemies opposing him.

Notwithstanding this, God stood by him, v. 17. gave him extraordinary wisdom and courage ; that by me the preaching might be fully known, that is, that I might preach the Gospel, which is my business. Nay, it should seem he might preach the Gospel at that time ; preach it at the bar as well as in the pulpit ; and that all the Gentiles might hear ; the emperor himself, and the great men who would never have heard Paul preach, if he had not been brought before them. And I was delivered out of the mouth of the lion, that is, of Nero, or some other judge, so some ; or, it is only as a proverbial form of speech, so some, to signify that he was in imminent danger. And the Lord shall deliver me from every evil work. See how Paul improved his experiences. From past deliverances, he trusted for future and eternal deliverance. And for this he gives glory to God, rejoicing in 'hope of the glory of God. If the Lord stands by us, He will strengthen us, in a time of difficulty and danger, nay, his presence will more than supply every one's absence ; so we ought to give God the glory of all past, present, and future deliverances ; To whom be glory for ever and ever. Amen.

He sends salutations to Aquila and Priscilla, and the household of Onesiphorus, v. 19. He mentions his leaving Trophimus sick at Miletum, v. 20. by which it appears, that though the apostles healed all manner of diseases miraculously, for the confirmation of their doctrine, yet they did not exert that power on their own friends, lest it should have looked like a collusion.

He hastens Timothy to come to him before winter, v. 21. because he longed to see him, and because in the winter the journey or voyage would be more dangerous.

He sends commendations to him from Eubulus, Pudens, Linus, Claudia, and all the brethren. One [Martial, in Scott] of the heathen writers at this time mentions one Pudens, and his wife Claudia, and says, that Claudia was a Briton ; whence some have gathered, that it was this Pudens, and that Claudia here was his wife, and that they were eminent Christians at Rome.

He concludes with a prayer, that the Lord Jesus would be with his spirit. We need no more to make us happy, than to have the Lord Jesus Christ with our spirits ; for in Him all spiritual blessings are summed up.

Grace be with you. Amen. This was our apostle's token in every epistle ; so he wrote ; The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all. Amen. 2 Thess. 3: 17, 18.

PRACT. OBS. V. 9—22. There are various characters in the visible church, and various changes take place among ministers. Some, who have apparently 'run well, are hindered,' and forsake the Lord and his faithful servants, 'loving this present world ;' others are recovered from grievous backslidings, and become 'profitable for the ministry ;' and not a few turn open apostates or virulent opposers, 'doing much harm' to the servants of Christ, and greatly withstanding their words, whom 'the Lord will reward according to their works.' Others bring their characters into doubt, or incur disgrace, by their cowardice in times of danger ; and their brethren are called on to pray for them, that 'the Lord would not lay that sin to their charge.' But a few proceed with diligence and courage in every circumstance ; though 'no man stands with them, the Lord is with them' to strengthen and comfort them, He 'gives them a mouth and wisdom, which all their enemies cannot gainsay ;' (Note, Luke 21:12—19, v. 15.) He delivers them from outward dangers and enemies, as long as it is good for them ; He 'preserves them from the mouth of the lion,' which would destroy their souls, and He 'keeps them from every evil work, even unto his heavenly kingdom.' Unnumbered multitudes are now before the throne, giving glory to his name ; may we be followers of them, may 'the Lord Jesus be with our spirits,' to comfort and sanctify them, and may his grace be with all his disciples and ministers in every place ! Amen. SCOTT.

supposition highly dishonorable both to the Word of God, and to the Spirit which inspired it ? Deut. 27:15. Ps. 69:22—23. 109.6—20.—Timothy was moreover warned to beware of the malignant and subtle machinations of this wicked man, as he would do as much to injure him, and withstand his words, as he had done in opposing the apostle and his doctrine.

V. 16—19. The cruel persecutions of the Christians at Rome, under Nero, seem to have preceded the writing of this epistle. Numbers had then been put to death, in the most dreadful manner, or driven from the city, and the rest seem to have been greatly intimidated ; so that on this important occasion none were found, who ventured to attend the apostle to the tribunal. This was a very criminal weakness, the effect of unbelief ; but the apostle prayed that it 'might not be laid to their charge.' 14, 15. Luke 22:21—23, 31—34.—Mouth of the lion.] Perhaps the apostle had in view, that 'adversary, who goeth about as a roaring lion, seeking whom he may devour,' and who was not entirely without hope, that the fear of death would induce Paul to renounce the faith, and that he should thus seize upon his soul. 1 Pet. 5:8, 9. The apostle did not expect to escape martyrdom ; but he was confident that 'the Lord would deliver him from every evil work,' not suffering Satan to prevail against him, to induce him to do anything inconsistent with the honor of the Gospel, or the benefit of his soul, and 'that He would preserve him to his heavenly kingdom.' Gen. 48:16. Mat. 6:13. Instead therefore of complaints or despondency, he was ready to ascribe 'glory to the Lord for ever and ever,' or to 'ages of ages,' that is, to eternal ages. 'Amen.'

(16.) Many circumstances make it astonishing Paul should have been deserted by the Christians at Rome in this extremity. . . . But one material circumstance, seldom taken notice of in this connexion, accounts in a great measure for what might otherwise appear so strange. Clement, the companion of Paul, informs us, that he suffered martyrdom under the governors, i. e. when Nero was gone into Greece, and had left the government of the city to Tigellinus and Sabinus, prefects of the prætorian guard, and that monster Helius. This fixes Paul's death to [494]

A. D. 66 or 67. But the cruel persecution of Nero against the Christians at Rome was, according to Tacitus, at least two years before this. It is probable, therefore, many might have suffered death, or, according to our Lord's advice, Mat. 10:23. have retired from Rome. DONBR.—Yet Bloomf. observes ; on vs. 20—22. that 'by "all the brethren," we may suppose the persecution had not entirely dispersed the Christians, but that some vestiges of a congregation still remained.'

V. 19—22. Prisca, or Priscilla, and Aquila were near to the place where Timothy resided ; but, as they frequently changed their abode, this does not determine where he then was. Acts 18:1—6, 18—23. Rom. 16:3, 4. The same remark may be made concerning the family of Onesiphorus. 1:16—18. The apostle had probably been attended by Erastus and Trophimus, when he last parted with Timothy ; but the former abode at Corinth, and the latter was left sick at Miletum.—Surely, every reader must be fully satisfied, from reading the close of this epistle, that Peter was not at Rome when it was written ; if therefore, he suffered martyrdom, at the same time when the apostle Paul did, according to ancient tradition, he must have arrived at that city after this epistle had been sent. Timothy accompanied the apostle from Corinth, through Macedonia, probably to Miletum, when he went to Jerusalem before his first imprisonment at Rome. Ac. 20:4—16. It would therefore have been wholly superfluous to inform him concerning Erastus, if that voyage had been spoken of ; and Trophimus accompanied the apostle to Jerusalem. 21:29.—Some, indeed, suppose Miletum in Crete, mentioned by Homer, to be intended ; but, in that case, Paul must have left Trophimus there, at sometime subsequent to the voyage towards Rome, in which he suffered shipwreck ; for no intimation of such an event is given in that narrative.—(22) The Lord Jesus be with thy spirit.] What would a well-informed protestant think of a similar prayer, in which the name of any saint, any mere man, or created being was inserted, instead of 'the Lord Jesus ?' Would it not be considered as an act of idolatry, and that justly ? And would not papists bring it as a voucher for their worship of saints, with much plausibility ?—But Jesus is 'Emmanuel, God with us.' Mat. 1:22, 23. 28:19, 20. SCOTT.

PAUL'S EPISTLE TO TITUS,
WITH
PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS AND NOTES.

(Henry's Exposition, completed by Mr. J. Smith.)

THIS Epistle of Paul to Titus, is much of the same nature with those to Timothy; as they both stood in nearly the same relation to the apostle. We read much of this Titus, his titles, character, and active usefulness, in many places: he was a Greek, Gal. 2:3. Paul called him his son, Tit. 1:4. his brother, 2 Cor. 2:13. his partner and fellow-helper, 2 Cor. 8:23. one that walked in the same Spirit, and in the same steps with himself. He went up with the apostles to the church at Jerusalem, Gal. 2:1. was much conversant at Corinth, for which church he had an earnest care, 2 Cor. 8:16. Paul's second epistle to them, and probably his first, also, was sent by his hand, 2 Cor. 8:16—18, 23. 9:2—4. 12:18. He was with the apostle at Rome, and thence went into Dalmatia, 2 Tim. 4:10. after which no more occurs of him in the Scriptures. So that by them he appears not to have been a fixed bishop; if such he were, and in those times, the church of Corinth, where he most attended, had the best title to him. In Crete (now called Candia, formerly Hecatompolis, from its hundred cities), a large island at the mouth of the Ægean sea, the Gospel had got some footing; and here were Paul and Titus, in one of their travels, cultivating this plantation; but the apostle of the Gentiles, having on him the care of all the churches, could not himself tarry long at this place; he therefore left Titus some time there, to carry on the work which had been begun; wherein, probably, meeting with more difficulty than ordinary. Paul wrote this epistle to him; and yet, perhaps, not so much for his own sake, as for the people's, that the endeavors of Titus, strengthened with apostolic advice and authority, might be more significant and effectual among them. He was to see all the cities furnished with good pastors; to reject and keep out the unmeet and unworthy; to teach sound doctrine, and instruct all sorts in their duties; to set forth the free grace of God in man's salvation by Christ; and withal to show the necessity of maintaining good works by those who have believed in God, and hope for eternal life from Him.

HENRY.

It is remarkable that Titus, of whom the apostle repeatedly speaks in terms of the highest approbation and most cordial affection in his epistles, is not once mentioned in the Acts of the Apostles.* 2 Cor. 2:1, 2, 13. 7:5—7. 8:16—24. 12:17—21. Gal. 2:1—5. Nor is anything recorded concerning Paul's labors in Crete. It is indeed probable, the Gospel was made known there, at an early period; as there were Cretes present on the day of Pentecost, Acts 2:11. If, however, any then converted, on their return home, made known the Gospel to their neighbors; the joyful report from them would reach none but the Jews and proselytes. But no information is given us of what passed in that island, at that time, or afterwards; except as this epistle shows, that Paul had labored there. Probably, this was subsequent to his first imprisonment at Rome, and before his second. He seems to have had very great success in his ministry, in that island; but, by some means, to have been hurried thence, before he could order the state of the churches, in a regular manner. 2 Tim. 4:9—13. He, therefore, left Titus there, to settle the churches in the several cities of the island, according to the apostolical plan in other places.—Tradition, and ecclesiastical records, have made Titus bishop of Crete: and, because so large an island was an extensive charge, some have conferred on him the title of archbishop. But I am by no means convinced, that even this title would not have been a derogation from his real dignity, as an evangelist.—'If, by saying Timothy and Titus were bishops, the one of Ephesus, the other of Crete, we understand that they took on them these churches, or dioceses, as their fixed and particular charge, in which they were to preside for the term of life; I believe that Timothy and Titus were not thus bishops: for both Timothy and Titus were evangelists.—Now the work of an evangelist, says Eusebius, was this, to lay the foundation of churches in barbarous nations, to constitute them pastors; and, having committed to them the cultivating of those new plantations, they passed on to other countries.—As to Titus, he was only left in Crete, "to ordain elders in every city, and to set in order the things that were wanting." Having therefore done that work, he had done all that was assigned him in that station, and, therefore, Paul sends for him the very next year to Nicopolis.' Whitby. It is, however, recorded, that he afterwards returned to Crete, and died there, when 94 years of age.—Dr. Whitby never doubted, nor does the author of these notes at all doubt, that diocesan episcopacy was generally introduced into the churches, even during the lives of some of the apostles. But the office of an evangelist of old, and that of a true missionary at present, should be considered as perfectly distinct from that of a bishop; and, in some respects, (especially as a general commission, to preach the Gospel to the nations,) superior to it.—The postscript states that the epistle was written from Nicopolis in Macedonia: but, had this been the case, the apostle would have said, 'I have determined here to winter,' not 'there to winter.' 3:12. There were several cities called Nicopolis; and it is not certain which is here meant.

SCOTT.

* 'The earliest account we have of Titus is in Gal. 2:1. It appears the apostle had a great regard for him.—This epistle was most probably the last of Paul's epistles, except the second to Timothy; but nothing can be certainly determined, either as to its date, or the place from which it was sent.—Upon the review of this and the two epistles to Timothy, it is natural to reflect how much they tend to illustrate and confirm the internal evidence of Christianity. Nothing sets the characters of great men in so true a light, as their letters to particular friends. In their familiar correspondence, they open their minds with freedom, and throw off all reserve. Yet in these epistles to his friends, as in his other epistles to whole churches, we find Paul the same man, actuated by the same principles, and having in view the same object; free from all disguise, and no less free from all cunning designs of worldly advantage and personal ambition. The instructions he gives his friends for the exercise of their office, have nothing of art or subtlety, but are plain and simple, and centre in that grand design of advancing the interests of religion, and the happiness of mankind, which ever lay near his heart: and so far is he from flattering them with the prospect of any worldly advantage, that he exhorts them to be ready, after his example, to sacrifice every temporal interest, and even life itself, in the cause they had undertaken to support. Hence we may infer, that the Christian religion is not a cunningly devised fable, formed to answer the ambitious or interested views of its authors; but that it is indeed the power of God, and the wisdom of God.'

CHAP. I. V. 1—4. Here is,

1. The writer of this epistle, Paul, a Gentile name, taken by the apostle of the Gentiles, Acts 13: 9, 46, 47. When the Jews rejected the Gospel, and the Gentiles received it, we read no more of this apostle by his Jewish name Saul, but by his Roman one, Paul.

Here he is described by his relation and office; a servant of God, not in the general sense only, as a man and a Christian; but especially as a minister, servant of God in the Gospel of his Son, Rom. 1:9. He is described more especially as a chief minister, an apostle of Jesus Christ; one who had seen the Lord, and was immediately called and commissioned by Him, and had his doctrine from Him. Observe, The highest officers in the church are but servants, yet they were so according to the faith of God's elect. Their doctrine agreed with the faith of all the elect from the beginning of the world, and was for propagating and promoting of the same. Observe, There are elect of God, 1 Pet. 1:2. and in these the Holy Spirit works precious, divine faith, proper to those who are chosen to eternal life, 2 Thess. 2: 13, 14. Faith is the first principle of sanctification. And the acknowledging of the truth which is after godliness. The Gospel is truth; great, sure, saving truth, Col. 1:5. truth after godliness, of a godly nature and tendency, pure, and purifying the heart of

NOTES. CHAP. I. V. 1—4. The expression, 'God our Savior,' seems here to relate to the Godhead without distinction of persons; and in some places it refers to the person of the Father, as saving us by his beloved Son. 3:4—7. 1 Tim. 1:1,2.—Some explain the words rendered, 'before the world began,' to relate to the promise made to Adam, or to Abraham, before the promulgation of the Mosaic law. But I must think, that the interpretation above given is far more obvious. If indeed Christ be 'the Chosen of God,' the Surety and Representative of 'all the believer; truth not only to be known, but acknowledged, and held forth in word and practice, Phil. 2: 15, 16. Rom. 10: 10. To bring to this knowledge and faith, and to the acknowledging and profession of the truth which is after godliness, is the great end of the gospel-ministry. In (or for) hope of eternal life, v. 2. This is the further intent of the Gospel, to beget hope as well as faith; to take off the mind and heart from the world, and to raise them to heaven and the things above. The faith and godliness of Christians lead to eternal life, and give hope and well-grounded expectation of it; for God, that cannot lie, hath promised it.

But, How is He said to promise before the world began? Some understand his decree, He purposed it in his eternal counsels, which was, as it were, his promise in embryo; or rather, say some, before ancient times, or many ages ago, referring to the promise darkly delivered, Gen. 3: 15. Here is the stability and antiquity of the promise of eternal life to the saints. But it hath been in due time manifested, v. 3. that is, He hath made his promise, so darkly delivered of old, in due time, (the proper season before appointed,) more plain by preaching; that which some called foolishness of preaching, has been thus honored. Which is committed unto me. The ministry is a trust; and whoso is appointed and called, must preach the Word, 1 Cor. 9: 16. Unpreaching ministers are none of the apostle's successors. According to the commandment of God our Savior; preaching is a work appointed by God as a Savior. See a proof here of Christ's deity, for by Him was the Gospel committed to Paul when he was converted, Acts 9: 15, 17. and ch. 22: 10, 14, 15. and again when Christ appeared to him, v. 17—21. The Father saves by the Son, through the Spirit, and they concur in sending ministers.

2. Here is the person written to, described;

Titus, a Gentile Greek, yet called both to the faith and ministry. Observe, The grace of God is free and powerful. He is described by his spiritual relation unto the apostle; Mine own (or my genuine) son, not by nature, but by grace, 1 Cor. 4: 15. Mine own son after the common faith; so called to distinguish Titus from hypocrites and false teachers, and to recommend him to the regard of the Cretians, as being among them a lively image of the apostle himself, in faith, and life, and heavenly doctrine.

3. Paul's salutation and prayer, wishing all blessings to Titus. Here are the blessings wished; Grace, mercy, and peace. Grace, the free favor of God, and acceptance with him. Mercy, the fruits of that favor, in pardon of sins, and freedom from all miseries by it, both here and hereafter. And peace, the positive effect, and fruit of mercy. Observe, Grace is the fountain of all blessings. Mercy, and peace, and all good, spring out of this. Get into God's favor, and all must be well; for,

These blessings are wished. From God the Father, the Fountain of all good. And the Lord Jesus Christ our Savior, as the way and means of procurement and conveyance.

Thus far the preface to the epistle; then follows,

The entrance into the matter, by signifying the end of Titus' being left in Crete.

V. 5. Here is the end expressed,

I. More generally. To set in order, or to order after another; so the word imports. Titus was to go on in settling what the apostle himself had not time for, in his short stay there. Observe the apostle's great diligence in the Gospel; he labored to spread the Gospel as far as he could. His faithfulness and prudence too. He neglected not the places he went from; but left some to cultivate the young plantation, and carry on what was begun. Observe his humility; he disdained not to be helped, and that by such as were not of so high a rank in the ministry; a fit example for exciting zeal and industry, and engaging to faithfulness and care of the flock, and, present or absent, living and dying, for ministers, as much as in them lies, to provide for the spiritual edification and comfort of their people. Here also, Observe, Titus, though inferior to an apostle, yet was above the ordinary fixed pastors or bishops, who were to tend particular churches as their peculiar stated charge; Titus was to ordain such ordinary pastors where wanting, and settle things in their first state and form, and then to pass to other places for like service, as there might be need. Where an apostle could act as an apostle, an evangelist could as an evangelist; for they worked the work of the Lord, as they did, 1 Cor. 16: 10. in a like unfixed and itinerant manner.

Here at Crete Titus was but occasionally, and for a short time; Paul willed him to despatch business, and come to him at Nicopolis, where he purposed to winter; after this he was sent to Corinth, was with the apostle at Rome, and was sent thence into Dalmatia, which is the last we read of him in Scripture, so that from thence no fixed episcopacy in him does appear; he left Crete, and we find not in Scripture that he returned thither any more.

But, What power had either Paul or Titus here? Was not what they did, an encroachment on the rights of civil rulers? No, they came not to meddle with the civil rights of any, Luke 12: 14. Their work was spiritual, to be carried on by conviction and persuasion, no way interfering with, or prejudicing, or weakening, the power of magistrates, but securing and strengthening it rather; the things wanting were not such as civil magistrates are the fountains or authors of, but divine and spiritual ordinances, and appointments for spiritual ends, derived from Christ, the King and Head of the church; for settling these was Titus left. And observe, No easy thing is it to raise churches, and bring them to perfection.

II. In special; To ordain elders in every city, that is, ministers, who were mostly out of the elder, and most understanding and experienced Christians; or if younger in years, yet such as were grave and solid in their deportment and manners. These were to be set where there was any fit number of Christians, as in larger towns and cities was usually the case; though villages too might have them where there were Christians enough. These presbyters or elders were to have the ordinary and stated care and charge of the churches. The word is used sometimes more largely for any who bear ecclesiastical function in the church; so the apostles were presbyters or elders, 1 Pet. 5: 1. but here it is meant of ordinary fixed pastors, who labored in the Word and doctrine, and were over the churches in the Lord; such as are described here throughout the ch. Some use presbyter in the same sense as sacerdos, and translate it priest; a term not given to gospel-ministers, unless in a figurative or allusive way, as all God's people are said to be made kings and priests unto God, to offer up spiritual sacrifices of prayers, praises, and alms. But properly we have no priests under the Gospel, except Christ alone, the High Priest of our profession, Heb. 3: 1. Presbyters here therefore are not proper priests, to offer sacrifices, either typical or real; but only gospel-ministers, to dispense Christ's ordinances, and to feed the church of God, over which the Holy Ghost hath made them overseers. 1. Observe, A church without a fixed and standing ministry in it, is imperfect and wanting. 2. Where a fit number of believers is, presbyters or elders must be set, their continuance in churches is as necessary as their first appointment, for perfecting the saints, and edifying the body of Christ, till all come to a perfect man in Christ, till the whole number of God's chosen be called and united to Christ in one body, and brought to their full stature and strength, and that measure of grace that is proper and designed for them, Eph. 4: 12, 13. What praise is due to God for such an institution! What thankfulness from those that enjoy the benefits of it! What pity and prayer for such as want it! Ignorance and corruption, decays of good and increase of all evil, come by want of a teaching and quickening ministry. On such accounts therefore was Titus left in Crete, to set in order the things that were wanting, and to ordain elders in every city; but this he was to do, not according to his own will or fancy, but according to apostolical direction. This is, who were given to Him, John 6: 36—40. 17: 1—3. eternal life was promised to Him, in behalf of his people, of all who in every age should believe in Him, 'before the world was;' in consequence of his engagement to become incarnate, and to be obedient even to the death on the cross. 'Known unto God are all his works, from the beginning of the world.' Allow this, (and who will venture to deny it?) and then the promise of eternal life to the divine Looos, in behalf of all his people, is clear, and the meaning satisfactory; which, in my judgment at least, the other interpretations by no means are.—(2) Cannot lie.] Surely this was not from want of liberty or power, but through the moral inability of perfect holiness. 2 Tim. 2: 8—13, v. 13. SCOTT.

V. 5. Crete.] Crete, one of the largest islands in the Mediterranean, lies to the south of the Archipelago, and is about 250 miles long, 50 broad, and 600 in circuit. According to ancient authors it was peopled from Palestine. This people were great archers. In 1204 the Venetians took Candia, the second greatest city in Crete, and with it the whole island. But in 1645 the Turks almost entirely expelled the Venetians [496] and have kept possession ever since. In respect to climate and soil, as well as size, Crete is one of the finest islands in the Mediterranean, and with proper cultivation would produce all the necessaries and luxuries of life in the greatest abundance. MACKN.—A son of the Ed. lately visited this delightful island, now in the hands of the viceroy of Egypt, and remarks upon its soil, scenery, and capability, as well deserving the praise that has been lavished upon them. What a station for a Christian colony, filled with American enterprise! This stepping-stone and key to the east, would soon become the staple of the commerce of the E. and W. Ep.—Set in order, &c.] Ordain, &c. 'There were "100 cities" in Crete, but every considerable town was called a city by the ancients. Most likely, some congregations were settled under proper ministers, while Paul was among them, but others were not so provided, and the interposition of so wise and good a man as Titus, probably moved with extraordinary gifts, would, no doubt, have great weight on such an occasion.' DODDR.—Might he not have said, that Titus, as an evangelist (of that peculiar character, as evangelists, which is conceded to Timothy

III. The rule of his proceeding; As I had appointed thee, probably when he was going from him, and in the presence and hearing of others; which now he may refer to, not so much for Titus' own sake as for the people's, that they might the more readily yield obedience to Titus, knowing and observing that in what he did he was warranted and supported by apostolic injunction and authority. Human traditions and inventions may not be brought into the church of God. If an evangelist might not do anything but by appointment, much less may others.

The apostle next gives Titus directions about ordination, showing whom he should ordain, and whom not.

Of those whom he should ordain, he points out the qualifications and virtues; such as respect their life and manners, and such as relate to their doctrine: the former in the sixth, seventh, and eighth verses, and the latter in the ninth.

V. 6—9. 1. Their qualifications respecting their life and manners are,

1. More general; If any be blameless; not absolutely; but the meaning is, not under an ill character; but rather of good report, even from those that are without; he must not bring reproach on the holy function.

2. More particularly:

(1.) He must be of conjugal chastity; the husband of one wife. The church of Rome says the husband of no wife, but from the beginning it was not so; marriage is an ordinance from which no profession or calling is a bar, 1 Cor. 9:5. Forbidding to marry is one of the erroneous doctrines of the antichristian church, 1 Tim. 4:3. Not that ministers must be married; that is not meant; but the husband of one wife, may be either not having divorced his wife and married another, or having but one wife at one and the same time, no bigamist; he might be married to more than one wife successively; but, being married, he must have but one wife at once. Polygamy is scandalous in any, as also having a harlot or concubine with his lawful wife; such sin, or any wanton libidinous carriage, must be very remote from such as would enter into so sacred a function. And as to his children, having faithful children, obedient and good, brought up in the true Christian faith, and living according to it, at least as far as the and Titus), was to exercise a discretionary and deciding influence in the ordination of these elders, &c., agreeably to the suggestion of Scott, and the opinion of Whitby, quoted by Scott? See Preface to Titus; also below, v. 7. on bishop.

V. 6, 7. Riot.] Asotias: Eph. 5:18. 1 Pet. 4:4. Asotos: Lu. 15:13. Excess in expenses, or in animal indulgence. Self-willed.] 2 Pet. 2:10. One who makes his own inclination the measure of his conduct, in what regards others. Lu. 18:1—8. 2 Pet. 2:10, 11. [Note, 2 Tim. 3:2.] Scott.

(7.) Bishop.] 'If the bishop Paul speaks of, had been invested with an office distinct from, and superior to, the elder, v. 5. there could have been no room to conclude, that an elder must be blameless, be-endeavors of the parents can avail. Not accused of riot, or unruly; not justly so accused; otherwise the most innocent may be falsely so charged; they must look to it, therefore, that there be no color for such censure.

The ground of this qualification is shown from the nature of his office, v. 7. Those before termed presbyters, or elders, are here styled bishops; and such they were, having no ordinary fixed and standing officers above them. Titus' business here, it is plain, was but occasional, and his stay short, as before noted. Having ordained elders, and settled things in their due form, he went and left all (for aught that appears in Scripture) in the hands of those elders whom the apostle here calls bishops, and stewards of God. We read not in the sacred writings of any successor he had in Crete; but to those elders or bishops was committed the full charge of feeding, ruling, and watching over, their flock; they wanted not any powers necessary for carrying on religion and the ministry of it among them, and deriving it down to succeeding ages. These are the qualifications, relatively, with the ground of them.

(2.) The more absolute ones are expressed:

[1.] Negatively, showing what an elder or bishop must not be; not self-willed. The prohibition is of large extent, excluding self-opinion, or overweening conceit of parts and abilities, self-love, and self-seeking, making self the centre of all; also self-confidence and trust, and self-pleasing, little regarding or setting by others; not proud, stubborn, froward, inflexible, set on one's own will and way; or churlish, as Nabal: such is the sense expositors have affixed to the term. Not soon angry, not one of a hasty, angry temper, soon and easily provoked and inflamed. The minister must be meek and gentle, and patient towards all men. Not given to wine; there is no greater reproach on a minister than to be a wine-bibber, one who loves it, and gives himself undue liberty this way. Seasonable and moderate use of this is not unlawful, 1 Tim. 5:23. But excess therein is shameful in all, especially in a minister: take heed, therefore, of going too near the brink. No striker, in any quarrelsome or contentious manner, not injuriously or out of revenge, with cruelty or unnecessary roughness. Not given to filthy lucre; not greedy of it, as 1 Tim. 3:3. whereby is not meant refusing a just return for their labors, in order to their necessary support and comfort; but not making gain their first or chief end; entering into the ministry, or managing of it with base worldly views. It is called filthy lucre, from its defiling the soul that inordinately or greedily looks after it, as if it were any other wise desirable than for the good and lawful uses of it. Thus of the negative part of the bishop's character. But,

[2.] Positively he must be, v. 8. A lover of hospitality, as an evidence that he is not given to filthy lucre, but is willing to use what he has to the best purposes, not laying up for himself, so as to hinder charitable laying out for the good of others; receiving and entertaining strangers, (as the word imports,) a great and necessary office of love, especially in those times of affliction and distress, when Christians were made to fly and wander for safety from persecution and enemies, or in travelling to and fro where there were not such public houses for reception as in our days; nor, it may be, had many poor saints sufficiency of their own for such uses; then to receive and entertain them was good and pleasing to God. A lover of good men, or of good things; ministers should be exemplary in both; this will evidence their open piety, and likeness to God, and their Master, Jesus Christ. Sober, or prudent, as the word signifies; a needful grace in a minister, both for his ministerial and personal carriage and management. Just, in things belonging to civil life, and moral righteousness and equity in dealings, giving to all their due. Holy, in what concerns religion; one who reverences and worships God, and is of a spiritual and heavenly conversation. Temperate; it comes from a word that signifies strength, and denotes one who has power over his appetite and affections, or, in things lawful, can, for good ends, restrain and hold them in. And thus of the qualifications respecting the minister's life and manners; what he must not, and what he must, be and do. Now,

II. As to doctrine:

1. Here is his duty, v. 9. keeping close to the doctrine of Christ, the word of his grace; holding it fast in his own belief and profession, and in teaching others. Observe, The Word of God, revealed in the Scripture, is a true and infallible Word, which ministers must hold fast, and hold forth, in their teaching and life. I have kept the faith, was Paul's comfort, 2 Tim. 4:7. and not shunned to declare the whole counsel of God; there was his faithfulness, Acts 20:27.

2. Here is the end, v. 9. to persuade and draw others to the true faith, and convince the contrary minded. We see here summarily the great work of the ministry,—to exhort those who are willing to know and do their duty; and to convince them that contradict; both which are to be done by sound doctrine, in a rational, instructive way, by scripture-arguments and testimonies, which are the infallible words of truth, what all may and should rest and be satisfied in and determined by. And thus of the qualifications of the elders whom Titus was to ordain.

The apostle's directory shows whom he should reject or avoid,—men of another character, the mention of which is brought in as a reason of the care he had recommended about the qualifications of ministers, why they should be such, and only such, as he had described. The reasons he takes both from bad teachers and hearers among them, from v. 10. to the end.

V. 10, 11. 1. Those false teachers are described. They were unruly, headstrong, and ambitious of power, refractory and untractable, (as some render it,) and such as would not bear or submit themselves to the discipline and necessary order in the church, impatient of good government and of sound doctrine. Many such there were, especially pretended converts from the Jews, who yet were for mingling Judaism and Christianity together, and so making a corrupt medley. These were the false teachers. And,

2. There is the apostle's direction how to deal with them, v. 11. Their mouths must be stopped; not by outward force, but by confutation and conviction, showing them their error, not giving place to them even for an hour. In case of obstinacy, indeed, breaking the peace of the church, and corrupting other churches, censures are to have place; the last means for recovering the faulty, and preventing the hurt of many. Observe, Faithful ministers must oppose seducers in good cause a bishop must be so, though the argument would have held strongly in an inverted order.' Doddr.—Self-willed.] Obstinate, morose, and arrogant. Id. after Raphchilus.

V. 10—13. They [the Creteans] united the subtlety of the fox, the venom of the serpent, or the fierceness of wolves and tigers, with the greediness and inactivity of swine.—It is not easy to determine, from what concurrence of circumstances the Creteans obtained so odious and contemptible a national character; but the inspired apostle attested the truth of this testimony; and the effects of it appeared in the conduct of many false teachers and professors of Christianity.—Timothy had been taught to instruct opposers with meekness, and to rebuke with long-11 Whose mouths must be stopped, who subvert whole houses, teaching things which they ought not, for filthy lucre's sake.

12 One of themselves, even a prophet of their own, said, The Cretians are always liars, evil beasts, slow bellies.

13 This witness is true. Wherefore rebuke them sharply; that they may be sound in the faith, 14 Not giving heed to Jewish fables, and commandments of men, that turn from the truth.

15 Unto the pure all things are pure: but unto them that are defiled and unbelieving is nothing pure; but even their mind and conscience is defiled.

16 They profess that they know God; but in works they deny him, being abominable, and disobedient, and unto every good work reprobate.

time, that, their folly being made manifest, they may proceed no further.

3. The reasons for this. (1.) From the pernicious effects of their errors; They subvert whole houses, teaching things they ought not; the necessity of circumcision, and of keeping the law of Moses; so subverting the Gospel and souls of men; not some few only, but whole families. (2.) Their base end in what they do; for filthy lucre's sake, serving a worldly interest under pretence of religion; love of money is the root of all evil. Most fit it is, that such should be resisted, confuted, and put to shame, by sound doctrine, and reasons from the Scriptures. Thus of the grounds respecting the had teachers.

In reference to their people or hearers, who are described from ancient testimony given of them:

V. 12—14. I. Here is the witness, v. 12. one of the Cretians, not of the Jews, Epimenides, a Greek poet, likely to know, and unlikely to slander them: a prophet of their own; so their poets were accounted writers of divine oracles. These often witnessed against the vices of the people: Aratus, Epimenides, and others among the Greeks; Horace, Juvenal, and Persius, among the Latins: much smartness did they use against divers vices.

II. Here is the matter of his testimony,—The Cretians are always liars, evil beasts, slow bellies; to a proverb they were infamous for falsehood and lying. To play the Cretian, or to lie, is the same; and they were compared to evil beasts, for their sly hurtfulness and savage nature; and called slow bellies, for their laziness and sensuality, more inclined to eat than to work, and live by some honest employment. Observe, Such scandalous vices as were the reproach of heathens, should be far from Christians. And,

III. Here is the verification of this by the apostle himself, v. 13. The apostle saw too much ground for that character. The temper of some nations is more inclined to some vices than others. The Cretians were too generally such as here described, slothful and ill-natured, false and perfidious, as the apostle himself vouches. And thence,

IV. He instructs Titus how to deal with them; Wherefore rebuke them sharply. When Paul wrote to Timothy, he bade him instruct with meekness; but now, when he writes to Titus, he bids him rebuke them sharply. The reason of the difference may be taken either from the different temper of Timothy and Titus; or rather, it was from the difference of the ease and people. Timothy had a more polite people to deal with, and therefore he must rebuke them with meekness; Titus a more rough and uncultivated people; and therefore he must rebuke them sharply. There must, in reproving, be a distinguishing between sins and sins, and between sinners and sinners. Wisdom, therefore, is requisite to temper and manage reproofs aright, as may be most likely to do good, Jude 22: 23. The Cretians' sins and corruptions were many, great, and habitual; therefore they must be rebuked sharply. But that such direction might not be misconstrued,

V. Here is the end of it noted, v. 14. that they may be, and show themselves, truly and effectually changed from such evil temper and manners as those Cretians in their natural state lived in, and might not adhere to or regard (as some might be too ready to do) the Jewish traditions, and superstitions of the Pharisees, which would be apt to make them disrelish the Gospel, and the sound and wholesome truths of it. Observe, The sharpest reproofs must aim at the good of the reprov'd: soundness in the faith is most desirable and necessary; and a special mean thereto is, to turn away the ear from fables and the fancies of men, 1 Tim. 1: 4. such: 4: 7. Fancies and devices of men in the worship of God, are contrary to truth and piety. Observe, A fearful judgment it is, to be turned away from the truth. Who hath bewitched you, said Paul to the Galatians, ch. 3: 1. that ye should not obey the truth? Having begun in the Spirit, are ye made perfect by the flesh?

VI. He gives the reason for all this, from the liberty we have by the Gospel, from legal observances, and the evil and mischief of a Jewish spirit under the Christian dispensation, in the two last verses.

V. 15, 16. To good Christians, sound in the faith, and thereby purified, all things are pure; meats and drinks, and such things as were forbidden under the law, in these there is now no such distinction, all are pure, lawful and free in their use; but to them that are defiled and unbelieving, nothing is pure: things lawful and good they abuse and turn to sin, because their mind and conscience, those leading faculties, are defiled; a taint is derived to all they do, Prov. 15: 8. and ch. 21: 4. The ploughing of the wicked is sin, not in itself, but as done by him; the earliness of the mind and heart mars all the labor of the hand.

Objection. But are not these Judaizers, as ye call them, men who profess religion, and speak well of God and Christ, and righteousness of life, and should they be so severely taxed? Answer, v. 16. There are many who in word and tongue profess to know God, and yet in their lives and conversations deny and reject Him: their practice is a contradiction to their profession, Ezek. 33: 31. The apostle, instructing Titus to rebuke sharply, does himself rebuke sharply; he gives them very hard words; yet, doubtless, no harder than their case warranted, and their need required. Being abom-

PRACT. OBS. All, who are not the slaves of sin and Satan, are 'the servants of God': 'this honor have all his saints,' and this dignifies their meanest employments, Is. 54:15—17. John 12:23—25. Rom. 6:16—19. Col. 3:22—25, though the office of ministers is confined to a few, and that of apostles and evangelists to a very small number.—When a multitude of captives are brought forth, from the dark dungeon of Satan, into the glorious light and liberty of the Gospel; many things will be wanting, and much will require to 'be set in order,' before their worship and service can be performed in a suitable manner, the best methods used for their edification, and the most effectual defense made against the assaults of their spiritual enemies. Then the presence, counsel, and influence of experienced and faithful servants of God will be peculiarly useful; especially in respect of the choice and ordination of pastors, to preside over them and teach them.—It is peculiarly incumbent on ministers to educate their children with diligence and piety, and to rule them with prudence and firmness: and the children of ministers should consider what a dreadful account must be rendered by them, if their unbelief, riot, and unruly behavior bring an imputation on suffering; 1 Tim. 5:1,2. 2 Tim. 2:23—26. but Titus was ordered to rebuke with sharpness. Some have conjectured, that Timothy was too vehement in his natural spirit, and Titus too timid and pliant: others ascribe the difference to the opposite characters of the persons to be rebuked. But, in fact, Christian meekness is as distant from pusillanimous connivance at sin and error, as from impetuous anger and impatience. This, the apostle's conduct, and even that of our Lord Himself, fully demonstrate. Jam. 3:17,18.

(10.) Bl. understands this of Judaizers, and adds, 'that Crete, standing midway between Palestine and the civilized world, and so opportune for both, should swarm with Jews, were of itself probable, and it is confirmed by Josephus and Philo.' Ed.

(12.) 'To Cretise, or imitate the Cretians, was a proverbial expression among the ancients for lying. The words poet and prophet were often used promiscuously by the Greeks and Romans. Some fragments of Epimenides, have come down to us, among which is what is here quoted from a work entitled, concerning oracles; and he seems to have been regarded as a prophet rather than a poet. Patey notices the similarity of making this quotation from a Cretian poet, to the apostle's quoting a poet of their own at Athens.' HENRY, a'v.—Evil beasts, slow bellies. It is evident the poet here suggested a remarkable contrast, to shew what a mixture there was of fierceness and luxury in the character of the Cretians. Savage beasts are generally nimble and active; but these men, while they had the fury of lions and tigers, indulged so much in the character of their fathers, interfere with their usefulness, and thus occasion the ruin of immortal souls.—In all ages, there have been 'unruly and vain talkers and deceivers,' by whom Satan sows tares in the Lord's field: and this should teach and induce the servants of God to be vigilant and diligent, that they may counteract the enemy.—The true Christian learns to exercise his liberty in a pure and holy manner; all things are 'pure to him,' and grace teaches him 'to eat, and to drink, and to do all to the glory of God'; and when he fails, he has humble recourse to the purifying blood and sanctifying grace of Christ. But unbelievers are 'defiled in their minds and consciences'; their ordinary notions and religious duties are unclean to them: whether they riot in licentiousness, as if that were liberty; or whether they enslave themselves to superstitious observances. For alas! numbers, of various descriptions, 'profess to know God, but in works deny Him; being abominable, disobedient, and unto every good work reprobate.' But at last 'the tree will be known by its fruit; and every tree that bringeth not forth good fruit, shall be hewn down, and cast into the fire.' SCOTT.

the most sordid idleness and intemperance; that they grew (as it were) all belly: and, like a breed of swine common in the eastern countries, were often so burdened with fat, that they could hardly move.' DODDR. The Egyptians represented a man who thus made a god of the alimentive propensity, as an unwieldy, big-bellied swine, waddling upon his hind feet. Ed.

(13.) Rebuke them sharply. On the difference between Paul's instruction here to Titus, and his instruction to Timothy, see on 2 Tim. 4:2. to which may be added here, from Doddr., that 'there is a degree of long-suffering and gentleness, very consistent with all that severity which faithfulness requires; which is not that of boisterous passion, ill-nature and scurrility, but of meek, though resolute zeal for God, and friendship for the offender, which yet will not be silenced by trifling excuses, nor fail seriously to represent the fatal consequences that may attend the evil reprov'd.' Id.

V. 14—16. The unbelieving Jews seem to have been primarily intended; but the Judaizing teachers were purposely included as unbelievers, also, though they professed to believe.—(14) Turn from the truth. Some render it pervert or subvert the truth: yet the word occurs in a like construction in the text referred to, where it evidently means turn away from. SCOTT.

(15, 16.) In works deny God. Paul is speaking of a class which contains many grades, from the openly licentious, to the honorable in the eyes of the world. 'Amid the manifold varieties of human charac-

inable, deserving that God and good men should turn away their eyes from them as nauseous and offensive. And disobedient, unpersuadable and unbelieving. They might do divers things ; but it was not the obedience of faith, not what was commanded, or short of the command. To every good work reprobate, without skill or judgment [or will] to do anything aright. See the miserable condition of such as have a form of godliness, but not the power ; yet let us not be so ready to fix this charge on others, as careful that it agree not to ourselves ; that there be not in us an evil heart of unbelief, in departing from the living God ; but that we be sincere and without offence till the day of Christ, being filled with the fruits of righteousness, which are by Jesus Christ, unto the glory and praise of God, Phil. 1:10, 11.

CHAP. II. V. 1. Here is the third thing in the matter of the epistle. In the ch. foregoing, the apostle had directed Titus about matters of government, and to set in order the things that were wanting in the churches. Here he exhorts him,

1. Generally, to a faithful discharge of his own office. The adversative particle (but) here, points back to the corrupt teachers : in opposition to them, says he, 'But speak thou the things that become sound doctrine, what is agreeable to the Word, which is pure and uncorrupt, healthful and nourishing to eternal life.' Observe, The true doctrines of the Gospel are sound doctrines, and ministers must be careful to teach only such. If the common talk of Christians must be uncorrupt to the use of edifying, such as may minister grace to the hearers, Eph. 4:29. much more must ministers' preaching be such. Thus the apostle exhorts Titus generally ; and then,

2. Specially and particularly, he instructs him to apply this sound doctrine to several sorts of persons, from v. 2—10. Here is an excellent Christian directory, accommodated to the old and to the young ; to men and women ; to the preacher himself, and unto servants.

V. 2. By aged men some understand elders by office, including deacons, &c. But it is rather to be taken of the aged in years. Old disciples of Christ must conduct themselves in everything agreeably to the Christian doctrine. That the aged men be sober ; not thinking the decays of nature will justify them in any intemperance to repair them ; they must keep measure in things, both for health and for fitness, for counsel and example to the younger. Grove ; levity is unbecoming in any, but especially in the aged ; they should be composed and staid, grave in habit, speech, and behavior ; gaudiness in dress, levity and vanity in the behavior, how unbecoming in their years ! Temperate ; moderate and prudent, one who governs well his passions and affections, so as not to be hurried away by them to anything evil or indecent. Sound in the faith ; sincere and steadfast, constantly adhering to the truth of the Gospel, not fond of novelties, or ready to run into corrupt opinions or parties. Those who are full of years should be full of grace and goodness, the inner man renewing more and more as the outer decays. In charity, or love ; this is fitly joined with faith, which works by, and must be seen in, love, love to God and men, and soundness therein : it must be sincere love, without dissimulation. And in patience. Aged persons are apt to be peevish, fretful, and passionate ; and therefore need to be on their guard against such infirmities and temptations. Faith, love, and patience, are three main Christian graces, and soundness in these is much of gospel-perfection. There is enduring and waiting patience ; both must be looked after ; to bear evils becomingly, and contentedly to want the good till we are fit for it, and it for us, being followers of them who through faith and patience inherit the promises. Thus as to the aged men.

V. 3. Aged women, also, must be instructed and warned. Some by these understand the deaconesses, mostly employed in looking after the poor and tending the sick ; but it is rather to be taken (as we render it) of all aged women professing religion, they must be in behavior as becometh holiness ; both men and women must accommodate their behavior to their profession ; those virtues before recommended to aged men, are not proper to them only, but applicable to both sexes, and to be looked to by aged women as well as men ; women are to hear and learn their duty from the Word, as well as the men : there is not one way of salvation for one sex or sort, and another for another ; but both must learn and practice the same things, both as aged and as Christians ; the virtues and duties are common. That the aged women likewise, as well as the men, be in behavior as becometh holiness ; or as becometh and is proper for holy persons, such as they profess to be, and should be ; keeping a pious decency and decorum in clothing and gesture, in looks and speech, and all their deportment ; and this from an inward principle and habit of holiness, influencing and ordering the outward conduct at all times. Observe, Though express scripture do not occur, or be not brought, for every word, or look, or fashion in particular ; yet general rules there are, according to which all must be ordered, 1 Cor. 10:31. Phil. 4:8. Whatsoever things are beseeching or unbecoming holiness, form a measure and rule of carriage to be looked to. Not false accusers, no calumniators or sowers of discord, slandering and backbiting their neighbors, a great and too common fault. A slanderer is one whose tongue is set on fire of hell : so much, and so directly, do these do the devil's work, that for it the devil's name is given to such. Not given to much wine ; the word denotes such addictedness thereto, as to be under the power and mastery of it. How immodest and shameful, corrupting and destroying purity both of body and mind ! Of what evil example and tendency, unfitting for the next thing, which is a positive duty of aged matrons, to be teachers of good things. Not public preachers, that is forbidden, 1 Cor. 14:34. but otherwise, by example and a good life : besides, they may and should, also, teach by doctrinal instruction at home, and in a private way. Prov. 31:1, 26. Teachers of good things are opposed to teachers of things corrupt, or to what is trifling and vain, of no good use or tendency ; old wives' fables, or superstitious sayings and observances ; in opposition to these, their business is, and they may be called on to it, to be teachers of good things. For,

There are lessons for young women, also, which the aged women must teach, and instruct and advise them in, the duties of religion according to their years.

V. 4, 5. For teaching such things, aged women have often better access than the men, even than ministers have ; therefore, they must improve it in instructing the young women, especially the young wives ; for he speaks of their duty to their husbands and children. These young women, the more aged must teach,

1. To bear a good personal character ; To be sober and discreet, contrary to the vanity and rashness which younger years are subject to : discreet and chaste stand well together ; many expose themselves to fatal temptations, by that which at first might be but indiscretion, Prov. 2:11. Chaste and keepers at home, are well joined too. Diinah, when she went to see the daughters of the land, lost her chastity : there are occasions for going abroad, but a gadding temper for merriment and company sake, to the neglect of domestic affairs, or from meanness at being in her place, that is the opposite evil intended, and is commonly accompanied with, or draws after it, other evils, 1 Tim. 5:13, 14. As their business, they should guide the house, and give no occasion to the enemy to speak reproachfully. Good, generally, in opposition to all vice ; and specially, in her place, kind, helpful, and charitable ; as Doreas, full of good works and almsdeeds. Also, it may have, so some, a more particular sense, one of a meek, and yet cheerful ter, and the number of constitutional principles which enter into its composition, might there not be an individual, in whom the constitutional virtues so blaze forth, and have the ascendancy, [Mar. 10:21, &c.] as to give a general effect of gracfulness to the whole of this moral exhibition ; and yet, may not that individual be as unmindful of his God, as if the principles of his constitution had been mixed up in such different proportion, as to make him an odious and a revolting spectacle ? In a word, might not Sensibility shed forth its tears, and Friendship perform its services, and Liberality impart of its treasures, and Patriotism earn the gratitude of its country, and Honor maintain itself entire and untainted, and all the softening of what is amiable, and all the glories of what is chivalrous and manly, gather into one bright effulgency of moral accomplishment on the person of him, who never, for a moment, subordinates one habit, or one affection, to the will of the Almighty ; [who hath not God in all, or any of his thoughts ;] who is just as careless and as unconcerned about God, as if the native tendencies of his constitution had compounded him a monster of deformity ; and who just as effectually realizes [total depravity] this attribute of rebellion against his Maker, as the most loathsome and profligate of his species, that he walks in the counsel of his own heart, and after the sight of his own eyes ? [For in the same showing out of natural inclinations] you may also observe among the brutes, the gentleness [and benevolence] of one,

the affectionate fidelity of another, the cruel and unrelenting ferocity of a third, [parental love, providence, &c.] and you never question the propriety of language, when some of these instinctive tendencies [note, end of Rom. 7.] are better reported of than others, as more or less amiable and endearing. But it does not once occur to you, that, even in the very best of these exhibitions, there is any sense of God, or that the great master-principle of his authority is at all concerned in it. Mere Virtue without Christianity.

NOTES. CHAP. II. V. 1, 2. To mark the difference between false teachers, and the servants of Christ, the apostle exhorted Titus to 'speak such things as became sound doctrine,' or the salutary, healing truths of the Gospel, from which all the motives and encouragements to holy obedience must be deduced ; and it 'became sound doctrine,' that preachers should inculcate on their hearers the practice of their various duties, from evangelical [not selfish] motives. It does not appear, that the elders or pastors of the church were exclusively intended. The original word is different from that translated elders, and signifies men advanced in years. The apostle had before spoken of the elders. 1:5—9. S.

V. 3—6. They must not be 'enslaved to much wine ;' some of them might have been accustomed to this, when heathens, and it would need great self-denial to acquire victory over the habit, and liberty from the thralldom, of this infatuating vice. (3) Behavior. Here only. 'It sig-spirit and temper, not sullen, or bitter, or taunting, or fretting and galling any; not of a troublesome or jarring disposition, uneasy in herself and to those about her; but of a good nature, and pleasing conversation, and likewise helpful by her advice and pains: thus building her house, and doing her husband good, and not evil, all her days. Thus, in their personal character, sober, discreet, chaste, keepers at home, and good: and,

2. In their relative capacities, to love their husbands, and to be obedient to them: and where there is true love, this will be no difficult command. God, in nature, and by his will, hath made this subordination, 1 Tim. 2: 12. Gen. 3: 16. It is therefore doubly enjoined: first in innocency, when was settled a subordination of nature, Adam being first formed, and then Eve, and the woman out of the man: and then upon the fall, the woman being first in the transgression, and seducing the man; here now began to be a subjection not so easy and comfortable, being part of the penalty in her case; yet through Christ is this nevertheless a sanctified state, Eph. 5: 22. God would have a resemblance of Christ's authority over the church, held forth in the husband's over the wife. Therefore as the church is subject unto Christ, so let the wives be unto their own husbands, as is fit in the Lord, Col. 3: 18. as stands with the law of Christ, and is for his and the Father's glory. It is not, then, an absolute, or unlimited, or a slavish subjection that is required; but a loving subordination, to prevent disorder or confusion, and to further all the ends of the relation. Thus, in reference to the husbands, wives must be instructed in their duties of love and subjection to them. And to love their children, not with a natural affection, only, but a spiritual; a love springing from a holy, sanctified heart, and regulated by the Word; not a fond, foolish love, indulging them in evil, neglecting due reproof and correction where necessary; but it must be a regular Christian love, showing itself in their pious education, forming their life and manners aright, taking care of their souls as well as of their bodies, of their spiritual welfare as well as of their temporal; of the former, chiefly, and in the first place. The reason is added, nifies the raiment, the gait, and the whole demeanor. The physicians used the word for habit of body, or constitution. Leigh. SCOTT.

(5.) Obedient to their own husbands.] 'As in all societies there may be differences of opinion, even where the harmony of feeling remains unimpaired, so there may be differences of opinion here [in the married state]. Where such differences of opinion exist, there must be some ultimate appeal. In ordinary societies, such questions are settled by a numerical majority. But as, in this case, such a decision is impossible, some other principle must be adopted. The right of deciding, must rest with either the one or the other. As the husband is the individual who is responsible to civil society; as his intercourse with the world is of necessity greater; the voice of nature and of revelation unite in conferring the right of ultimate authority upon him. By this arrangement, the happiness of the wife is increased no less than that of the husband. Her —that the Word of God may not be blasphemed. Failures in such relative duties would be greatly to the reproach of Christianity. The Word of God and Gospel of Christ are pure, excellent, and glorious, in themselves; and their excellency should be expressed and shown in the lives and conduct of their professors, especially in relative duties; failures here bring disgrace, Rom. 2: 24. Thus would Christ be wounded in the house of his friends. Thus of the duties of the younger women.

V. 6. They are apt to be eager and hot, thoughtless and precipitant; therefore must be earnestly called on and exhorted to be considerate, not rash; advisable and submissive, not wilful and headstrong; humble and mild, not haughty and proud; more young people are ruined by pride than by any other sin. The young should be grave and solid in their deportment and manners, joining the seriousness of age with the liveliness and vigor of youth. This will make even those younger years to pass to good purpose, and yield matter of comfortable reflection, when the evil days come; it will be preventive of much sin and sorrow, and lay the ground for doing and enjoying much good. Such shall not mourn at the last, but have peace and comfort in death, and after it a glorious crown of life. With these instructions to Titus, respecting what he should teach others,—the apostle inserts some directions to himself.

V. 7, 8. 1. Here is direction for his conversation; In all things showing thyself a pattern of good works. Observe, Preachers of good works must be patterns of them also; good doctrine and good life must go together. In all things; some read above all things, or above all men. Instructing and informing others in the particulars of their duty, is necessary, and, above all things, example, especially that of the teacher himself, is needful; hereby both light and influence are more likely to go together. Ministers must be examples to the flock, and the people followers of them, as they are of Christ. And here is direction,

2. For his teaching and doctrine, as well as for his life; In doctrine, showing uncorruptness, gravity, sincerity, sound speech, that cannot be condemned. They must make it appear that this office was not entered into, or used, with secular views, but from a pure aim at the spiritual ends of its institution: therefore, the display of wit, or parts, or of human learning or oratory, is not to be affected; but sound speech must be used, which cannot be condemned; scripture-language, as far as well may be, in expressing scripture-truths. This is sound speech, that cannot be condemned. We have more than once these duties of a minister set together, 1 Tim. 4: 12, 16. 2 Tim. 3: 10. Their teaching must be agreeable to the Word, and their life with the teaching. This is the true and good minister, 1 Thess. 2: 9, 10. The next words show:

3. The reason, both for the strictness of the minister's life, and the gravity and soundness of his preaching. Adversaries would be seeking occasion to reflect, and would do so, could they find anything amiss in doctrine or life; but if both were right and good, such ministers might set calumny itself at defiance. Observe, Faithful ministers will have enemies watching for their halting, who will endeavor to find or pick holes in their teaching or behavior; the more need, therefore, for them to look to themselves, that no just occasion be found against them. This is the direction to Titus himself, and so of the duties of free persons, male and female, old and young. Then follow the directions respecting servants.

V. 9, 10. In this direction to Titus, there are the duties themselves, to which he must exhort servants, and a weighty consideration, wherewith he was to enforce them.

1. The duties themselves are these:

(1.) To be obedient to their own masters. This is the prime duty, that by which they are characterized, Rom. 6: 16. There must be inward subjection, and dutiful respect and reverence in the mind and thoughts. This must be in servants; their will must be subject to their master's will, and their time and labor at their master's disposal and command, 1 Pet. 2: 18. The duty results from the will of God, and the relation in which, by his providence, He has put such; not from the quality of the person. Servants, therefore, are to be exhorted to be obedient to their own masters. And,

(2.) To please them well in all things, in all lawful things, and such as belong to them to command; or, at least, are not contrary to the will of their great and superior Lord. If his command and the earthly master's come in competition, we are instructed to obey God rather than man; but servants, then, must be on good grounds in this, that there is an inconsistency, else are they not held to be excused. And not only must the will of God be the measure of the servant's obedience, but the reason of it also; all must be done with a respect to Him, in virtue of his authority, and for pleasing Him primarily and chiefly, Col. 3: 22—24. In serving the earthly master according to Christ's will, He is served; and such shall be rewarded by Him accordingly.

But how are servants to please their masters in all things, and yet not be men-pleasers? Answer, Men-pleasers, in the faulty sense, are such as eye men alone, or chiefly, in what they do, leaving God out, or subordinating Him to man; this is sinful man-pleasing, which all must take heed of, Eph. 6: 5—7. Observe, therefore, Christian liberty stands well with civil servitude and subjection. Persons may serve men, and yet be the servants of Christ; these are not contrary, but subordinate; so far as serving men is according to Christ's will, and for his sake. Servants, therefore, should be faithful and cheerful in the station wherein God hath set them; striving to please their masters in all things. Hard it may be, under some churlish Nabals, but it must be endeavored, all that they are able.

(3.) Not answering again; not contradicting, or disputing; not giving any disrespectful or provoking language. When conscious of a fault, to palliate or stand in justification of it, doubles it. Yet this not answering again, excludes not turning away wrath with a soft answer, when season and circumstances admit. Good and wise masters will be ready to hear and do right; but answering unseasonably, or in an unseemly power is always greatest in concession. She is graceful and attractive, while meek and gentle; but when angered and turbulent, she loses the fascination [and with it the influence] of her own sex, without attaining to the dignity of the other. "A woman moved, is like a fountain troubled, muddy, ill-seeming, and bereft of beauty." Shakespeare. Law of Marriage; in Elts. Mor Sci. WAYLAND.

V. 9, 10. Eph. 6: 5—9. Col. 3: 22—25. 1 Tim. 6: 1—5. 1 Pet. 2: 18—25. 'Purloining,' or pillering, in the absence of their masters, such things as were put under their care, or within their reach; either to apply them to their own use, or to bestow them on their companions. This species of stealing was so common among the heathen servants, that the same word sometimes signifies a slave, which is generally rendered a thief; and it is to be apprehended, that it is extremely common, even among servants who are called Christians, few of whom are scrupulous about manner, or, where the case admits not excuse to be pert or confident, shows a want of the humility and meekness, which such relation requires.

(4.) Not purloining, but showing all good fidelity. This is another great essential of good servants, to be honest; never converting that to their own use, which is their masters', nor wasting the goods they are intrusted with: that is purloining. They must be just and true, and do for them as they would or should for themselves, Prov. 28:24. Having light thought of taking beyond what is right, though it be from a parent or master, is likely to harden conscience to go further; it is both wicked in itself, and tends to more; servants must not be their own carvers, or go about by theft to right themselves; they must commit their cause to God for righting and providing for them, except for preserving life, the necessities for which the servant has a right to. Faithfulness in a servant, lies in the ready, punctual, and thorough execution of his master's orders; keeping his secrets and counsels, despatching his affairs, and managing with frugality, and to as much just advantage for his master as he is able; looking well to his trusts, and preventing, as far as he can, all spoil, or loss, or damage. This is a way to bring a blessing on himself, as the contrary often brings utter ruin, Luke 16:12. Thus of the duties themselves, to which servants are to be exhorted. Then,

2. Here is the consideration with which Titus was to enforce them; That they may adorn the doctrine of God our Savior in all things; recommend the Gospel to the good opinion of them that are without, by their meek, humble, obedient, and faithful conduct in all things. Servants may think, such as they, so low and inferior, can do little to bring repute to Christianity; yet, if careful to do their duty, it will redound to the glory of God, and the credit of religion. The unbelieving masters would think the better of that despised way, when they found their servants who were Christians, better than their other servants, more obedient, submissive, just, faithful, and diligent. Thus of the apostle's directions to Titus, about the discharge of his office, in reference to several sorts of persons. Next follow,

3. The grounds or considerations on which all the directions are urged, taken from the nature and design of the Gospel, and the end of Christ's death.

V. 11—14. 1. Here are motives from the nature and design of the Gospel. Let young and old, men and women, masters and servants, and Titus himself; let all sorts do their respective duties, for this is the very aim and business of Christianity, to instruct, help, and form persons, under all distinctions and relations, to a right frame and conduct. For this,

(1.) They are put under the dispensation of the grace of God, so the Gospel is called, Eph. 3:2. It is grace in respect of the spring of it, and as the means of conveying and working grace in the hearts of believers. Grace is obliging and constraining to goodness, Rom. 6:12—14. The love of Christ constrains us not to live to self, but to Him, 2 Cor. 5:14, 15. without this effect, grace is received in vain.

(2.) This gospel-grace brings salvation; it reveals, offers, and ensures it to believers; salvation from sin and wrath, from death and hell; whence it is called the Word of life; it brings to faith, and so to life; the life of holiness now, and of happiness hereafter. And more inexcusable will the neglecters of this grace of God bringing salvation, now be, since,

(3.) It hath appeared, or shone out, more clearly and illustriously than ever before. The old dispensation was comparatively dark and shadowy; this is a clear and shining light; and as it is now more bright, so more diffused and extensive also. For,

(4.) It hath appeared to all men; not to the Jews only, as the glory of God appeared at mount Sinai to that particular people, and out of the view of all others; but to all, Gentiles as well as Jews. The publication of it is free and general; Disciple all nations; Preach the Gospel to every creature. The pale is broken down; there is no such inclosure now as formerly, Rom. 16:26. The doctrine of grace and salvation by the Gospel is for all ranks and conditions of men; therefore engaging and encouraging all to receive and believe it, and walk suitably to it, adorning it in all things.

(5.) This gospel-revelation is to teach, and not by way of information and instruction only, as a schoolmaster does his scholars; but by way of precept and command, as a sovereign who gives laws unto his subjects. The Gospel is not for speculation only or chiefly, but for practice, and right ordering of life. It teaches,

[1.] To abandon sin; Denying ungodliness, and worldly lusts; to renounce, and have no more to do with these, as we have had; an earthly, sensual conversation suits not a heavenly calling. They that are Christ's have crucified the flesh with the affections and lusts. They have done it by covenant-engagement and promise, and have initially and prevailingly done it in act; they are going on in the work, cleansing themselves more and more from all filthiness of flesh and spirit. Thus the Gospel first teaches that which is evil, to abandon sin; and then,

[2.] To make conscience of that which is good; To live soberly, righteously, and godly, in this present world. Religion is not made up of negatives only; there must be doing good as well as eschewing evil; in these conjunctly is sincerity proved, and the Gospel adorned. Living soberly, with respect to ourselves, in the due government of our appetites and passions; righteously, towards all men, injuring none, but doing good to others, according to our ability and their need. We are members one of another, and must seek every man another's wealth, 1 Cor. 10:24. 12:25. The public, especially, which includes the interest of all, must have the regards of all. Selfishness is a sort of unrighteousness; it robs others of that share in us which is their due. Live righteously, therefore, as well as soberly. And godly toward God, in the duties of his worship and service. Regards to Him, indeed, should run through all, 1 Cor. 10:31. Personal and relative duties must be done in obedience to his commands, with due aim at pleasing and honoring Him, from principles of holy love and fear of Him. This is godliness, looking and coming to God, as our state now is, not immediately, but as He has manifested Himself in Christ; so does the Gospel direct and require. To go to God any other way, that is, by saints or angels, is unsuitable, yea, contrary to the gospel-rule and warrant. See in how little a compass our duty is comprised; it is put into few words, denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, and living soberly, righteously, and godly, in this present world. The Gospel teaches us not only how to believe and hope well, but also to live well, as becomes that faith and hope, in this present world, but as expectants of another and better. There is the world that now is, and that which is to come: the present is the time and place of our trial, and the Gospel teaches us to live well here, but not as our final state, but with an eye chiefly to a future. For,

[3.] It teaches in all to look for the glories of another world, to which a sober, righteous, and godly life in this is preparative; Looking for that blessed hope, and the glorious appearing of the great God and our Savior Jesus Christ. Hope, by a metonymy, is put for the thing hoped for, that is, heaven, called emphatically that hope, because it is the great thing we look, and long, and wait for; and a blessed hope, because, when attained, we shall be completely happy for ever. And the glorious appearing of the great God and our Savior Jesus Christ. This denotes both the time of the accomplishing our hope, and the sureness and greatness of it. It will be at the second appearing of Christ, when He shall come in his own glory, and in his Father's, and of the holy angels, Luke 9:26. His first coming was in meanness, to satisfy justice, and purchase happiness; his second will be in majesty, to bestow and instate his people in it, Heb. 9:28. The great God and our Savior (or even our Savior) Jesus Christ; for they are not two subjects, but one only, as appears by the single article, and so 1 Cor. 15:24. When He shall have delivered up the kingdom to God, even the Father. Christ, then, is the great God, not figuratively, as magistrates and others are sometimes called gods, or as appearing and acting in the name of God, but properly and absolutely the true God, 1 John 5:20. The mighty God, Isa. 9:6. Who, being in the form of God, thought it not robbery to be equal with God, Phil. 2:6. In his second coming, He will reward his servants, and bring them to glory with Him. At, and in, the glorious appearing of Christ will the using or disposing of the provisions of the family, contrary to the intentions and interests of their masters; nay, frequently they affect the praise and pride of generosity, by giving away the property of their masters to dishonest hangers on, who acknowledge the obligation by reciprocal favors. But Christian servants must be taught strict honesty in these things.

(10.) Purloining. [No term better represents the sense than purloining, which, though it designates theft of every kind, especially adverts to that too common form of it, by which servants defraud their masters in buying or selling, or such other frauds as are denoted by the Latin antevertere.] BLOOMF.—'The term is used of Ananias' secretly a part, where the whole was pretended to be returned; which servants, at least among the heathens, might probably do when employed by their masters to vend commodities.' DODDR.—'Unfaithfulness in that which is little, and unfaithfulness in that which is much, are very far from being regarded, as they were by our Great Teacher of righteousness, Lu.

16:10. under the same aspect of criminality. For a master will bear with all the less liberties of his servants, so long as he feels them to be harmless; and it is not till he is awakened to the apprehension of personal injury from the amount or frequency of the embezzlements, that his moral indignation is at all sensibly awakened. How much of mercantile righteousness is of such filthy rags; how much is founded on the idolatry of self; how vast a majority of all equitable dealing is on the principle of selfishness!' CHALMERS.

V. 11, 12. The holy law of God, indeed, teaches men to love God and each other; but, requiring perfect obedience, it gives sinners neither injunction nor encouragement to repentance, and to 'works meet for repentance,' or to deny ungodliness and worldly lusts. It shuts them up under sin, and leaves them in that state, without hope or help; for every command, counsel, and encouragement to a sinner, properly belongs not to the law, but to 'the saving grace of God,' according to the gos- SCOTT. pel. 3:6—14, 19—22.

blessed hope of Christians be attained; for their felicity will be that, To be where He is, and to behold his glory, John 17:24. The glory of the great God and our Savior will then break out as the sun. Though, in the exercise of his judiciary power, He will appear as the Son of Man, yet will He be mightily declared to be the Son of God too. Christians are marked by this,—expecting their Master's coming, Mat. 24:45. Loving his appearance, 2 Tim. 4:8. Let us, then, look to this hope; the day or hour we know not, but He that shall come, will come, and will not tarry, Heb. 10:37. Observe, The comfort and joy of Christians are, that their Savior is the great God, and will gloriously manifest Himself at his second coming. Were He not thus the great God, and not a mere creature, He could not be their Savior, or their Hope. Thus of the considerations to enforce the directions for all sorts, to their respective duties, from the nature and design of the Gospel, which is to teach and persuade to those things. And herewith is connected another ground:

2. From the end of Christ's death, v. 14. To bring us to holiness and happiness was the end of Christ's death, as well as the scope of his doctrine. Here we have,

(1.) The Purchaser of salvation; Jesus Christ, that great God, and our Savior, who saves not simply as God, much less as Man alone; but as God-man, two natures in one Person; Man, that He might obey, and suffer, and die, for man; and God, that He might support the manhood, give worth and efficacy to his undertakings, have due regard to the rights and honor of the Deity,

PRACT. OBS. It 'becomes sound doctrine,' and it is indispensably incumbent on ministers, to teach all Christians their several relative duties, in connexion with evangelical principles.—In proportion as Christians advance in years, they are supposed to understand better what behavior, appearance, attire, and language 'become holiness.'—The excellence of true religion is manifested, when every one is taught and induced by it to attend on the duties of their several situations, and elderly persons are under strong obligations to be teachers of good things to their juniors, by word and deed.—Uncorrupt doctrine, even 'the Word of the truth of the Gospel,' should be manifestly made the basis of practical exhortations, which ought to be delivered with gravity, as well as with sincerity, and wholly remote from all levity, or affectation of wit and humor, that 'sound speech, which cannot be condemned,' may put to shame and silence captious and malicious opposers. 1 Cor. 14:20—25.—As no rank in the community raises men above the minister's admonition, so none places them beneath his attention. The conduct of the [lowest] servant may disgrace, or it may 'adorn, the doctrine of God our Savior.'—The divine law teaches us godliness, righteousness, temperance, and universal holiness; but the 'grace of as well as the good of his creatures, and bring about the latter to the glory of the former. Such a one became us, and this was,

(2.) The price of our redemption; He gave Himself; the Father gave Him, but He gave Himself too, John 10:17, 18. so John 17:19. The human nature was the offering, and the divine the altar, sanctifying the gift, and the whole the act of the Person. He who was God, suffered, though not as God. The acts and properties of either nature are attributed to the person. God purchased his church with his own blood, Acts 20:28. 1 Tim. 2:6. He was the Priest and Sacrifice too. We are redeemed, not with silver and gold, but the precious blood of Christ, 1 Pet. 1:18, 19. called the blood of God, Acts 20:28. of Him who is God.

(3.) The persons for whom: For us, poor perishing sinners, gone off from God, and turned rebels against Him; for us, not only for our good, but in our stead, 1 Pet. 3:18. 2 Cor. 5:21. Wonderful condescension and grace! He loved us, and gave Himself for us; what can we do less than love and give up ourselves to Him? Especially considering,

(4.) The ends of his giving Himself for us, [1.] That He might redeem us from all iniquity. To love and live in sin, is to trample under foot redeeming blood, to despise and reject one of the greatest benefits of it, and to act counter to its design. Happy end and fruit of Christ's death, redemption from all iniquity! Christ died for this; and,

[2.] To purify to Himself a peculiar people. Christ died to purify, as well as to pardon; to obtain grace, to heal the nature, as well as to free from guilt and condemnation. He gave Himself for his church, to cleanse it. Thus does He make to Himself a peculiar people, by purifying them. Observe, Redemption from sin, and sanctification of the nature, go together, and both make a peculiar people unto God: freedom from guilt and condemnation, and from the power of lusts, and purification of soul by the Spirit.

[3.] Zealous of good works. This peculiar people, as they are made so by grace purifying them, so must they be seen to be so, by doing good, and a zeal therein. Observe, The Gospel is not a doctrine of licentiousness, but of holiness and good life. Let us see, then, that we do good, and have zeal in it; only looking that zeal be guided by knowledge and spirited with love, directed to the glory of God, and always in some good thing. And thus of the motive to the duties directed, from the end of Christ's death. Then,

[4.] The apostle closes the ch., as he began it, with a summary direction to Titus on the whole.

V. 15. Here is the matter and manner of ministers' teaching, and a special instruction to Titus in reference to himself.

1. The matter of ministers' teaching; These things, that is, the before-mentioned; not Jewish fables and traditions, but the truths and duties of the Gospel, of avoiding sin, and living soberly, righteously, and godly, in this present world. Observe, Ministers, in their preaching, must keep close to the Word of God, 1 Pet. 4:11. If any man speak, let him speak as the oracles of God, and not the figments and inventions of his own brain.

2. The manner; by doctrine, and exhortation, and reproof with all authority, 2 Tim. 3:16. Here is what will furnish for all parts of his duty, and the right discharge of them. The great and necessary truths and duties of the Gospel, especially, these speak and exhort, press with much earnestness. Ministers must not be cold and lifeless in delivering heavenly doctrine and precepts, as if they were indifferent things or of little concern; but must urge them with earnestness suitable to their nature and importance. And rebuke; convince and reprove such as contradict or gainsay, or neglect and receive not the truth, as they should, or retain it in unrighteousness, who hear it not with such a believing and obedient mind and heart as they ought. Rebuke with all authority, as coming in the name of God, and armed with his threatenings and discipline, which whoever make light of it, at their peril it will be.

3. Here is a special instruction to Titus in reference to himself; Let no man despise thee; give no occasion to do so, nor suffer it without reproof, considering that he who despiseth, despiseth not man, but God. Or thus: Speak and exhort these things; press them on all, as they may respectively be concerned; with boldness and faithfulness reprove sin; and carefully look to thyself and thy own conduct, and then none will despise thee.

Perhaps, too,—an admonition might be

God which bringeth salvation' alone 'teaches us' sinners, 'to deny ungodliness, and worldly lusts, and to live 'soberly, righteously, and godly in this present world.' How greatly then are they mistaken, who would inculcate these practical subjects, without leading men's attention primarily to the mercy and grace of God in Christ, for instruction, motives, help, and encouragement; thus vainly expecting good fruit from the ungrafted crab-stock!—The more evidently we are 'redeemed from all iniquity, and purified' unto Christ 'as a peculiar people, zealous of good works,' the clearer will our evidence be of an interest in his righteousness and atonement; and the brighter our hope of eternal felicity, and the further we are removed from boasting, or trusting in imaginary good works, that we may glory in Christ alone; the more zealous shall we become, of abounding in real good works; performed in an upright, humble, believing manner, to the glory of our Lord, and the benefit of his people, and of mankind. May all ministers speak these things decidedly, enforce them with earnestness, and 'rebuke' opposers and perverters of the Gospel, and also negligent Christians, 'with all authority;' and may their doctrine and example secure them from the contempt of all, except that of the avowed despisers of Christ and his salvation! Sc.

V. 13. The great God and our Savior Jesus Christ. 'The most natural and obvious interpretation is surely that of the ancients (except the Arians, &c.) and all the earlier moderns, (except the heterodox, and also Erasm. and Grot., who appeal to Hilary and Ambros.) namely, "the glorious appearing of our great God and Savior Jesus Christ." And surely, if the doctrine of the article, propounded by the learned prelate [Bp. Middleton] have any truth, (as it undoubtedly has some,) no other version can be admitted. But, waving that argument, great weight ought, in this case, to be ascribed to the opinion of the Greek heathens, certainly the best judges of the nice proprieties of their language. The argument used by Beza and Whitby, that appearing [the original epiphaneia] is nowhere used in the New Test. of God, but of Christ, has never been answered, and is, I think, unanswerable. For it is in vain to urge, that not God, but the glory of God is spoken of; since glory is there, by a common Hebraism, put [as in the English translation] for the adjective glorious, and belongs to appearing. This too is fully supported by the authority of Greek fathers; and Theoph. observes, that this is called his glorious advent, (as Mat. 25:31.) in opposition to his first advent in humility (in the flesh). Comp. 2 Tim. 4:9. . . I cannot but suspect that all our translators, have been influenced more than they were aware, by an argument, specious, indeed, and employed by the maintainers of the new version, namely, that Jesus Christ is nowhere styled the great God. To which I would answer, that the great, belonging to both God and Savior, alters the ease, and removes the objection. The sense is plainly this: "the glorious appearance of that GREAT BEING, who is our GOD AND SAVIOR." I cannot omit to observe, that the who, just after, countenances this version; since, had two persons been spoken of, it would have been harsh to have suspended on that sentence a clause, in which one only was meant.' BLOOMF.—'This interpretation, [that set forth above,] was the only one ever set forth in all the ancient churches.' WADSWORTH, in Henry, abr.

V. 14. Surely these vs. are calculated, in the most conclusive and affecting manner, to lead us to the confession of Christ by Thomas, 'My Lord, and my God!'—The view of Christ, as Judge, in the preceding v., and in this v., as He, to whom all believers are devoted, 'to live no longer to themselves but to Him,' as 'a peculiar people, zealous of good works,' concur to establish this conclusion; for 'JEHOVAH will not give his glory to another.' 2 Cor. 5:13—15.

V. 15. Authority.] 1:3. Rom. 16:26. 1 Cor. 7:6, 25. 2 Cor. 8:3. 'Not as a counsel, but with all the peremptoriness of command.' Leigh. Sc.

CHAP. III.

1 Titus is yet further directed by Paul, both concerning the things he should teach, and not teach. 10 He is willed also to reject obstinate heretics: 12 which done, he appointed him both time and place, wherein he should come unto him, and so concludeth.

PUT them in mind to be subject to principalities and powers, to obey magistrates, to be ready to every good work,

2 To speak evil of no man, to be no brawlers, but gentle, shewing all meekness unto all men.

3 For we ourselves also were sometimes foolish, disobedient, de-here intended to the people; that Titus, though young, and but a substitute of the apostle, yet should not be contemned by them, but considered and respected as a faithful minister of Christ, and encouraged and supported in his work and office, 1 Thes. 5: 12, 13. Mind the teaching of such, respect their persons, support them in their function, and, what in you lies, further their endeavors for the honor of God and the salvation of souls.

CHAP. III. V. 1, 2. Here is the fourth thing in the matter of the epistle. The apostle had directed Titus in reference to the particular and special duties of several sorts of persons; now he bids him exhort to what concerned them more in common; to quietness and submission to rulers, and readiness to do good, and to equitable and gentle behavior towards all men; things comely and ornamental of religion; he must therefore put them in mind of such things. Ministers, as they are remembrancers for the people to God in prayers, Isa. 62: 6. so are they from God to them in preaching, 2 Pet. 1: 12. Forgetfulness of duty is a common frailty; there is need, therefore, of reminding and quickening them thereto. Here are the duties themselves, and the reasons of them.

I. The duties themselves.

1. Put them in mind to be subject to principalities and powers, to obey magistrates. The Christian religion was misrepresented by its adversaries, as prejudicial to the rights of princes and civil powers, and tending to faction and sedition, and to rebellion against lawful authority; therefore, to put to silence the ignorance of foolish men, and stop the mouths of malicious enemies, Christians must be reminded to show themselves examples rather of all due subjection and obedience to government. Natural desire of liberty must be guided and bounded by reason and Scripture. Spiritual privileges do not make void or weaken, but confirm and strengthen, their obligations to civil duties: remind them, therefore, to be subject to principalities and powers, and to obey magistrates. And,

2. To be ready to every good work. Some refer this to such good works as are required by magistrates, and within their sphere; but though this be included, if not first intended, yet is it not to be hereto restrained. It regards doing good in all kinds, and on every occasion that may offer, whether respecting God, ourselves, or our neighbors; what may bring credit to religion in the world, Phil. 4: 8. Mere harmlessness, or good words and good meanings only, are not enough without good works. Not only take, but seek, occasion for doing good; keep fitness and readiness that way; put it not off to others, but embrace and lay hold on it thyself; delight and rejoice therein; put all in mind of this. And,

3. To speak evil of no man; to revile, or curse, or blaspheme none; or (as our translation more generally) to speak evil of none, unjustly and falsely, or unnecessarily, without call, and when it may do hurt, but no good, to the person himself or any other: rather than speak evil unnecessarily, say nothing. We must never take pleasure in speaking ill of others, or make the worst of anything, but the best we can. Misrepresentations, or ill insinuations of bad intent, or of hypocrisy in what is done, things out of our reach or cognizance, these come within the reach of this prohibition. As this evil is too common, so it is of great malignity, Jan. 1: 26. loose, uncharitable talk is displeasing to God, and hurtful among men, Prov. 17: 9. This is among the sins to be put off, Eph. 4: 31. remind them, therefore, to avoid this. And,

4. To be no brawlers; no fighters, either with hand or tongue, no quarrelsome, contentious persons, apt to give or return ill and provoking language. A holy contending there is for matters good and important, and in a manner suitable and becoming, not with wrath or injurious violence. Christians must follow the things that make for peace, and that in a peaceful, not a rough and boisterous and hurtful way, but as becomes the servants of the God of peace and love, Rom. 12: 19. this is the Christian's wisdom and duty. The glory of a man is to pass over a transgression: it is the duty of a reasonable, and therefore certainly of a Christian man, whose reason is improved and advanced by religion; such may not, will not, presently fall foul on one who has offended him; but, like God, will be slow to anger, and ready to forgive. Wherefore it follows,

5. But gentle; equitable and just, or candid and fair in constructions of things, not taking words or actions in the worst sense; and, for peace, sometimes yielding somewhat of strict right. And,

6. Showing all meekness to all men. We must be of a mild disposition, and not only have meekness in our hearts, but show it in our speech and conduct. All meekness; meekness in all instances and occasions, not toward friends only, but to all men, though still with wisdom, as James admonishes, ch. 3: 13. Thus of the duties themselves, which Titus was to put people in mind of; for which,

II. He adds the reasons:

V. 3. 1. The reasons are derived from their own past condition. Consideration of men's natural condition is a great mean and ground of equity and gentleness, and all meekness toward those who are yet in such a state. This has a tendency to abate pride, and work pity and hope in reference to those who are yet unconverted. Their past natural condition is set forth in divers particulars. We ourselves also were sometimes,

(1.) Foolish; without true spiritual understanding and knowledge, ignorant of heavenly things. And,

NOTES. CHAP. III. V. 1, 2. 'Principalities and powers,' or civil governors.] These were idolaters, and generally oppressive and injurious; yet the apostle, during his short abode in Crete, had taught an unreserved subjection to them, except in matters of conscience towards God. But, as the Cretians would be apt to forget his admonitions, they were to be 'stirred up in the way of remembrance,' that so no disgrace might be brought on the Gospel, by the turbulent spirits and conduct of professed Christians.—It signifies promptitude in obeying superiors. Magistrates are not mentioned, yet they are primarily, but not exclusively intended; husbands, parents, and masters seem also included. See

(1.) To obey magistrates.] Every individual, by entering society, promises, 1. That he will abstain from every violation of the law of reciprocity, which, if universally permitted, would destroy society. For, if he be allowed to violate it, the allowance to violate it must be extended to all, since all are equals in rights; and thus society would be destroyed. 2. To surrender to society the right of self-protection, and 3. the right to redress his own wrongs. On the other hand, society promises, 1. To protect the individual in the enjoyment of all his rights; i. e. to enforce upon every individual, within certain limits, obedience to the law of reciprocity. 2. To redress wrongs, either by obliging the offender to do justly, or else by inflicting such punishment as may be most likely to prevent a repetition of the injury, either by the offender or by others.—These obligations are on both parts mutual and universal; one wholly and entirely surrenders the right to defend or redress himself,—the other guarantees to defend and do him justice to the utmost, i. e. in no matter how small a right, and no matter at how great an expense. Hence the obligation of every one to exert himself to the uttermost, in order to enforce the execution of the laws, no matter in how small a matter, or in the case of how obscure an individual. If laws are not executed, i. e. if individuals are not protected, and wrongs are not redressed by society, the individuals will [attempt to] redress themselves, and thus society will be dissolved. The occurrence of mobs, i. e. of extra legal modes of redress for supposed grievances, are among the most decisive indications of a state of society verging towards dissolution. . . . When conscience does not forbid, it is the business of a good citizen to obey the laws; and the faithful obedience to an unwise law, is generally the surest way of working its overthrow. The cause of civil liberty has always gained more by martyrdom than war; and the best course, when society exerts its power beyond its constituted limits, is, suffering in the cause of right. Passive obedience would in some cases be wrong, for we must obey God at all hazards; resistance by force destroys the social fabric, is of uncertain success, and civil war is, of all evils, the most horrible which men inflict upon themselves. Passive obedience may arise from servile fear; resistance from vainglory, ambition, or desire of revolution. But suffering for the sake of right, can arise only from a love of justice, and hatred of oppression. The real spirit of liberty can never exist, in any remarkable degree, in any nation where there is not this willingness to suffer in the cause of justice and liberty. Ever so little of the spirit of martyrdom, is always a more favorable indication to civilization, than ever so much dexterity of party management, or ever so turbulent protestation of immaeulate patriotism.

WAYLAND.

(1, 2.) 'That hatred of despotism, and those insurrectionary movements of volcanic power to throw off the incumbent mass, in other countries, would in ours be turned against law and order, and terminate in anarchy and despotism. It must never be forgotten, that INSURRECTIONS AGAINST ARBITRARY POWER, TEND TO LIBERTY, BUT INSURRECTIONS AGAINST LAW, TO DESPOTISM; and that all the tendencies of a republic, are to the deterioration of efficient government, from the numerous encroachments of the popular will upon law,—as in monarchies, the tendencies are to despotism from the ascendancy of aristocratic power. The one accumulates personal liberty, till the restraints of law fail before it, and anarchy enters. The other accumulates and combines governmental influence and force, till liberty falls in the streets, and equity cannot enter. This tendency of personal liberty, to the subversion of the laws, is with us the epidemic of the day. Our politicians have so long and so constantly assured the sovereign people of their power, that they have taken it into their heads to be above not only their rulers, but above themselves, as acting by their own officers and laws; so that, by the deceitful influence of our institutions, that efficiency of government, and those habits of subordination, so indispensable to qualify us for a spontaneous obedience to law, are fast falling; and the law is called to disclose its impotency, to control a population from abroad and at home, furious in passion, baughty in pride, and indomitable in will. The result is, brawls, assaults and batteries, in high places and low, duels, assassinations, robberies, conflagrations, and mobs, and all the symptoms of a fast approaching dissolution. We are fast going down stream, with all the accelerating power of passion, wind, and tide; and, unless the nation can be awakened, we shall go down. The greatest practicable liberty, lies on the perilous edge of a precipice,—a yawning gulf beneath. The youth of our land, are the chosen band, which heaven has brought into being in this eventful day, to see to it that no ruthless hand, in the hour of our thoughtless security, shall thrust us over. I commit my country, young men, to you. Be watchful, be faithful to yourselves, your country, and your God; and let the motto, "LIBERTY AND LAW," in letters of fire, blaze on the walls of every college in the land, and all will be well.'

d or, pity. e Ep. 2:4,8,9. f or, richly.

(2.) Disobedient; heady and unpersuadable, resisting the Word, and rebellious even against the natural laws of God, and those which human society requires. Well are these set together, foolish and disobedient. For what folly like this, to disobey God and his laws, natural or revealed?

(3.) Deceived, or wandering; that is, out of the ways of truth and holiness. Man, in this his degenerate state, is of a straying nature, thence compared to a lost sheep, Ps. 119: 176. He is weak, and ready to be imposed on by the wiles and subtleties of Satan, and of men lying in wait to seduce and mislead.

(4.) Serving divers lusts and pleasures; as vassals and slaves under them. Observe, Men deceived are easily entangled and ensnared. See here too what a different notion the Word gives of a sensual and fleshly life from what the world generally has of it. Carnal people think they enjoy their pleasures; the Word calls it servitude and vassalage; they are very drudges and bond-slaves unto them. Observe, It is the misery of the servants of sin, that they have many masters; one lust hurrying them one way, and another another. What vile slaves are sinners, while they conceit themselves free!

(5.) Living in malice; one of those lusts that bear rule in them. Malice desires hurt to another, and rejoices in it.

(6.) And envy; which grudges and repines at another's good, frets at his prosperity and success in anything; both roots of bitterness, whence many evils spring; evil thoughts and speeches, tongues set on fire of hell, detracting from, and impairing, the just and due praises of others. Their words are swords, wherewith they slay the good name and honor of their neighbor; the sin of Satan, and of Cain, who was of that evil one, and slew his brother. These were some of the sins in which we lived in our natural state. And,

(7.) Hateful, or odious; deserving to be hated.

(8.) And hating one another. Observe, Those that are sinful, living and allowing themselves in sin, are hateful to God and all good men. It is the misery of sinners, that they hate one another, as it is the duty and happiness of saints to love one another. The consideration of its having been thus with us, should moderate our spirits, and dispose us to be more equal and gentle, meek and tender-hearted, toward those who are such. This is the argument from their own past condition here described. And he reasons,

2. From their present state. We are delivered out of that our miserable condition by no merit or strength of our own; but only by the mercy and free grace of God, and merit of Christ, and operation of his Spirit; therefore we have no ground, in respect of ourselves, to contemn those who are yet unconverted, but rather to pity them, and cherish hope concerning them, that they, though in themselves as unworthy and unmeet as we were, yet may obtain mercy, as we have; and so on this occasion the apostle again opens the causes of our salvation, v. 4—7.

V. 4—7. 1. Here is, The prime Author of our salvation; God the Father, therefore termed here God our Savior. God, the Father, is a Savior by Christ, through the Spirit, John 3: 16. Eph. 1: 3. Rom. 5: 11.

2. The spring and rise of it; the divine philanthropy, or kindness and love of God to man. By grace we are saved, from first to last; this is the ground and motive; God's pity and mercy to man in misery were the first wheel, or rather the Spirit in the wheels, that sets and keeps them all in motion. God is not, cannot, be moved by anything out of Himself; the occasion is in man, his misery and wretchedness. God, knowing how to adjust all with his own honor and perfections, would pity and save rather than destroy. We read of riches of goodness and mercy, Rom. 2: 4. Eph. 2: 7. Let us acknowledge this, and give Him the glory of it, not turning it to wantonness, but to thankfulness and obedience.

3. The means, or instrumental cause; the shining out of this love and grace of God in the Gospel, after it appeared, that is, in the Word; [also in the incarnation, obedience, death, and resurrection of the eternal Son of God, so Scott.] The appearing of love and grace has, through the Spirit, great virtue to soften, and change, and turn to God, and so is the power of God to salvation, to every one that believeth. Thus, having asserted God to be the Author, his free grace the spring, and the manifestation of this in the Gospel the mean, of salvation; that the honor of all still may be the better secured to Him,

4. False grounds and motives are removed, v. 5. Works must be in the saved, but not among the causes of his salvation; they are the way to the kingdom, not the meriting price of it; all is on the foot of undeserved favor and mercy, from first to last. Election is of grace; we are chosen to be holy, not because it was antecedently seen that we should be so, Eph. 1: 4. It is the fruit, not the cause, of election, 2 Thess. 2: 13. So effectual calling, in which election breaks out, and is first seen, 2 Tim. 1: 9. We are justified freely by grace, Rom. 3: 24. and sanctified and saved by grace, Eph. 2: 8. Faith and all saving graces are God's free gift and works. Thus the true cause is shown, and the false removed.

5. The formal cause of salvation, or that wherein it lies, the beginnings of it at least, —in regeneration or spiritual renewing, as it is here called. A new prevailing principle of grace and holiness is wrought, which inclines and sways, and governs, and makes the man a new man, a new creature; new thoughts, desires, and affections, a new and holy turn of life and actions; the life of God in man, not only from God in a special manner, but conformed and tending to Him. Let us look to this therefore without delay; we must be initially saved now, by regeneration, if on good ground we would expect complete salvation in heaven; the change then will be but in degree, not in kind; grace is glory begun, as glory is but grace in its perfection. How few mind this! Most act as if afraid to be happy before the time; they would have heaven at last, yet care not for holiness now; that is, would have the end without the beginning; so absurd are sinners. Here then is formal salvation, in the new divine life wrought by the Gospel.

6. The outward sign and seal thereof in baptism, called therefore the washing of regeneration. The work itself is inward and spiritual; but this is outwardly signified and sealed in this ordinance. Water is of a cleansing and purifying nature, does away the filth of the flesh, and so was apt to signify the doing away of the guilt and defilement of sin by the blood and Spirit of Christ; though that aptness alone, without Christ's institution, had not been sufficient. This it is that makes it of this signification on God's part, a seal of righteousness by faith, as circumcision was, in the place of which it succeeds; and on ours, an engagement to be the Lord's. Thus baptism saves figuratively, and sacramentally, where it is rightly used, Acts 22: 16. So Eph. 5: 26. Slight not this outward sign and seal, where it may be had according to Christ's appointment; yet rest not in the outward washing only, but look to the answer of a good conscience, without which the external washing will avail nothing.

This is the outward sign and seal of salvation, baptism, called here the washing of regeneration.

7. The principal efficient; the Spirit of God, it is the renewing of the Holy Ghost; not excluding the Father and the Son, who in all works without themselves are concurring; nor the use of means, the Word and sacraments, by which the Spirit works; through his operation it is that they have their saving effect. In the economy of our salvation, the applying and effecting part is especially attributed to the Holy Spirit. Earnestly therefore is He to be sought, and greatly to be heeded by us, that we quench not his holy motions, nor resist and oppose Him in his workings. The Spirit is a tender thing; as we act toward Him, so may we expect He will to us; if we slight and resist, and oppose his workings, He will slacken them; if we continue to vex Him, He will retire. Grieve not therefore the Holy Spirit of God, whereby ye are sealed to the day of redemption, Eph. 4: 30. The Spirit seals by his renewing and sanctifying, his witnessing and assuring work; He distinguishes and marks out for salvation, fits for it; it is his work; we could not turn to God by any strength of our own, any more than we can be justified by any righteousness of our own.

8. The manner of God's communicating this Spirit in the gifts and graces of it; not with a scanty and niggardly hand, but most freely and plentifully; which He shed on us

V. 4—7. The miraculous gifts of the Holy Spirit are not so much as alluded to in this place; and nothing induces more confusion and perplexity into the expositions given of the Scripture by commentators of different descriptions, than the neglect of distinguishing between those communications which constituted men prophets or apostles, and those which were, still are, and ever must be, indispensably necessary to render them true Christians.—The expression, 'shed,' or 'poured' 'on us,' in this manifest allusion to the sacrament of baptism, may properly be noted. as an intimation, that the pouring of water on any person, 'in the name of the Father, and the Son, and the Holy Spirit,' is baptism, equally with immersion. Mat. 28: 19, 20.—Appeared.] It implies, to be illustriously or gloriously manifested.

(5.) Not by works, &c.] 'Paul here speaks to believers, and describes the manner in which they come into the kingdom of God. He denies that they have in anything been meritorious by works, that they should be partakers of salvation, or be reconciled to God by faith; but they have obtained the blessing, he says, by the sole mercy of God. Therefore from these words, we infer, that we bring nothing to God, (nihil nos afferre Deo) [i. e. to recommend ourselves to Him]; 'but that we are prevented (præveniri)' [or anticipated in becoming believers] 'by his mere grace, without respect to works. Finally, that we, rather than others, are chosen to a participation of Christ; this, also, Paul refers entirely to the mercy of God.' CALVIN.—Baptism is a sign of our regeneration, which is wrought by the Holy Ghost. Bp.'s Bible, in Henry, abr.—On the subject of baptismal regeneration Dodd. has this remark, that 'it is not by washing the infant, that the birth is produced;' which is intended to be conclusive against it, so far as any argument from the figure is concerned.

7 That, being justified by his grace, we should be made heirs according to the hope of eternal life.

8 This is a faithful saying; and these things I will that thou affirm constantly; that they which have believed in God might be careful to maintain good works. These things are good and profitable unto men.

9 But avoid foolish questions, and genealogies, and contentions, and strivings about the law; for they are unprofitable and vain.

abundantly. More of the Spirit in its gifts and graces is poured out under the gospel than was under the law; whence it is eminently styled the ministration of the Spirit, 2 Cor. 3: 8. Is. 44: 3. Joel 2: 28. Ac. 2:17,18, 33. 10:44, 45. Our condemnation will but be aggravated the more, if under such a dispensation of grace we remain void of grace. Be filled with the Spirit, says the apostle; it is duty as well as privilege, because of the means which God in the Gospel is ready to bless and make effectual; this is the manner of God's communicating grace and all spiritual blessings under the Gospel, plentifully; He is not straitened towards us, but we toward Him and in ourselves.

9. The procuring Cause of all, namely, Christ; Through Jesus Christ our Savior. He it is who purchased the Spirit and his saving gifts and graces; all come through Him, and through Him as a Savior, whose undertaking and work it is to bring to grace and glory; He is our Righteousness and Peace, and our Head, from whom we have all spiritual life and influences. Let us praise God for Him above all; let us go to the Father by Him, and improve Him to all sanctifying and saving purposes.

10. The ends why we are brought into this new spiritual condition, namely, justification, and heirship, and hope of eternal life; That, being justified by his grace, we should be made heirs according to the hope of eternal life. Justification, in the gospel-sense, is the free remission of a sinner, and accepting him as righteous through the righteousness of Christ received by faith. In it there is removing guilt that bound to punishment, and accepting and dealing with the person as one that now is righteous in God's sight. This God does freely as to us, yet through the intervention of Christ's sacrifice and righteousness laid hold on by faith, Rom. 3: 20, &c. God, in justifying a sinner in the way of the gospel, is gracious to him, and yet just to Himself and his law; forgiveness being through a perfect righteousness, and satisfaction made to justice by Christ, who is the propitiation for sin, and not merited by the sinner himself. So it is here; Not by works of righteousness, &c. It is by grace, as the spring and rise, (as was said,) though through the redemption that is in Christ, as making the way, God's law and justice being thereby satisfied; and by faith applying that redemption. Acts 13: 39. Let us not trust therefore in our own righteousness, or merit of good works, but in Christ's righteousness alone, received by faith for justification and acceptance with God. Observe, Our justification is by the grace of God, and our justification by that grace is necessary in order to our being made heirs of eternal life; without such justification there can be no adoption and sonship, and so no right of inheritance. John 1: 12. Eternal life is set before us in the promise, the Spirit works faith in us, and hope of that life, and so are we made heirs of it, and have a kind of possession of it even now; faith and hope bring it near, and fill with joy in the well-grounded expectation of it. The meekest believer is a great heir; though he have not his portion in hand, he has good hope through grace, and may bear up under all difficulties; there is a better state in view, he is waiting for an inheritance incorruptible, undefiled, and that fadeth not away, reserved in heaven for him. And now all this gives good reason why we should show all meekness to all men, because we have experienced so much benefit by the kindness and love of God to us, and many hope that they, in God's time, may be partakers of the like grace as we are. And thus of the reasons of equal and gentle, meek and tender behavior towards others; from their own bad condition in time past, and the present more happy state into which they are brought, without any merit or desertings of their own, and whereinto by the same grace others may be brought also.

The apostle, having opened the duties of Christians in common, with the reasons respecting themselves, adds another from their goodness and usefulness to men.

V. 8. 1. Observe, When he has opened the grace of God toward us, he immediately presses the necessity of good works; for we must not expect the benefit of God's mercy, unless we make conscience of our duty, v. 8. This is a true Christian doctrine of highest importance, and which ministers must most earnestly and constantly press and inculcate; that they who have believed in God, do not think that a bare naked faith will save them; but it must be an operative, working faith, bringing forth the fruit of righteousness. These things are good and profitable unto men; these good works, say some, or the teaching of these things, rather than idle questions, as follow. These things are good in themselves, and the teaching of them useful to mankind, making persons a common good in their places.

2. Observe, Ministers, in teaching, must see that they deliver what is sound and good in itself, and profitable to them that hear; all must be to the use of edifying both persons and societies.

Here is the fifth and last thing in the matter of the epistle; what Titus should avoid in teaching; how he should deal with a heretic; with some other directions.

V. 9. 1. That the apostle's meaning here might be more clear and full, and especially fitted to the time and state of things there, and the many judaizers among them, he tells Titus what, in teaching, he should slun. Needful questions are to be discussed and cleared; but idle and foolish inquiries, tending neither to God's glory nor the edification of men, must be shunned; avoid these. And genealogies of the gods, say some, those the heathen poets spake of; or rather those the Jews were so curious in; some lawful and useful inquiries might be made into these things, to see the fulfilling of the Scriptures in some cases, and especially in the descent of Christ the Messiah; but all that served to pomp only, and to feed vanity, in boasting of a long pedigree, and much more the Jewish teachers were ready to busy themselves in, and trouble their hearers with, even since Christ was come, and that distinction of families and tribes had been taken away; these Titus must withstand as foolish and vain. And contentions, and strivings about the law. There were those who would have the Mosaic rites and ceremonies continued in the church; though by the Gospel and coming of Christ they were done away. Titus must give no countenance to these, but avoid and oppose them; for they are unprofitable and vain; so far from instructing and building up in godliness, that they are hindrances of it rather. Observe, Ministers must not only teach things good and useful, but slun and oppose the contrary, what would corrupt the faith, and hinder godliness and good works; nor should people have itching ears, but love and embrace sound doctrine, which tends most to the use of edifying.

2. But because, after all, there will be heresies and heretics in the church, the apostle next directs Titus what to do in such a case, and how to deal with such.

V. 10, 11. He who forsakes the truth as it is in Christ Jesus, and broaches false doctrines, and propagates them, to the corrupting of the faith in weighty and momentous points, and breaks the peace of the church about them, let such a one be rejected, after due means used to reclaim him. Those who will not be reclaimed by admonitions, but are obstinate in their sins and errors, are subverted and self-condemned; they inflict that punishment on themselves that the governors of the church should inflict on them; they throw themselves out of the church, and throw off its communion, and so are self-condemned. Observe, 1. How great an evil proper heresy is, not lightly therefore to be charged on any, though greatly to be taken heed of by all. Proper heretics have seldom been recovered to the true faith; not so much defect of judgment,

V. 9. It was incumbent on Titus, to insist on the grand peculiarities of the Gospel — The contrast between those things which 'are good and profitable to men' (8), and 'those which are unprofitable and vain,' is worthy of observation.

V. 10, 11. A heretic, in St. Paul's sense, seems to denote a professed Christian, who obstinately denies and opposes some fundamental doctrine of the Gospel, as taught by the apostles, especially if he were earnest to propagate his notions, from a vain desire of being the head of a party, and so made divisions in the church. Gal. 5:19—21. The Scriptures (Mat. 25:26—28. Lu. 7:30. 19:22. Jn. 3:18. Acts 13:46. Rom. 3:19.) show, that when a man's own words suffice for his condemnation, without further evidence, he may be said to be 'condemned of himself;' nor does any great difficulty appear in this much disputed text, except in explaining it in a manner consistent with the systems of contending zealots.—In subordinate matters the apostle inculcated mutual forbearance; but all his epistles show, that he supposed some errors to be fundamental, and absolutely inconsistent with faith in Christ. For pertinaciously maintaining these errors, men ought to be excommunicated, as much as for gross immoralities; and were things restored to their primitive state in the church of Christ, there can be no doubt, that those who deny the ruined estate of man by nature, the Deity of Christ, the real atonement of his death, justification by faith in the merits of Christ, of grace and not of works; the need of sanctification by the Ho-
